THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he had no objection to the production of the Papers for which the noble Marquess had moved; on the contrary, it was desirable that as much information as possible on this subject should be laid before their Lordships. He thought, however, that the noble Marquess had taken rather too desponding a view of the state of the militia force; because, although it was true that a considerable diminution annually took place from deaths, expiration of time, and other causes, still he found from the figures which had been placed in his hands that in the last two years in which recruiting had been carried on with vigour the result had been satisfactory—the numbers having approached the prescribed quota of 120,000. In 1862-3 the number of new men enrolled was 29,233, in 1863-4 it was 29,236, and in 1865-6, when the previous efforts began to be relaxed, 23,449, therefore, though possibly all these men might not appear at the time of training, the figures he had quoted were sufficient to show that the decline in the strength of the force could not be going on at the rapid rate the noble Marquess seemed to suppose. The fact was that in 1864 a change was introduced, and a reduction was made from 120,000 to a lower quota. The explanation given was that several of the regiments were of an unmanageable size, and having to assemble at places where there was very limited accommodation, their very numbers were found inconvenient. A departmental order was therefore issued that not more than 600 men should be enrolled for each regiment. He had been informed that the result of that change was to introduce some uncertainty into the minds of commanding officers, and the recruiting, which before had been prosecuted with vigour, was relaxed, as it appeared to be possible that further reductions might from time to time be made, whether from financial, or other considerations. The change had naturally a prejudicial effect upon the strength of the force; but he understood from those whose business it was to watch this force that they did not anticipate that any difficulty would be found in filling up the ranks again to the higher quota if an order to that effect should be issued. If the size of the militia regiments was objected to a remedy might easily be found in dividing them, though that might involve some increase of the staff; but the slight extra expense of such an arrangement was of little importance compared with the benefit that would result from preserving in efficiency so large and valuable a national force. The noble Marquess had mentioned that in 1852 the militia force was revived. At that time the staff had dwindled down to 715 persons, and the whole militia force enumerated on the Army List covered only three pages and a half. But, in 1852, Parliament took up the question vigorously; since then no less than sixteen special Acts of Parliament had been passed on the subject, and in 1859 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the state of the force. The year 1852 was one of considerable political movement, a change of Ministry took place, and a general election soon followed. There was, however, at the time, a general concurrence of opinion in favour of the revival of the militia force. One Government introduced a Bill with that object at the commencement of the Session, and although they did not pass it, their successors carried the measure in a somewhat altered form. There was a great difference of opinion at the time and some hot discussions took place. While it was advanced on the one side that we had no respectable military force in the country, and that a revival of the militia was absolutely necessary, persons equally competent were to be found on the other, who were of an entirely opposite opinion. But even those who admitted that an addition to our military strength was necessary, differed as to the way in which it should be made. Some were for an increase in the regular army, some for a local militia, and some for an army of reserve. He had read in Hansard that one experienced Member of the House of Commons informed the Ministry that he had shown them how they may have a reinforcement of almost any amount of regular troops in an army of reserve, at almost no cost. He had not heard that that project had been realized — perhaps the author had not lived to carry out his plan ; but if any friend had inherited the details, the War Office would be very glad to hear from him. Some opponents of the militia scheme at the time grounded their objections upon the assumption that the force could never become efficient on account of the limited period of training. And this was said of those very militia regiments which, two years afterwards, most efficiently did the duty of regular troops both at home and abroad. And now, when he heard it whispered that the militia were falling away he reflected upon the predictions of 1852, and tried to reassure himself by the thought that the force which had grown efficient in such a short period, might still perhaps maintain its efficiency, notwithstanding the omens of decline which some thought they noticed at the present time. The noble Marquess had adverted to the deficiency of numbers now existing. That deficiency amounted to something like 800 officers and 7,000 men. The deficiency of men might be accounted for by the uncertainty to which he had before referred, which affected the recruiting ; but the deficiency of officers was a more serious matter. It was gradual, but still in the same unfavourable direction. The Commission which sat in 1859 had considered the position of the officers of the staff, but not that of captains and subalterns, and had made some recommendations with regard to the former which had been adopted. Notwithstanding, the officers of the permanent staff were not altogether satisfied with their position now, and numerous memorials were received from them : representations were also made by captains and subalterns who attended training, complaining that the expenses they were put to were considerable, and calling attention to their inferior billets, and other matters. Some cases had certainly been made out for favourable consideration on the part of the authorities, and the heads of the Department were ready to consider them. It was well known that from year to year there was a Massacre of the Innocents at the time of the preparation of the Estimates, and many a wise and large-hearted project disappeared or died the slow death of postponement to a future opportunity. It should not be forgotten that the nomination of the officers of the militia was a matter with which, as yet, the public Departments had no concern. There was no disposition to trench on the functions of the lord-lieutenant of counties, with whom these appointments rested, and until the lord-lieutenant came forward of themselves and begged to be relieved of the task—which he hoped would not be until a very distant day—the Departments could not interfere. In the county management of the militia there appeared to be some anomalies. For instance, they were under no military jurisdiction when they were assembled for drill, they did not report themselves to the General Officer of the district, and the present system of inspection was not altogether satisfactory. As the Inspector General of Militia was unable to inspect the whole force, military officers were taken from the neighbouring stations to perform this duty. They usually passed a very pleasant day, and were generally able to make a very favourable report of the regiment they inspected. But there was one point which they frequently pointed out as calling for some attention—namely, the state of the storehouses, the armouries, and quarters for staff-sergeants of militia. The law on this point had been altered, and the practice now was very uncertain. The Royal Commission reported as follows :—

“We find that in 1853 counties were required, under the provisions of the Militia laws, to provide quarters for at least one-half of the non-commissioned officers of the permanent staff ; that in the subsequent year an Act was passed leaving the provision of such quarters to the discretion of the magistrates of the county ; and that, practically, many counties have not even provided accommodation for the proportion above alluded to. We therefore recommend, with a view to the maintenance of discipline, that the whole of the non-commissioned officers of the permanent staff be provided by the counties with proper quarters in or near the storehouses, and that a quarter be also provided for the residence of the drummers and buglers of the permanent staff.”

This, however, had not been done, and the result was very great inconvenience, and injury to the discipline of the force. Besides the quarters in or near the storehouses, the law originally required that yards should be provided for the mustering and drilling of the men. This also had been neglected, and there were some stations at which, practically, the whole business of the militia was done in the street. The drill-ground was often at a distance, and the result was great loss of time, as well as other inconveniences, and the few days allotted to exercise could not, under such circumstances, be turned to the best advantage. This question came before the authorities lately, in connection with reports from different localities, as to the insecure position of the arms of Volunteers. Similar reports were made of the militia stores; and it was found that in some cases only one, and in others no sergeant at all, was in the armoury. This was a matter of serious consequence; but it was also a point involving great expense. He had heard of counties which had spent £13,000 or £15,000 in providing stores and quarters. He had no doubt that this was money well laid out, if the scruples of economists at quarter sessions could be overcome. The noble Marquess had alluded to the proposal respecting an Army of Reserve, which had been mentioned in the other House of Parliament. The details were not yet published, for, owing to the change in the head of the War Office, and to other causes, some delay had taken place. As regarded the militia, the proposal was that certain soldiers whose first period of service had not expired might have permission, after eight years' service, to commute the unexpired portion of their term for a double period of service in the militia; and that a certain number of militiamen ready drilled—a limited number—might, on receipt of extra bounty, be joined with those soldiers in the first reserve, both being under an obligation to join the ranks of the army on any emergency should their services be required. Until this emergency arose they would do duty with the militia, as they did now, and possibly might complete their whole service without being called upon to serve in the line. It was intended, he might observe, if the scheme was adopted, that the quota of the militia would be restored to its original strength of 120,000, in order that, after the withdrawal of these soldiers and Volunteer first reserve men, the remainder of the force should be not below its present establishment of 94,000. He had sometimes heard it said that the organization of the Volunteer force had to some extent superseded the militia in public view. The Volunteers, no doubt, had the advantage of novelty; their dress was, perhaps, more picturesque, and they were more seen and heard than the militia. Nevertheless, there was plenty of room for both. The total of our regular and auxiliary forces did not exceed together 1·7 per cent of the population. In reality, therefore, the militia had very little cause to regret that their patriotism in coming forward for the public defence should be shared by others. Although those who had charge of public Departments acknowledged cordially the spirit and good feeling with which so many had come forward to sacrifice money, time, and personal exertions to maintain and develop the auxiliary forces, of which the militia was the first and the oldest, nevertheless much remained to be done by local effort. Acts of Parliament and acts of administration required corresponding efforts and support from those who were interested—as all were—in the institutions of the country. The noble Earl concluded by stating that the papers moved for would be supplied.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in reply, regretted the economy of the War Office, and said that the noble Earl had not touched upon the mode of increasing the number of recruits.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he himself had reason to agree with the noble Marquess in regretting the economy of the War Office, for they had even cut off his half-pay, on the ground that he was now holding an office of profit under the Crown. As to the other point mentioned by the noble Marquess, he must remind the noble Marquess of what he had already stated—that in 1862-3 and 1863-4, there had been 29,000 recruits raised in each year, and, with very slight relaxations, he was informed that a full supply of recruits, whenever required, would be obtained for the militia without the ballot.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he was glad to hear from the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War that, from the information at his command, he did not acquiesce in the desponding view taken of the militia by the noble Marquess. In 1859, when volunteering for the militia was at its lowest ebb, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the whole question. The recommendations of the Commissioners were considered and adopted by the late Government, and had been followed by their successors; and the result of the measures thus taken was that the number of men enlisted increased, and that they were drawn from a more satisfactory class of persons—namely, from those resident in the respective counties. Therefore, this recruiting from the militia must have interfered in a less degree with recruiting for the Line. There could be no doubt that those causes, which were considered by the Royal Commission of last year to interfere with recruiting for the Line, in some degree affected the recruiting for the militia. The noble Earl who had just sat down had told their Lordships that there had been of late years no less than 29,000 men raised in the course of a year for the militia within the three kingdoms. It was impossible to say, if there were facilities for raising such a number of men, that they were likely to encounter any serious difficulty in obtaining the number of men required for that force. But the noble Earl seemed to think that a measure of the late Government had had an unfavourable effect on the recruiting for the militia. The noble Earl correctly described the objects of the measure; but he was not quite correct when he spoke of it as being intended to reduce the quota. The quota and the establishment remained just as they were before; all that was done was to direct that the larger regiments should not be filled up to their full strength. That direction was issued in consequence of its having been found that 1,000 or 1,200 men was a larger number than could be properly handled by one commanding officer. To divide the regiments would largely increase the expense; because, although division might not involve having altogether double the number of officers, it would necessitate the doubling of all the staff expenses and seriously interfere with the existing organization. Therefore, it was the opinion of the late Government that by diminishing the strength of the larger regiments and increasing the period of training from twenty-one to twenty-seven days in each year, they were adopting a course which was calculated not to diminish but to increase the efficiency of the militia. It might have turned out—but the noble Earl was better informed on that point than himself—that the measure had had some effect on recruiting; but he could not see how the measure could have had this result. A noble Friend of his drew his attention the other day to a matter which in some parts of the country had had a considerable effect on recruiting for the militia—namely, the change that had taken place in some districts from the system of engaging agricultural labourers by the week to that of engaging them by the year. It was not permitted to the recruiting officers of the militia to interfere with men engaged thus permanently as labourers; and he believed that in some parts of the country this had greatly affected recruiting. He agreed with the noble Marquess that it was of great importance, especially at the present time, when they saw what was taking place in other countries, seriously to consider the question, and to take every step that could be taken to fill up the numbers and to increase the efficiency of this most valuable branch of our military service, which must form—as he took the liberty of observing the other night—the first portion of the home reserve. But the deficiency of officers was a more serious and more pressing evil than the deficiency of men. The noble Earl (the Earl of Longford) had told them that the militia was 7,000 men short of its quota. That was an unfortunate circumstance; but the want of 800 officers was a matter which required still graver consideration. One cause of the difficulty of obtaining officers for the militia of late years was, no doubt, the establishment of the Volunteers. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl that there was plenty of room for both forces, and that both forces were required; but undoubtedly the establishment of the Volunteer force had increased the difficulty found by lords-lieutenant in obtaining officers for the militia. The subject was one of daily increasing importance, and it had occupied much of his attention, particularly during the latter part of his administration at the War Office. He trusted that the present Government would give their serious attention not only to the number of the officers, but also to the quality of the officers to be appointed. It was as important that a due proportion of the officers should be men having practical acquaintance with military service, and some of them should be men of county position and influence. The noble Marquess, in alluding to the introduction of the ballot, dwelt on the great expense which attended the system in former times, and the length of time which it took to raise men by ballot. But in so doing the noble Lord was describing a state of things which did not exist at the present time. In 1860 a measure was passed, on the recommendation of the late Lord Herbert, for shortening the period required for carrying out the ballot, and the operation would now be less expensive and would occupy a considerably shorter time than was the case under the old system. He was entirely of the noble Marquess's opinion that it would be a serious thing to entertain the proposal for the revival of compulsory service in time of peace, not only on account of the expense and loss of time which would be involved, but for the obvious reason that it would be necessary for the Government which would propose such a system to show that there was an overwhelming necessity for it. Still, he thought that the power of resorting to the ballot in times of war and emergency should be retained. It appeared to him that the system of local taxation which the noble Marquess had suggested would be neither practicable nor efficient.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE desired to ask the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War, whether, under the new scheme of army reserve about to be submitted to Parliament, a militia officer bringing 100 men to that part of the militia which was to form a portion of the reserve would be entitled to a commission? If so, there would be a great inducement for the sons of country gentlemen to join the militia. At present they preferred the Volunteer force as being the more popular service. Complaints had been made to him by officers commanding militia regiments, and by captains of companies, that they had had to discharge all the duties of subalterns, and this was regarded as a great hardship.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, the scheme for the army reserve was not yet before Parliament; and he hoped that he might be allowed to defer his answer to another opportunity.

ROYAL NAVY.—MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving for a Return of the Number of Lieutenants on the Active List of the Navy in each Year from 1856 to 1867; and also for a Return showing the Number of Lieutenants employed in each Year from 1856 to 1867, said: My Lords, the object I have in view is this—it has been reported that the Board of Admiralty consider that the number of cadets entered of late years is too large, and that we have too many junior officers in the navy, and I desire to remove that impression. My experience in office teaches me that, instead of there being too many lieutenants, even during time of peace, we have lately had too few, and the Returns I move for will show that. Your Lordships are aware that the efficiency of the navy, especially during the next few years, will depend very much upon the efficiency of the lieutenants, and it is of the greatest importance that the number should not fall below a certain minimum. I feel the more responsibility upon this subject, because some years ago I was Chairman of a Committee of the House of Commons which, after hearing the evidence of Lord Auckland, then first Lord of the Admiralty, and of the Naval Lords, recommended the reduction of the number of cadets; and the Admiralty not only acted on this view, but carried it out to a greater extent than the Committee contemplated. The consequence was that as soon as the Russian war broke out, there was a serious want of lieutenants for the navy, and great complaints were made. On that account, feeling the responsibility of the opinion which I gave in connection with the Committee, even though that opinion was founded on the evidence which we took, I am now anxious to correct, at least as far as I can, any erroneous impression which may have been made by that Report, and to say that we increased the number of entries of cadets, because there were so few lieutenants in the navy. I have continually had complaints made to me that when lieutenants came home from foreign service or tropical climates, instead of being allowed a reasonable time to visit their friends, they were, in the course of a few weeks, appointed to a ship, and again sent to a distant part of the world. And that was the case even in time of peace. Such a system is not only injurious to the lieutenants themselves, but likewise detrimental to the interests of the service. I am not aware of the exact number of lieutenants in the navy at present, nor of the number now employed, and I have moved for these Returns in order to ascertain that, and to have the means of comparing the numbers now employed with the numbers in previous years, and I shall afterwards call the attention of the House to the subject. There are no complaints against the Board of Admiralty that I am aware of; and, in fact, in declining to appoint a larger number of cadets, they have given up a certain amount of patronage.

Motion agreed to. [Parl. Paper, No. 79.]

Return of the Number of Lieutenants on the Active List of the Navy in each Year from 1856 to 1867: And also,

Return showing the Number of Lieutenants employed in each Year from 1856 to 1867.—(The Duke of Somerset.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

COUNTY RATES.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If Her Majesty's Government, will introduce any measure to enable the Inhabitants of Counties who are rated to the County Rate to be represented at County Financial Boards, and through their representatives to have some control in the making and in the expending of the monies raised by County Rates?

MR. WALPOLE stated, in reply, that he did not intend to introduce any measure to enable the inhabitants of counties who were rated to the county rate to be represented at county financial boards.

ART UNIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is prepared to bring in a Bill, during the present Session, to place Art Unions under the department of Science and Art, as recommended in the Report of the Select Committee of last Session, of which he was Chairman?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, he thought his hon. Friend must labour under the pleasing delusion that at the Committee of Council Office they had nothing to do but to sit with their arms folded all day long. If, however, he would bear in mind the various questions connected with the Paris Exhibition, the South Kensington Museum, the Charity Commission, the Cholera, the Cattle Plague, and other subjects with which they had to deal, he would see that they had but little time at their disposal for the preparation of fancy Bills. The first moment he had leisure he should be happy to think about such a measure as that to which his hon. Friend alluded.

RAILWAY DEBENTURES.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure on the subject of Railway Debentures this Session?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE replied, that a Select Committee was sitting on the subject of railway debentures, on which the Government was represented, and that it would, perhaps, be premature to say more than that such a measure as the hon. Gentleman referred to was under the consideration of that Committee.

BUST OF THE LATE MR. HUME.

QUESTION.

MR. EWART said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has been able to give effect to the wishes of this House, as expressed last Session in an Address to Her Majesty the Queen, that an appropriate place be found, within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster, for the reception of a Bust of the late Joseph Hume, Esq., presented by his widow?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that immediately after Her Majesty's gracious reply to the Address in question had been received, he had made inquiry as to the wishes of those who were naturally most interested about the spot in which the bust should be placed, and he was happy to say, as the result of those inquiries, that it would very shortly be placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

STATE OF THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House, Copies of Despatches from Her Majesty's Consuls in Corfu, Zante, and Cephalonia, containing information on the state of those Islands since the withdrawal of British protection, and their annexation to the Kingdom of Greece?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, he would look into the matter without loss of time, and that he had no doubt there would be found to be no objection to the production of those papers.

THE PLANTAGENET STATUES AT FONTEVRAULT.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the statement in the public papers is correct, that Her Majesty the Queen has declined to accept the offer of the Plantagenet Statues from Fontevault, made by the Emperor of the French, in deference to the expressed feelings of the French people against their removal? He wished further to ask the noble Lord, whether he can, either through Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen or the Ambassador at Paris, convey to the Emperor of the French the earnest wish of many in this country that the effigies of our most illustrious Sovereigns and their consorts should be restored to their proper position in the Abbey of Fontevault, and no longer be left in their present neglected state in a deserted vault?

LORD STANLEY: When, in answer, Sir, to a Question put to me by the hon. Member, I last gave some information to the House on this subject, I said that the Emperor of the French, with that courtesy which he had invariably shown towards this country, had offered those statues to Her Majesty, and that that offer had been accepted by Her Majesty with gratitude. Since that time the state of the case has altered. Information reached us from various quarters to the effect that the Emperor in his anxiety to meet what he supposed to be the wishes of the people of England—an anxiety for which we owe him a debt of gratitude—had placed himself in a position of some little difficulty. We learnt that legal objections were taken to the removal of those statues, which it was thought could be overcome only by legislative action on the part of the French Chambers. Independent of that consideration, there is no doubt that in the locality where those memorials of antiquity are preserved there arose—however little care might up to the present time have been taken of them—a very strong feeling against their removal. Now, we felt that it could not be the wish of Her Majesty, or the Government, or of this House, or the English public that any misunderstanding should spring up between the Emperor and his own subjects out of a matter in which he acted solely out of a feeling of kindness and courtesy towards this country. We therefore advised Her Majesty—and Her Majesty was graciously pleased to accept the advice—that she should at once release the Emperor from his promise, and that that promise should be looked upon as if it had not been given. A communication to that effect has been conveyed to His Majesty; I have not yet received an answer to that communication; but I assume that the removal of the statues will not now take place, and that the matter may be looked upon as at an end. In reply to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, I may state that in the letter which, by Her Majesty's command, I wrote on the subject, I ventured to express a hope that, as we had waived whatever claim we might be supposed to possess on the French Government as to the removal of those memorials, some means would be taken—seeing that their value seemed now to be known and appreciated in the locality to which they belonged—to preserve them, and that they would not be allowed to remain in the neglected state in which they were now understood to be.

IRELAND.—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.—QUESTION.

MR. ESMONDE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in conformity with the precedent of last year, it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to introduce and lay upon the table the Irish Reform Bill before going into Committee upon the Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Representation of the People in England and Wales?

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he also would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he will inform the House when he intends to introduce the Bill for the further amendment of the Law relating to the Representation of the People in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sorry, Sir, to have to state that it will not be in my power to lay the Irish Reform Bill on the table before we go into Committee on the English Bill. But we shall bring it forward as soon as we can after the Easter recess.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce any Compulsory Educational Clauses in the Bill for regulating the hours of labour in workshops? He should also be glad to know whether, if such Clauses are to be proposed, they will be laid upon the table of the House before the Easter recess?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that he meant to introduce educational clauses into the Bill; but he thought that the most convenient opportunity for his stating the nature of those clauses would be on the Motion for their going into Committee on the measure.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—COURSE OF PROCEEDING.

QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which, if he should not find it convenient to answer now, I shall repeat on Monday. I wish to know, first, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any alteration in the arrangements or provisions of the Bill for amending the Representation of the People before inviting the House to discuss its Clauses in Committee; and secondly, whether he is willing to lay upon the table of the House the Reports or other Documents from which he quoted on Tuesday the opinions of the late and present Chairmen of the Board of Inland Revenue, with respect to the proposed taxing Franchise?

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NEW NATIONAL GALLERY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to call attention to the competition for the New National Gallery, and to the Papers on the subject which had been laid upon the table of the House, and to move for a Copy of any further Correspondence between the architects and the First Commissioner of Works. He desired, at the outset, to state that the architects themselves were not aware that he intended to bring the subject before the House. The history of the proceedings was shortly this. In the month of February, 1866, twelve architects were invited to send in designs for the building, and eleven of them accepted the invitation. Instructions were issued to these gentlemen in reference to the competition, but no date was assigned to those instructions in the papers which had been laid before the House. Further instructions were forwarded to them on the 25th and 29th of June last, and the time for sending in the designs was enlarged from the end of October in the same year to the 1st of January in the present year. In the course of the latter month the noble Lord the present First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners) appointed a Committee of Judges to advise him with respect to the plans, and those judges made their Report on the 28th of February last. They recommended that none of the designs should be carried into effect. But, at the same time, they expressed their belief that the design of Mr. Edward Barry for a new Gallery, and that of Mr. Murray for the adaptation of the existing Gallery, exhibited the greatest amount of architectural merit. The judges then pointed out what they considered to be the requirements for a new Gallery. Now, it would naturally occur to the mind of anyone to inquire why judges appointed to consider the designs sent in should give their opinion to the First Commissioner of Works as to the requirements for a new National Gallery. Consequently it would be probable that any inquirer would look at the instructions which were issued, and to these he begged the House to turn for a moment. The first portion of the instructions issued to the architects in June last year merely stated what form the designs were to assume, and it was not until one had gone half way through the instructions that one arrived at the requisites for the Gallery itself. These instructions, issued by the right hon. Gentleman the late First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper), were, he thought, of a very unusual character, and deserved special notice. The only condition laid down with respect to the largest of the galleries was, that it should have a width of fifty feet, while there was no allusion whatever to the amount of wall space which would be required for the pictures. It was a most extraordinary omission. Subsequently, further instructions were issued to the architects, but they merely stated that a large number of rooms would be required, such as packing rooms, lumber rooms, and the like; but still, there was not a single word about the wall space or the number of rooms required as galleries. This omission, taken in connection with the difficulties of the site—for the Nelson Column would cut the building to be constructed into two halves—increased tenfold the trouble which the architects must have had in preparing their designs. Here, then, was the explanation of the fact that the judges in their Report had given a list of requirements for the new Gallery. They did so, because the late First Commissioner (Mr. Cowper) had not given them. And it was owing to this fact that the designs were not as satisfactory as they would otherwise have been. The next point to which he wished to direct the attention of the House was the conditions under which the architects were to engage in that competition. It was stated in the instructions that each architect was to be paid £200 for his drawings, which were to become the property of Her Majesty's Commissioner of Works. The First Commissioner did not engage himself to adopt any of the designs that might be sent in; but if one of the designs should be adopted the author of it would be employed to carry it into effect, and would be paid the usual commission of 5 per cent on the outlay. That was the only statement of the conditions of the competition contained in the papers presented to the House. But it appeared that there had been, not only written conditions but spoken conditions addressed to the architects. A distinct reference was, as he understood, made to the latter communications in the letter of the competing architects to the noble Lord the present First Commissioner of Works. Those gentlemen there stated that they—

"Had entered the competition on the distinct understanding with his Lordship's predecessor that one of the competing architects would be selected for employment, and they most respectfully represented to his Lordship that a contrary course would be a breach of faith with them, and would confer a lasting injury upon every one of the competitors."

The right hon. Gentleman the late First Commissioner of Works seemed to share the opinion of the architects; because on the 15th of February he had forwarded a letter to Mr. Austin, the Secretary to the Commissioner of Works, in which he stated that—

"A rumour had reached him that the judges who had been appointed were not disposed to perform the duty expected of them by deciding which of the competing designs was the best; and he believed such a course would be considered unfair towards the competitors, and would establish a precedent injurious to the success of future competitions for public buildings."

The right hon. Gentleman proceeded further to state that—

"The expectation held out to the architects to induce them to compete had always been that an impartial decision would be made and published between the competing designs, and that the successful competitor would be engaged as the architect of the building, even though the identical design was not adopted."

The very nature of the competition naturally led to the same conclusion. It was a limited competition; and that circumstance of itself afforded a prima facie presumption that the author of the best design was to be selected as the architect of the building. As there were two sets of conditions, one printed and published, and the other spoken, it was utterly impossible for the noble Lord the present First Commissioner of Works to know, when he entered office, what the conditions really were, and therefore the noble Lord and the architects were placed in an awkward position. He had pointed out why the judges had stated in their Report what they considered would be the true requirements of the National Gallery. Now, had the late First Commissioner only proceeded on the plan he himself had adopted in the competition for the new Law Courts, these difficulties would never have occurred. There, both instructions and conditions were precise and accurate; here they were very much the reverse. It was owing to this that the want of success of the architects in the present instance must be attributed, and not to any real difference in their professional capacity. That being the case, the course the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) ought to pursue was plain and simple. He ought to consult the Trustees of the National Gallery and its director, Mr. Boxall—an artist of the highest reputation—as to the requirements. He should thereupon draw up a clear, definite, and accurate code of instructions, and request Mr. Barry, or Mr. Barry and Mr. Murray, to prepare from these instructions fresh plans and designs, which should then be submitted to the judges for their approval. There would thus be still a fair probability of obtaining a suitable building—one which might be a credit to the Government and an ornament to the metropolis. And, at the same time, public faith would be kept with the architect—

"The public faith which ev'ry one Is bound to observe, yet kept by none," as Hudibras says—the public faith which could not be broken without casting a slur on the House of Commons. He begged to move for any further Correspondence on the subject that could be produced.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of any further Correspondence between the Architects and the First Commissioner of Works relative to the competition for the New National Gallery,"—(Mr. Goldsmid.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GREGORY said, that his grief, though not less profound, was much wider in its scope than that of his hon. Friend who had just sat down. He was grieved for the architects, for the judges, for the trustees of the National Gallery, and, above all, for the public, who were the real sufferers on the occasion. The public had been scandalized and astonished at the awkwardness, weakness, vacillation, and unbusiness-like manner with which this question of the National Gallery had been treated. He gave the fullest credit to the right hon. Gentleman the late Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper) for what he did whilst in office as regards the parks; but he was, at the same time, prepared to criticize in no light manner the way in which that right hon. Gentleman had dealt with this unfortunate Gallery. His right hon. Friend was entirely responsible for the patchwork, the incertitude, the useless and mischievous procrastinations which attended the efforts of the late Government to build a gallery to hold the national paintings. The lame, unbusiness-like mode of proceeding had caused the dissatisfaction of the architects, of which his hon. Friend complained with so much justice. The origin and foundation of the whole misfortune dated from the time when the right hon. Gentleman asked Parliament for £16,000 to patch up the existing National Gallery. His right hon. Friend was perfectly inexcusable on that occasion. He must have known perfectly well that even after the old building was thoroughly patched up, it could not contain the half of the pictures which were down at Kensington, and which Parliament had decided should not remain there. He must have known that a Committee of the House of Commons had reported that the drawings of the Old Masters which were in the British Museum should be placed alongside of the pictures of the Great Masters in the National Gallery; and that even after the patching had been finished, a vast number of fine pictures would still have to be hung so high as to be invisible. He must have known that, apart from these things, the rate at which pictures were annually increasing would soon make it a hopeless task to accommodate them in the present building. Forgetful, however, of all such considerations, his right hon. Friend came down to the House and proposed that £16,000 should be spent—or rather thrown into the fire. He blamed his right hon. Friend for this procedure, inasmuch as it was fraught with mischief and opposed by every non-official person who took an interest in these subjects. The mischief done was not merely the loss of the money. When the House of Commons agreed to the expenditure of large sums, and when it saw nothing but miserable and inadequate fruits of that expenditure, it naturally became suspicious, and unwilling for the future to spend the public money upon such undertakings. He must acknowledge as a rule the House was not unwilling to spend money either in the purchase of works of art and science, or for the proper housing of such collections; but it required that the plans submitted to it should be complete and explicit. He came now to the second stage of the subject. The House, after careful and minute deliberation, expressed its deliberate opinion that the National Gallery should be in Trafalgar Square; and ten different architects were requested to prepare plans. But what did his right hon. Friend the late Commissioner do? Did he give these architects any regular instructions as to the accommodation that would be wanted in the new building, or the requirements which were absolutely necessary? Nothing of the kind. He merely gave them some general hints with respect to the proper hanging of the pictures, and other self-evident propositions. Where he was really careful in his instructions was in the matter of dust-bins, closets for brooms, retiring rooms, and lavatories—into these topics he threw himself with great strength and animation. Had the right hon. Gentleman communicated with the Trustees of the National Gallery, they would have informed him of the real requisites for such a building; and he in his turn would have been able to have communicated to the architects specific details of what was wanted. The Trustees would have told him that a hall was required for the Cartoons of Raphael, which they hoped would come there eventually; that rooms for the exhibition of the drawings in the British Museum would be wanted; that small rooms for cabinet pictures, and a gallery for works on loan would be required. Besides this, the national portraits, and an art library would have a claim; and yet not one of these things was mentioned to the architects, who were consequently left entirely in the dark. The consequence might be imagined. When people worked in the dark, their work was necessarily incomplete, and did not do them that credit which under happier auspices their talents must command. Everybody had remarked the superiority of the plans of the new Courts of Justice over those of the new National Gallery; and this merely arose from the architects having proper instructions and details as to the requirements of the building placed before them. Had that been done in the case of the National Gallery, they would not have had wild schemes for taking in the antiquities of the British Museum, and other such nonsense laid before them. This was not the only just complaint which the architects might put forward. They were told by the right hon. Gentleman in words that one of them should be chosen to build the new Gallery, whereas the only document in the Office of Works went precisely to the contrary effect—namely, that there was no engagement to employ either them or their designs. He trusted that the present noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works would not lose an hour in getting the matter satisfactorily settled. The whole matter was now in his own hands; and he should propose a definite scheme which the House should abide by. He would recommend to the noble Lord to commence de novo, and to have a completely new building. It was impossible to do anything with the present structure. Above all, let them lose no more time;

but let them look forward to some reasonable and definite period when they would have a National Gallery worthy of the nation. At the present moment it was a discredit to the country. There was no difficulty in the House of Commons; the difficulty lay elsewhere. He was perfectly convinced that if the noble Lord would take the matter resolutely in hand he would succeed, and would deserve the thanks of every one for having at last settled this vexed question.

MR. COWPER said, he agreed with his hon. Friend who had just sat down, that a lamentable amount of vacillation and change of purpose had been shown in connection with the question of the National Gallery; but he entirely dissented from the view that this had been occasioned by any act of the Executive Government. Any one who remembered the various proceedings in this matter would agree that the vacillation and delay had, on the contrary, arisen from the question having been taken out of the hands of the Government. Committees of the House had made contradictory recommendations, and Members interested in the subject had combined against each successive proposal, and the Executive Government had not been allowed to dispose of the question. His hon. Friend among others had assisted in this result by his Motions with reference to the removal of our works of art to the West End of London. [MR. GREGORY: I never made a Motion in my life upon the matter.] If his hon. Friend had not himself made Motions he had at least made effective speeches upon the Motions of other people. His hon. Friend had traced the commencement of the present misfortunes to the sum of £16,000 which some seven years ago he (Mr. Cowper) had proposed to expend upon the National Gallery. He must remind his hon. Friend that the expenditure of that sum in the formation of a central gallery, which at the present day remained the only really good portion of the building, had probably saved to the country the bequest of Mr. Turner. According to the terms of that bequest, the Courts of Law held that the pictures were given to the Crown on condition that they should be collected together in one gallery, and if this room had not been added, the exhibition of the Turner pictures could only have been obtained by the removal of other works which ought to be shown to the public. His hon. Friend said that the time at which that vote was granted was the time when the Government should have come forward with a Motion for the settlement of this question. But if an attempt had been made to solve the question, then it would not have been solved as now. The feeling of the House was not then ripe for arriving at a decision. Government proposed what certainly would have been an excellent arrangement — that a picture gallery should be erected on the site of Burlington House — but this was not agreed to. The proposal the Government then made was free from the grand difficulty that had spoilt the recent designs, that of designing a building of great beauty and dignity, fit to adorn Trafalgar Square, and worthy of the architectural taste and skill of the present generation, and also specially adapted for the exhibition of pictures. It would be difficult to design a building of sufficient elevation to prevent its being crushed by the Nelson monument and the spire of St. Martin's Church, and yet without any rooms over the galleries, which must be lit through the roof. These opposite conditions could not be combined without difficulty. If the architects were to consider only what was suitable for the exhibition of pictures, they would conclude that a low building would be the best. Picture galleries were properly lighted through the roof, and not by side windows, the light through the ceiling being diffused more equally, and falling upon the pictures without producing glitter or reflection. Lighting from the roof was, moreover, advantageous in allowing the whole of the walls to be utilized for hanging the pictures, which could not be done where there were side windows. A low building, then, would be best for the purposes of the pictures; but it would lack that dignity and impressiveness which proceeded from lofty architectural proportions. Another problem requiring solution was so to arrange the interior that it would be well adapted for the reception of the crowds of holiday makers who flocked there at particular periods of the year, and who should be allowed to circulate freely through the building, and also for producing the repose and concentration of mind required for the study of art. Another problem was which was the best form of gallery, and this had not yet been decided. Still another was the best mode of appropriating a very irregular piece of ground. It was necessary to purchase the ground immediately behind the National Gallery from the parochial authorities. But this space was of a most irregular character, one of the sides being 230 feet in length and another only 170. The ground acquired by purchase was one-and-a-half acres which, taken in conjunction with one acre covered by the present building, would be amply sufficient for any building at present required to be erected, but the collection might so increase that it might be hereafter necessary to enlarge the building. Should such be the case they could acquire one-and-a-half acres more from the barrack-yard at the back, provided they found another and a suitable site for the one taken. The late Government thought the best way of solving the problem was to invite a limited number of architects carefully to consider the best way of overcoming all these difficulties and of obtaining the best building. Some gentlemen thought it would be better to throw the competition open to all the world, and that those competing should not receive remuneration. But from that view he entirely dissented. He thought the best men and the most experienced and skilled would not be likely to give their time and study to this question had they not been provided with the means to cover the expenses of their design. That view was fortified by the fact that out of the twelve architects who accepted the invitation, two had not sent in designs. This probably arose from pressure of business and unwillingness to undertake labour without remuneration. There had been no want of definiteness in the instructions, so far as the necessary conditions were concerned. With regard to the Courts of Justice, the number of courts and the number of rooms that would be required had been previously determined. But in the case of the National Gallery the number of rooms was not settled, and the size of the rooms and the mode of lighting the galleries were left to the discretion of the competing architects, except that the galleries were not to be less than fifty feet in width. They were told that the space on the map given to them was to be covered, and they were to make their arrangements accordingly. He thought that if the architects had been limited to a definite number of rooms, and the size of them, they would have had cause of complaint on the ground of being unnecessarily restricted. The collection of drawings at the British Museum, and the cartoons at Hampton Court, might some day be added to the National Gallery. It was not known whether all the pictures vested in the trustees would be exhibited in the National Gallery. He thought that those pictures of the modern masters which were of acknowledged merit, and were of historical interest as illustrating the progress of art, should be selected and placed apart to represent the British school. But modern pictures of inferior merit ought not to be exhibited with the ancient masters. The competing architects could not have been informed what number of pictures would be exhibited in the Gallery. He could not agree in the opinion which had been expressed that this competition had not been of great use. He thought that materials had been collected which would pave the way to an ultimate decision, and he hoped the time had arrived when this delay and vacillation would come to a close. He felt confident that the solution of the question had been greatly assisted, and not retarded, by the course adopted last year, and he thought it would be competent to the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works to propose a measure which would meet with the general approbation of the House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the architects had come forward as feeling themselves ill-used by the judges and by the Office of Works, because not one of them had been selected by the judges for the performance of the work. As himself one of the Committee of Advice named by the First Commissioner, commonly called the judges, he traversed the assertion. The architects, indeed, contended that some pledge had been given them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford, at that time First Commissioner of Works, without which they would not have engaged in the competition. But the noble Lord the present First Commissioner of Works had not only found no such pledge among the records of his office, but he had found documentary proof that the contrary was the fact. The judges at the outset determined not to proceed without further instructions given to themselves in writing. They had before them the instructions given to the architects, which they certainly found to be very vague. In the first place, the architects were told that they would have to combine the "requirements of a picture gallery with proper architectural effects," a very proper condition, but one which architects worthy of the name would have foreseen for themselves. Then, the paper was filled with a variety of details about closets, the keeper's lodging, until the galleries themselves were summed up in a few meaningless generalities. Moreover, all the competitors were misled with the virtual promise of obtaining the site of the barracks, which as now appeared was highly improbable. Finally, they were told that the First Commissioner "would not engage himself to adopt any of the designs sent in," "but if any of the designs be adopted," the instructions ran, the designer of the selected plan would be employed "to carry it into effect." The House would clearly see that the whole matter turned on an "if" and on an "it." Having considered the instructions framed for the architects, the Committee were, as he said, at a loss what to do, and consulted the First Commissioner of Works, who concluded his reply as follows:—

"Adverting to the last paragraph of the instructions to architects, the judges will be at liberty, should they think fit, to refrain from recommending any one of the competing designs for adoption by the Government."

The Committee proceeded to act upon this, and, although they found in the designs, as they specifically stated in their Report, much merit, it was apparent that those difficulties and the incompleteness of the instructions were too much for the competitors, and that they had, accordingly, broken down. The Committee reporting accordingly, said—

"While we readily acknowledge the architectural skill shown by the competitors, and the meritorious manner in which many of the difficulties of these requirements have been met, we are bound to say, after full and mature deliberation, that we are not prepared to recommend any one individual design for adoption by your Lordship."

The only blame conveyed by that sentence was that the architects had not shown themselves superior to an impossibility; they had not succeeded in making their bricks without straw. The Committee concluded their Report on the designs by naming two gentlemen, one of whom, Mr. Edward Barry, had produced the best design for a new gallery, and the other, Mr. Murray, the best adaptation of the existing gallery. That, he contended, was all that could be expected of the Committee, since they were not an incorporated body of judges, armed with the powers conferred by an Act of Parliament, as were the five gentlemen appointed to report on the designs for the Law Courts. The responsibility of a final decision rested on the shoulders of the First Commissioner of Works, whom the Special Committee had been simply appointed to advise. No one it was clear could blame him if he called in one of those two gentlemen. Upon the possible decision of the Commissioners somehow oozing out, dissatisfaction was expressed by the architects, who met together and communicated with the late Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper), thereupon he wrote to Mr. Austin, the Secretary of the Board of Works, saying—

"A rumour has reached me that the judges appointed are not disposed to perform the duty expected of them by deciding which of the competing designs is the best."

That was evidently written under a misapprehension as to what the duty of the Commissioners was. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded in his letter to say—

"The expectation held out to architects to induce them to compete has always been that an impartial decision would be made and published between the competing designs, and that the successful competitor would be engaged as the architect of the building, even though the identical design was not adopted."

The instructions to the architects, however, made no such announcement. On the contrary, the House would observe the peculiar inconsistency which exists between these statements, and the instructions on which they profess to be based. These instructions saved the First Commissioner from the obligation of adopting any of the "designs;" but if he did so, the author was to be employed to carry "it"—namely, that design—not some other one by the same architect—into effect. Now, the right hon. Gentleman repudiated the adoption of the "identical design," and only urged the employment of its author. This was the wiser idea; but it was distinctly not the idea of 1866. The right hon. Gentleman concluded as follows:—

"But, whatever the First Commissioner may ultimately determine as to the selection of the architect of the National Gallery, I think he ought at once to explain to the judges, if he should not have already done so, that it is their duty to declare the winner of the race even though they may form a low opinion of the running; and that they would inflict a heavy and undeserved professional stigma upon these architects, if they were to declare themselves unable to make an award."

Now, he did not pretend to be as horsey as his right hon. Friend, still he could not

subscribe to this declaration, inasmuch as the adoption of the course he recommended would have led to passing on the competitors a most undeserved professional stigma. The Committee had dealt more generously with the architects. The right hon. Gentleman wanted the judges to declare that the running had been excessively bad, but that they were yet bound to declare the winner; the judges, however, declared that the running had been altogether creditable, but that, as the Jockey Club, represented by the late Commissioner of Works, had drawn up such an impossible set of conditions, the judges were bound to decide that the race was null and void. He noticed that the architects who memorialized the First Commissioner of Works on the subject had made use of one adjective which was a little too strong. They said in their final letter—

"We agreed to enter the competition on the distinct understanding with your Lordship's predecessor, the right hon. W. Cowper, that one of the competing architects would be selected for employment; and we most respectfully represent to your Lordship that a contrary course would be a breach of faith with us, and would confer a lasting injury upon every one of the competitors."

While not at all demurring to the general tone of this remonstrance from the architects' point of view, he must say that, from all the facts of the case, he was bound to conclude that there was nothing "distinct" about the arrangement at all; everything was left in an hypothetical condition; everything was in haze and confusion; but he hoped that the architects would not be damaged by this slight over-statement. The fact was the judges found entanglement, contradictions, and delusive expectations from the beginning to the end of the case, and they made the best Report in their power, leaving the ultimate decision to the First Commissioner, as their duty required of them. He hoped that the Minister would profit by the experience of the past in regard to that matter; that the instructions issued with reference to it to the fortunate man should be clear and precise; and that the bargain made with the architect, both financially and artistically, should be definite and intelligible. Finally, there must be no tinkering; no patching up of the present building. Not only was it bad as a whole, not only since the ill-starred destruction of the central hall was it totally wanting in internal dignity; but the general arrangement, which created a false ground floor up steps upon the real second story was singularly inconvenient. It must come down, and a new gallery rise, and then they might hope to have a building in which their pictures would be housed well, and which would also be an ornament to the metropolis, and an honour to the nation.

MR. TITE said, that as one of those who had been called in to act as judges in respect to these designs he wished to make a few remarks. There could, he thought, be no doubt that the competition invited by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper) was intended to be a competition which should end in the selection for employment of one of the architects taking part in it. It was true £200 a piece was paid to the architects, and it was a condition that the drawings of all kinds should be the property of the Government. But it could not be supposed that men of such professional standing entered into that competition merely to obtain a paltry sum of £200, which would hardly pay for the paper and the framing and glazing of their drawings. It certainly would not remunerate them for their office expenses. No doubt it was fully meant that the most successful man should get the prize. Notwithstanding what had unfortunately occurred, there was no reason why that could not be carried out now. The judges reported that the design of Mr. Barry was the best for a new National Gallery, and that of Mr. Murray for the alteration of the existing one. He did not quite agree with the latter view, being in a minority with his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke on that point, and he hoped the Government, to whom the matter was now relegated, would take the matter anew into consideration. The question with respect to the Royal Academy was in course of solution by the happy suggestion of Sir Francis Grant and the adoption of Burlington House, and the result as to that would, he trusted, be satisfactory to the country. But the question in reference to the National Gallery had been pending for many years, and it was now high time that something decisive should be done. He hoped the Government would really take the matter into their serious consideration. It was idle attempting to patch up the old building or trying to turn it into anything that would be creditable to the nation. Any attempt of the kind would neither be wise nor economical. Let them take down the present Gallery, and erect a new one which would be an honour to the country. The proper course for the Government to pursue, he (Mr. Tite) would venture to propose, would be to take into their counsels the Council of the National Gallery, the President of the Royal Academy, and architect who were competent to advise them. But if the discussions of late years were to be continued, none of them would live to see anything whatever done in this matter. The drawings sent in by the competing architects were drawings of eminent beauty and excellent as works of high art; but he could not, under the circumstances, do otherwise than join with those who did not think them fitted for a National Gallery. If what he and his associates had suggested were well carried out, they would have a good gallery, creditable to the nation. There might be difficulties experienced in building a new gallery in consequence of the great irregularity of the site; but the difficulties would disappear in the hands of a competent architect with the guidance he would obtain in the way suggested.

LORD ELCHO said, that as a Member of the Committee which sat on these designs, he had no complaint to make of the tone of the present discussion. No criticism had been passed on the decision of the Committee, which was supposed on the whole to have decided pretty rationally and well, according to its lights and to the instructions it received. But though he was a Member of the Committee which sat upon those designs he was likewise a Member of the House of Commons, and could not refrain from remarking that his hon. Friend had implied that there would be a breach of faith on the part of some one unless one of those professional gentlemen was employed. He looked back at the printed instructions issued to the architects, and it appeared quite clear to him that there was no understanding come to with them that any one of them should be employed. They were asked whether they were prepared to send in designs according to the instructions, and those instructions stated that the First Commissioner of Works did not engage to adopt any of the designs which might be sent in, but that if any one of them was adopted, the author of it would be employed. [Mr. GOLDSMID said, he referred to a letter that was afterwards written.] That letter came a year later, or in 1867 instead of in 1866, and when the architects received the instructions, saying that the First Commissioner of Works would not hold himself bound to adopt any of the designs, they ought to have taken objection then, and not afterwards. There was no ground, therefore, for alleging that there had been a breach of faith towards them on the part of the Government. With regard to the general question, he much regretted the position in which it stood. Where the blame lay it was not for him to say. Sometimes one heard that it was due to the House of Commons, and at other times to the Executive, but he was disposed to think it rested with both. The erection of a new gallery at Burlington House would have been the best solution of the question. The position, however, in which the matter now stood was this:—it had been determined the pictures should remain in Trafalgar Square. They had a gallery which he might almost say was discreditable to the nation, and every one felt that it ought to be removed and a proper building erected. If he were in his noble Friend's (Lord John Manners) place, he should be inclined to ask those two gentlemen who had been recommended by the Committee as having shown the most talent and produced the best designs, whether they were willing to try their hands again, and send in designs both for the adaptation of the old and the erection of a new building. He did not think that it would be wise to decide on sweeping away that which we had and to incur a larger expenditure, unless we saw the designs of the new building in black and white. He would therefore suggest that the architects should be invited to send in alternative designs, the one relating to the adaptation of that which was already in existence, the other to the erection of a new building. If it were found that anyone of the designs for a new building was such as to justify a larger outlay for that purpose, by all means let it be adopted; but if not, perhaps it would be better to take up some minor scheme.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not imagine that any public officer could be held to have pledged the country to incur a great expense before he had seen the plans and designs which the architects were about to send in—while they were yet in nubibus. That would virtually be buying "a pig in a poke"—a course which that House would, he felt sure, never approve. There was no doubt that some of the designs which had already been sent in possessed considerable merit; but there was not one of them which he should like to see adopted for a National Gallery. This idea of a National Gallery was that the style of architecture should be chaste and plain, and that the proportions should be good, without any attempt being made at the picturesque. The chief faults of these designs were, that there was not among them a good sound general design for such a building. Some of them contained reproductions of particular parts of cathedrals and castles of different character, and there was observable a remarkable profusion of ornament. A building which was overloaded with ornament was spoiled. Such was the fault of the new Foreign Office. What a building ought to show was perfect proportion of all the parts, and adaptation to the purposes for which it was intended. There was a palace erected at Vicenza, by Palladio, with his usual pure taste, to which another architect had subsequently added a great many ornaments; but it was admitted by every one who was competent to judge of such matters, that the original beauty of the building was, as a consequence, greatly impaired. It should also be borne in mind that extensive ornamentation involved enormous expense, and he trusted no such false principle would be adopted in the new designs for a National Gallery. He might point to the Banqueting House at Whitehall as a building the outlines of which were of great beauty, although it was somewhat overlaid with ornament, and he should suggest that that simplicity of style afforded the best model for imitation.

MR. COWPER said, he wished to explain that the only object which he had in view in inviting tenders from the twelve architects in question was to ascertain which of them was possessed of the greatest skill for erecting such a building as was required. In the conversation which had incidentally taken place between him and one of those architects, he had stated it to be his intention to engage the services of whoever might turn out to be the most successful. He did not deem it necessary to make a formal memorandum of that conversation for the office, nor had he been asked by any of the architects to put it into a formal shape.

CAPTAIN GRIDLEY said, he thought the difficulty which had arisen might be solved if the noble Lord (Lord John Mannere) would return the whole of their present plans and specifications to the competing architects. He might then give them an opportunity of preparing others in an amended form, from which the plan most satisfactory might be selected. He thought the Government would not be dealing fairly with the other architects if they did not give them all an opportunity of remodelling their plans. This would be the fairest arrangement, and he hoped the noble Lord would take it into his consideration. He was sure the House would not grudge the necessary expense.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that although it was true that in the multitude of counsellors there was safety, if he were called upon to come to an immediate decision he should feel rather bewildered with the various suggestions which had been made in the course of the discussion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down recommended that all the competing architects should be invited to re-model their plans, try again, and, as a consequence, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should provide a sum of money to remunerate them for their trouble. Other hon. Gentlemen had been good enough to make other suggestions of quite another character. Therefore, whatever course he might ultimately adopt, it must fail to give satisfaction to some. He wished to express the obligations he felt towards the Gentlemen who had been kind enough to accept the office of judges. They had rendered the public a great service, at no little inconvenience and annoyance to themselves. Not only had they come to a right decision, but their judgment was ratified by public opinion and by the opinion of the House, as elicited during the discussion. The recommendations inserted in their Report were extremely valuable, and they would tend to render the building which might ultimately be erected far more satisfactory than it would have been without them. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory), he could not concur with his hon. Friend in thinking that there was any immediate pressure. The ground on which the gallery was to be erected, was not yet in the possession of the Government. The Bill enabling them to acquire that ground now stood for second reading; but, in all probability, a year and a half more must elapse before the ground itself would be in the possession of the Government; therefore, there was no such immediate hurry in the matter. The discussion which had just taken place showed how very various were still the views of those most competent to express an opinion on the subject. It would be a very rash proceeding on his part if, at the close of such a discussion, he was to jump up and state what he intended to do—that he would recommend the Government to take this or that particular course. One thing which had been suggested had occurred to him before, and he intended to act in accordance with it. It had been proposed that the Trustees of the National Gallery should be consulted more than they had been as to the practical requirements of the building. He intended to put himself in communication with the trustees; and when they should have informed him on those practical requirements, the Government would be in a better position to judge of the whole question. He hoped that, with the assistance already received from the judges' Report, and the further assistance which they would receive from the Trustees of the National Gallery, the Government would be in a position before long to recommend the adoption of some sensible and practical course on the subject. With respect to the very complicated and unsatisfactory position of the competing architects, he thought he should best discharge his duty by saying nothing on that point. The judges who had spoken had expressed very plainly their view of the duties imposed on them; and he did not find that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) very much differed from the opinions which those judges had expressed on that matter. After what had occurred he did not think it necessary to rake up the past, or to re-open healed-up sores. He had every confidence that the course which the Government might take would not lead to heartburnings in the future. He hoped that the building which would be erected after so much consideration would be worthy its purpose and meet with the approval of the country.

• THE JEWS IN SERVIA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he wished to ask the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), whether the communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Servia afforded any hope of an improved treatment by the latter of its Jewish subjects? He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) regretted that he had not received the information on which his Question was founded before the late debate on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory.) He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) hoped, however, that for two reasons he should be considered justified in bringing this matter forward. In the first place, everything had now an interest which bore upon the relations of the Turkish Government with its non-Mahomedan subjects. In the second place, although as a general rule he was opposed to discussions in that House on the internal affairs of Foreign States, yet this was not a case in which an expression of opinion by the Government of England or by Members of Parliament could be considered, either in the English or French sense of the word, as officious. By the Treaty of Paris the independence of Servia, subject to the suzerainty of the Porte, was guaranteed by England in common with other Powers; and therefore they had a right to expect that the conditions upon which that guarantee had been given should be observed. The 28th Article of the Treaty was in these terms—

“The Principality of Servia shall continue to hold of the Sublime Porte in conformity with the Imperial hatts which fix and determine its rights and immunities, placed henceforward under the collective guarantee of the contracting Powers. In consequence the said Principality shall preserve its independent and national administration, as well as full liberty of worship, of legislation, of commerce, and of navigation.”

The House would observe that liberty of worship in the Principality was here expressly stipulated for. But the Greek Christians of Servia appeared to understand by this, liberty of worship for the majority; while the Jews, who were a minority, were now subjected to vexatious restrictions, not only as regarded worship, but also in respect to their mode of living and the occupations which they carried on. Jews had been settled in Servia since the 15th century, when they had been expelled from Spain. During the Government of the Turks they seemed to have been subject to no special hardship, nor whilst Servia was passing from the complete dominion of the Turks to that modified independence which she had now attained. For more than twenty years after 1815 Prince Milosch bore a principal part in the government of Servia. He did not, indeed, appear to have been wholly free from the taint of semi-barbarism; but, at the same time, he was firmly impressed with notions of religious freedom, and during his time the Jews had little cause to complain. In 1842 another dynasty was substituted, and shortly afterwards there was published a decree which was extremely hostile to the Jews. In March, 1856, the Treaty of Paris, containing the stipulation already referred to, was concluded. Yet in October of the same year a decree passed the Servian Senate confirming the previous proscription against the Jews. In September, 1859, Prince Milosch was restored, and he issued an edict declaring that no inhabitant of Servia, whatever his nationality or religion, should be prevented from settling where he pleased, or from devoting himself to commerce or any profession he might choose. In 1861, however, after the death of Prince Milosch, a change took place, and a law was enacted permitting Jewish subjects, who had settled in the interior, to continue to carry on their businesses in the localities where they were domiciled, but prohibiting them from entering into new undertakings. It also prohibited their children from succeeding to their fathers' occupations, and forbade the entrance of new Jewish settlers. Its terms were—

“Art. 1. All Jewish subjects of Servia, who in virtue of the law of September 1859 have settled in the interior of the country, or who may settle there between this day and the 28th of February, 1861 (the date fixed for the coming into force of the law which forbids any further accession to the number of Jews inhabiting the interior), and who have established, or who may establish, a trading business there, are allowed to continue their residence and their business, but only in the localities in which they are domiciled. Art. 2. Israelites inhabiting Servia, who up to the present time have been engaged in retail trade only, who have not been manufacturers, and who have not sold articles of food, shall not in future be allowed to commence either of the two last-mentioned businesses within any part of the Servian territory. Art. 3. The right of sojourning in Servia, and of carrying on trade in the country, shall be enjoyed exclusively by such Israelites as shall be settled in the country previous to the 28th of February, 1861; they only are allowed to carry on business, or to exercise a profession. This right is not transmissible to their heirs.”

The 4th Article related to the liberty of trade, and it forbade the Jews to trade in houses or lands in the interior, without special authorization, under penalty of the application of the law of the 30th of October, 1856. Some hon. Members had, in conversation with him, expressed a doubt whether such a law as he had just read could really have been passed; but he could assure them that it was not only genuine, but was being enforced with increasing rather than with relaxed rigour. If these things were to be ascribed to religious bigotry, they might call to mind the language which the great Spanish novelist put into the mouth of Sancho Panza. "I am an honest man," says Sancho, "and a Christian whose fathers were Christians before him. I hate Jews mortally. What more is necessary in order to deserve eternal happiness?" He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) was certain, however, that he might venture to inform the Servians that Sancho's doctrine was not that of Western Europe in the latter half of the 19th century. But further, he was assured, and he believed the Government had received similar assurances, that to ascribe the treatment of the Servian Jews to religious bigotry would be to give the Servians greater credit than they deserved. Their conduct really originated in a jealousy of Jewish traders, who either from being more clever in business, or from being contented with smaller profits than their competitors, were able to supply the Servian peasants with the necessities they required on cheaper terms than their rivals. It was thus self-interest which was clothing itself in the garb of religious zeal—a kind of hypocrisy more contemptible than bigotry, if it could not be more mischievous. Great distress had been suffered by a number of Jews through the bombardment of Belgrade, their houses being situated almost under the guns of the fortress; and though the Servian Government might not be responsible for that bombardment, it was their oppressive measures which had obliged a large number of Jews to reside in that quarter of the town, and by interfering with their means of livelihood had reduced them to destitution. The exhibition of such intolerance ought to be well considered by those who wished this country to forego its old Eastern policy. The testimony of the hon. Members for Southwark and Bridgewater (Mr. Layard and Mr. Kinglake), of Viscount Strangford (a nobleman who it was to be regretted did not oftener give to the House of Lords and the country the benefit of his intimate knowledge of the East), and of other gentlemen best acquainted with Turkey, went to show that while our own notions of toleration nowhere existed in that country, the Mahomedans were much less inclined to oppress the Christians and Jews than the Greek Christians were to oppress all who differed from them, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics, Jews or Mahomedans. Persecution would not be diminished by giving independence to the Christians; but its direction would simply be changed, and its virulence and intensity probably increased. Those semi-barbarians, reversing the maxim of the Roman poet, had learnt from the oppression which they had endured no other lesson than this, how best to avail themselves of the first opportunity of inflicting similar oppression upon others. He hoped the Servians would be made to understand that they would receive no further sympathy from England unless they conceded to others the rights which they were ready enough to claim for themselves. He acknowledged with gratitude the friendly remonstrances which had been offered by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) and by his predecessors in office. He did not call upon the Government to take any action in this question beyond persevering in that course; but he hoped that the discussion of the subject in the British House of Commons would have a moral effect. He expressed a confident hope that the noble Lord would be found ready to offer again words of friendly, though earnest, remonstrance on behalf of the unfortunate class whose case he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had brought to the attention of the House.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs and Her Consul General in Servia, respecting the condition and treatment of the Jews of that Principality,"—(Sir Francis Goldsmid,)

—instead thereof.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, the hon. Baronet might be certain of the sympathy of the House in the matter he had brought under its notice. Having taken some interest in the country to which the statement referred, he (Mr. Darby Griffith) should be the last to excuse any such persecution as that described. Interested as the hon. Baronet was in this subject, if he had remained up to a recent period ignorant of the facts, others might be excused for not being acquainted with them. Certainly he was taken very much by surprise. He should have hoped that those who had suffered persecution as the Servians had would have learnt a lesson of mercy; but the perversity of human nature taught exactly the opposite lesson. We had acquired a moral right to offer a remonstrance in this case to anything we conceived opposed to the principles of humanity. That rested upon the Treaty of Paris, and upon the part we had taken on all occasions with the greatest impartiality to introduce peace and comfort into those countries which were partially under the Turkish rule, and partially emancipated from it. While, however, he condemned the conduct which had been described, he could not fail to notice that the hon. Baronet had spoken of no flagrant cases of oppression, and no doubt what had occurred was attributable to trade jealousy. He could not refrain from expressing his opinion that throughout the whole of the negotiations in reference to Servia the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley) had displayed extreme tact and judgment.

Mr. GREGORY said, he thought his hon. Friend had acted perfectly right in bringing before the House the wrongs of his co-religionists, and he was sorry to hear the statement that had been made. It was a grievous thing that the noble and gallant people who had for so many years been engaged in a conflict for liberty themselves should have been so oblivious of the causes of that conflict as to oppress a race of people within their borders solely on the ground of religion. The Jews, wherever they settled, were a quiet and orderly people, turning their attention to trade, and engaging in no intrigues. He hoped that this discussion would meet the eyes of the wise and liberal Prince who governed Servia, feeling confident that he would take the matter into his consideration, and show his people that the sympathy of Europe with the Christians in the East extended to every race of people whatever their religion who suffered on account of their religion. A favourable opportunity was now presented for interference on our part. The Prince of Servia in the course of a very few days would be in Constantinople, and it might be possible for our representative at the Sublime Porte to lay before his Highness what transpired this evening. If that were done he felt certain, from what he knew of the character of the Prince, that a complaint so well founded would not be allowed to go long unremedied.

Lord STANLEY: I have no objection

whatever to lay upon the table the papers for which the hon. Baronet asks. They will contain all the information that exists, or, at any rate, that is in our possession on this question. As these papers will shortly be before the public there is less reason for me to trouble the House at any length. The hon. Baronet has adverted to the most material features of the question, and I believe that his statement is fair and accurate. I am quite sure that the feeling of the House will be unanimous in cordially and sincerely sympathising with the object he has in view. I quite agree that we have a moral right to give advice to the government and people of Servia. I should not rest that right so much on the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris. I think we may fairly rest it upon the efforts which not England alone, but Europe collectively, has made on behalf of the Servians in order to remove that foreign occupation of Belgrade which was the constant and fruitful cause of irritation and annoyance. I can only confirm what has been stated by the hon. Baronet as to the laws now in force in Servia regulating and restricting the occupations of the Jewish community; and I do not think that the hon. Baronet has characterized those laws in terms which are too strong for the occasion. I am afraid it is impossible to deny that the conduct of the Servian people in regard to the Jewish community residing amongst them has been utterly unworthy of a people who reasonably and justly aspire to take their place amongst the civilized communities of Europe. I say the conduct of the Servian people, rather than the Servian Government, because, if I am not misinformed, it is much more a case of popular prejudice and popular bigotry than any intentional impolicy on the part of the Government. I believe that the Government will be willing to do what is fair and reasonable in this matter if they are assured that they can do so without coming too strongly into conflict with popular prejudices. The existence of these prejudices is the more discreditable, because the Servians ought to remember that no people have spoken more strongly on behalf of their nationality—none have shown more impatience of oppression, of anything like foreign constraint or domination—and none have appealed more freely or frequently to the general feeling of Europe on behalf of Christian races than themselves. I think this discussion, however short it may be, will do good. A state like Servia—a half-civilized community—is always peculiarly sensitive to European opinions, and I think in that respect also the publication of the papers will be useful. The influence of the British Government, whatever that influence may be, has been exerted, and will for the future be exerted in Servia, and we hope everywhere else, in the cause of toleration and humanity. We must, of course, do this not dictatorially, but unobtrusively and quietly. Above all, we must not suppose that in a day we can overcome the rooted prejudices of years. For my own part, I have great confidence, not so much in diplomatic representations, as in the pressure of general European opinion, which as nations come more and more into contact with each other is brought to bear on every community and every people. With regard to the suggestion which the hon. Gentleman opposite has thrown out, that of taking the opportunity of the visit of the Prince of Servia to Constantinople, I think it is very judicious. I might suggest that any memorial or representation from the Jewish community, either of Servia or of Europe at large, will receive the support of the British Ambassador.

MR. LAYARD said, he cordially agreed with everything that had fallen from the noble Lord. During the time he was at the Foreign Office, the hon. Baronet and that distinguished philanthropist Sir Moses Montefiore were constantly in communication with him on the subject of the ill-treatment of the Jews in Servia; but his hon. Friend with great good taste and good feeling was unwilling to bring the question before the House of Commons, hoping always that the representations which, by the direction of the Foreign Office, were made to the Servian Government by the British Consul General would have the desired effect. Unfortunately his hon. Friend had been disappointed, and the only resource left to him was to bring the matter under the notice of the House. He quite agreed in the opinion that the publicity of this discussion would have its effect in Servia in removing the vexatious and unjust laws and restrictions affecting the Jews. The Jews in the East formed a much larger community than perhaps the House was aware of. When banished from Spain by the bigotry of that country, they took refuge in large numbers in Turkey, and they had always been treated by the Turks with considerable fairness and moderation. In Constantinople there were many Jews, several of whom had risen to great wealth and influence, and had been employed by the Turkish Government. The great enemies of the Jews in Turkey were not the Mahomedans but the Christians. The animosity did not arise from the competition in trade, but depended mainly upon bigotry. His impression was that Jews were practically unable to reside in Greece on account of the persecution and ill-treatment to which they were subjected. Such was the persecution of Jews by the Christians in Turkey, that during Easter week they were obliged to keep within their houses, for if they ventured into the streets they would run the risk of being murdered. That was even the case in Smyrna, where perhaps the most civilized Christian population of the East resided. This was really a very shocking state of things, and it was an unfortunate necessity that the only Government in the East capable of keeping order amongst the Christians and Jews was the Turkish Government. If they would go to Jerusalem in the Easter week they would find that this was perfectly true; and that Turkish troops had to be sent even into the Holy Sepulchre itself to prevent the Roman Catholics cutting the throats of the Greeks, and the Greeks from cutting the throats of the Roman Catholics. In all communities where there were Jews they were placed upon the municipal councils; and in certain provinces Jews, Christians, and Mahomedans were equally represented in those councils. He trusted that what had been said that night would go to the East; and that both Greeks and Servians would learn that they would not be supported by this country if they persecuted others because they did not agree with them in religious opinion.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE (IRELAND).—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR JOHN GRAY: Sir, the Question which I have put upon the paper is one to which I am certain the House will give its most anxious attention, as it refers to an alleged offence against the administration of justice in Ireland. This House has at all times shown the greatest anxiety that the administration of the law should not only be beyond reproach, but above suspicion. The case which I am about to bring under the notice of the House is one of such a character that it can hardly be rendered intelligible within the limits of a mere Question; and I shall, therefore, have to trespass somewhat at length upon your indulgence in order to place the House in possession of the facts which have given rise to the remarkable judgment referred to in my Question. The House will, I am sure, recognise at once that one of the highest functions which it has to discharge is to see that the laws which it assists in making are administered even-handedly as between all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The importance of having good laws made is great—inexpressibly great—but of what value are good laws if the Executive fail to administer these laws in a spirit of perfect equality, recognising no distinction of persons, but dealing out justice with an even hand to all? The complaint, which is substantially put in the form of a Question to-night, is not a complaint which comes from any disappointed suitor, or from any person who has failed to escape a punishment which he had hoped to avert. It does not come from any advocate engaged on one side or the other. It does not come in a factious form from the member of any local party. It does not come from any person who may reasonably be assumed to have a particular bias one way or another. It does not even come in the shape of a report to which any of the privileges of impunity attached to a private report belongs, and which almost amount to licence. But it comes direct from the judicial bench. It is the open, plain statement made from the judicial bench in the public court, before the assembled county, jurors and people, by one of the circuit Judges of Assize in Ireland, and in effect amounts to an assertion that justice has not been done, and that the administration of the law has been partial and one-sided. Considering that the person who makes that charge is officially commissioned by Her Majesty to pass from county to county in Ireland for the purpose of administering the laws—that he is a personage who has been for a long period conversant with the administration of the law in all its branches, who filled the offices of Solicitor General for Ireland, of Attorney General for Ireland, and who for twelve years has filled the office of one of Her Majesty's Judges in Ireland, his words will not fail to impress this House with a sense of the gravity of the case. During the whole period for which that learned Judge has occupied a seat on the judicial bench, I think hon. Gentlemen opposite as well as Gentlemen on this side of the House will admit that no complaint has ever been made with respect to the able and impartial manner in which he has discharged his duties. He is not personally unknown to this House. He long sat as a Member in this House, where he was admired for his ability, his clearness of intellect, his frankness and his readiness to deal with every subject in an impartial spirit; and when I read to the House the observations he has made in reference to the manner in which the law has been administered in one of the Northern counties of Ireland, I am sure the House will not fail to give attention to his complaint—his judicial complaint—and to deal with it in such a manner as to vindicate its own honour and satisfy the country that an impartial administration of the law will be recognised by this House as one of the first objects it has to secure for the subjects of the Queen. I feel, Sir, that I cannot put the Question better before the House than by reading the observations which were made by Mr. Justice Keogh, at the recent assizes, held at Omagh, in the county of Tyrone. These observations are somewhat long; but it is only by reading them to the House in full that I shall be able to make the important interests involved clear to the conception of the House. On the occasion to which I refer, Mr. Justice Keogh said—

"I have now been for twelve years on the bench, and never, during the course of that time, had I ever so painful a duty as now. I do not wish to be considered as sitting in judgment on the act of the magistrates who first heard this case at petty sessions, or to assert positively that they had not discharged their duty. But it will become my duty in another place to bring the facts of this case under the notice of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. He is at the head of the magistracy of the country, and it remains with him to determine who are fit and who are utterly unfit for the discharge of their important duties. I do not say to which category the magistrates who sat at Donoughmore petty sessions belong. I am sitting here to preserve the peace of the county, and it is melancholy to observe that here are two informations made by members of the constabulary force, to which nearly every Grand Jury in the country have been paying tributes, and well-merited tributes, of respect for their gallant conduct in preserving the peace of the country. The informations before me show that the peace of this Donoughmore district was disturbed at nine or ten at night by a faction to the number of 120 men who are called Protestants. I wish to God that in the discharge of my duty I had never to mention the words Catholic or Protestant. But here 120 men of this so-called Protestant party invade the district, and constable O'Neill says that he and sub-constable Thackaber followed the processionists, who were marching to the music of fifes and drums for half a mile. Then they are joined by the Castlecaulfield party, who have also fifes and drums. They are all headed by two men, one on horseback, and O'Neill asked them to stop the music. They said they would do so, and halted. The constable feared there would be a collision with the Catholic party, which, however, had not then assembled in force. Reney then came up, catches the constable by the breast, and says to the party, 'Beat on, we'll not stop drumming.' The procession then marched off towards the Cross-roads, where they were attacked by the Catholic party, who ran out of their houses when the chapel bell was tolled. These are the short facts of the riot. What follows? The case comes before the magistrates, and that intelligent constable (O'Neill) tells us that he identified six of the Protestant party, and yet not one of their names is returned in the informations of the police except Stinson Reney, who appears to have been the leader of the band, who told his party to 'beat on.' And yet, I say, he is sent here merely for committing an assault, as if everything else he did was justifiable and proper."

A gentleman, Mr. Lyle, one of the magistrates who acted in the case, and who was present, here interrupted the Judge with some observation. Judge Keogh proceeded—

"I will not hear another word, sir, on the subject. I will do my duty here fearlessly, not regarding whether these parties are Protestants or Catholics, but with regard solely to preserving the peace of the country. I have now to pass sentence on these men, but I do so, perfectly convinced that the aggressors in this case—the really guilty parties—are not before me. It is grievous and lamentable for this country, when such things can be done with impunity. The police—I am bound to say a body inadequately rewarded for their exertions in preserving the peace of this country—in this case did their duty: but I know who are wanting in this case for the interests and peace of this country."

The Judge then addressing the prisoners—and I beg the House to take particular notice of these words—said—

"Notwithstanding the deliberate attempt to keep it back, I have now before me the whole truth, and the facts of the case. It appears that you were not the originators of the riot; but I can see what party was really to blame in this transaction. I care for neither. I care not who regards the line of conduct I am adopting; for I can see where the line of strict justice should be drawn in this case. The men before me were not the instigators of this riot; but others who are absent now. If I had them here I should know how to deal with them. Justice is not to be one-sided—one-handed. Let the people of this country know it, that so far as the Judges of the land are concerned, fair and impartial justice shall be meted out to all. I take it for granted that you were all at your houses when this lawless band were among you with music and arms, and that you collected hastily to repel a superior force. The constable says your party were not so numerous as the invaders. But I wish to impress on you that you acted foolishly, nevertheless. You, by leaving your home, played their game; for had you stayed indoors, and let them play away at their party airs, you would not now be standing in the dock. Therefore, learn wisdom for the future. Keep within your houses, but watch their movements doggedly, silently, and determinedly, and when they break the laws appeal to the laws of your country, and I tell you that you will find them able to protect you. You have also the constabulary at hand for your protection. Are they not able to do so? In other places one of them has been found equal to sixty disaffected persons, and, if encouraged by those whose duty it is to do so, they can protect the well-disposed as effectually in the North as in the South. But I know not what to say if it shall happen that those in authority shall consider it necessary to make one party amenable to justice in such cases as this, and let the others escape. It is due to the law that your prisoners should be punished; still, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the sentence of the court is, that each of you be imprisoned for one calendar month, and kept to hard labour."

Now, I ask this House to remember that this is a declaration—a judicial declaration, made in open court, made before the Grand Jury of the county, made before the petty jurors of the county, made, I may say, before the whole assembled county by the representative of the Sovereign, presiding in that court to administer justice—that injustice had been done, that the guilty parties had been let off, and that the parties least guilty were transmitted for trial in such a manner as to be in danger of receiving the most severe punishment. Those who have followed me in my reading of the statement of Judge Keogh will observe that he says the parties on each side were equally identified by the constable, who appeared as a witness at the petty sessions court. As I am anxious that the whole of this case should be laid fully before the House, and that I should not hold back any mitigating circumstances, my sense of justice induces me to read the statement of Mr. Lyle, one of the magistrates who was present at the petty sessions, in which he defended the course of his brother magistrates. He occupied the chair on the occasion, and he denies that the parties were identified, though Judge Keogh said there was sufficient identification to justify informations being returned against each of the parties. Mr. Lyle said—

"They were most anxious to forward the ends of justice, but the identification of the parties alluded to by the constable (the Protestant party) so totally failed that they could not send them for trial. They were strangers, and came from another part of the country, while the others (the Catholics), being residents in the locality, were all known to the police."

That is the statement of the gentleman who avowed that he occupied a seat on the bench at the petty sessions court when one party was discharged and the other sent for trial. He admits that the charge against the two parties was the same—that is to say, for riotously and unlawfully assembling, and he defends the conduct of the bench by the assertion that the identification failed, and that because of the failure of identification, and because of that alone, the rioters were not sent for trial. This, then, is the statement—this the defence, made by one of the magistrates. Now, mark what follows. There was present in the court at the time this defence of the absence of identification was set up, the witness O'Neill; and, after hearing the assertion of Mr. Lyle, Mr. Justice Keogh called O'Neill up. He was then sworn, and gave the following testimony:—

"Constable O'Neill (to the Court)—I swore positively to Reney (Reney was one of the Protestant party), and identified him. I know him as well as any man in the dock.

Court—Did you identify any others of what is called the Protestant party?—I did, my Lord, six of them.

Court—And did you know them as well as the men in the dock?—I did, my Lord."

In dealing with this matter I have endeavoured to do so with perfect frankness, and have laid before the House the statements of both sides—the statement of the Judge, the denial of the magistrate, and the evidence of O'Neill. You have the assertion of one of the occupants of the bench of magistrates, not that the parties were not charged with the same offence, but that the offence charged was one and the same. The Catholic and the Orange parties were both before the magisterial bench at Donoughmore, charged with the offence of riotous and unlawful assemblage, and the defence set up by Mr. Lyle, on behalf of the magistrates was, that whilst O'Neill perfectly identified the Catholic party, he altogether failed in identifying the Protestant party. Thus, we have on one side the evidence on oath of the constable O'Neill that he did identify all the parties, and, on the other side, the statement of the magistrate, that there was no identification—one on oath, the other merely the assertion. Of course, I do not wish to cast any imputation upon the accuracy of the magistrate's memory; but as there is a discrepancy between his statement and O'Neill's oath, I wish to bring before the House what appears to me to be the strongest and most conclusive corroboration of the accuracy of the sworn testimony of constable O'Neill before Judge Keogh. I hold in my hand the report of the proceedings of the magistrates at the petty sessions referred to. They assembled on the 1st of October last, and six Protestants and nine Roman Catholics were placed before them, charged with a riotous assembly at Donoughmore on the 17th September. Among the witnesses examined was this very constable O'Neill, who asserted on oath in court to Mr. Justice Keogh that he had not failed to identify the Protestant party; that he knew them well, and that he identified six of them before the magistrates assembled in petty sessions. Now, before the question was raised whether Justice Keogh had made an exaggerated statement or not there was printed in the Belfast papers of the 2nd of October last a report of the proceedings. O'Neill was examined, and in the course of his examination he said "Thornberry," one of the six, "stepped forward and said he would do all he could"—that was, to stop the music and prevent the proceeding of this unlawful assembly to and through the Catholic district. The witness thus plainly identified Thornberry as one of those present, and he then identified each of the Orange party who were summoned as forming part of the assembly, the report saying "the witness here identified the Orange party who were summoned as forming part of the unlawful assembly." Not only, then, have we the fact that the names of two of the six Orangemen are given incidentally in the evidence of O'Neill—which completes the identification of these two men, but we have the general statement of the reporter that O'Neill identified every one of the six then standing in the dock. In addition to that identification, we have the testimony of his brother constable Thomas Thackaberry, who gave this evidence—

"Sub-constable Thomas Thackaberry was next examined by Mr. Moore, and corroborated the evidence of sub-constable O'Neill. Witness identified Dilworth of the Orange party, and Loughran, M'Kinney, Gillan, and Nogher of the Roman Catholic party, as forming part of the mob."

O'Neill identified every one of the six. The report published in October gives you an accurate statement of the identification, by each of these two witnesses, of all the Orange party then in the dock, as well as the whole of the Catholic party. And what was the course taken by the magistrates? Did they make any observations which indicated that they entertained doubts with regard to the accuracy of the evidence these witnesses had given, or that they thought the identification was imperfect? No such thing. On the contrary, after the case closed, the Crown prosecutor applied to those very magistrates, one of whom denied that there was any identification, and explained the absence of identification by alleging, before Mr. Justice Keogh, that the parties were "strangers," and asked that the two police constables be recommended for promotion. Mr. Brooke, speaking on behalf of the whole bench, said, "we have already recommended them" for promotion. They recommended these very men to be promoted, who, if the statement of Mr. Lyle before Judge Keogh were correct, ought to have been recommended for promotion to the dock on a charge of perjury. This report says that they were recommended for promotion in the force on account of their good conduct throughout the whole of the prosecution, and so recommended after they had identified each and every of the prisoners, including the Orangemen as well as the Catholics, as having been present at this unlawful assembly. But what is the course which was taken by the magistrates with regard to the accused? They ordered informations to be returned against every one of the Catholic prisoners, charging them with the most serious offence; they sent five of the Orangemen home rejoicing in their immunity from punishment, and ordered the sixth, who struck the policeman, to be sent for trial for the minor offence of an assault. That, then, is the conduct which Mr. Justice Keogh rebukes. That is the conduct which I venture to think worthy the attention of this House, and which I say the Lord Chancellor of Ireland ought to examine into, for the purpose of determining who they were on that bench, if any, who, to use the words of Mr. Justice Keogh, were "utterly unfit for the discharge of the magisterial functions." ["Hear, hear!"] I understand that "hear, hear!" from hon. Gentlemen opposite. What we say is, that this case ought to be investigated by the Lord Chancellor. Very recently this House, and, if I mistake not, some of the hon. Members whom I now see opposite, expressed a strong and decided opinion at the instance of Gentlemen opposite, that this House was bound to interpose for the purpose of seeing that magisterial functions were committed to men who were above suspicion. Sir, I contend that that vote justifies me in asking the House to consider this question, and to determine by an expression of its opinion whether or not that portion of the Irish Catholic public, who live in the midst of a large population of armed Orangemen, are to have justice impartially dealt out to them by magistrates who are above suspicion, by magistrates of whom it cannot be said, on the judicial authority of one of Her Majesty's Judges, and in the presence of an assembled county, that there were some who "were utterly unfit for the discharge of magisterial functions." I wish also to justify myself in asking the House to consider this question upon the further ground that this is not an isolated case. Sir, it is only one of a series of cases which occur twice every year from the extreme portion of the North to the extreme Southern portion of the same province. In the same paper which reported the case that has been so severely commented on by Justice Keogh is a report of some proceedings in the adjoining county of Down, which also contains a large proportion of that particular class of politico-religious confederates who are known as Orangemen. At the county Down assizes, according to the report in this paper, there were six criminal cases tried, and out of the six, five were cases of Orange riotous assemblies. I will give you in brief the particulars of these five cases. No. 1 was the case of Scarva, which occurred, not on the occasion of the special anniversary of the confederation, a day which some persons might think afforded an excuse for excesses, though I cannot allow it, but on the 13th of January. In that case the constable proved that several "thousands of persons" assembled, wearing "Orange ribbands," carrying "Orange flags," bearing "swords," and firing shots. These persons were tried under the Riotous Assemblies Act, as were the Catholics who were tried at Omagh before Judge Keogh, and were found guilty of assembling to the extent of several thousands of persons, assembling with firearms, decked out with Orange ribbands, carrying flags, and playing party tunes, but recommended to mercy by the sympathetic jurors. The result was, that they got off with a sentence of one month's imprisonment without hard labour. No. 2 was a case which occurred at Lisburn. The charge was that of having "riotously assembled," and having "stabbed" certain persons at such assembly, and the defendants got off with a verdict of acquittal. No. 3 was also a case of riotous assembly at Loughbrickland on the 12th of July. In that instance a thousand persons assembled together, carrying arms, Orange flags, and firing shots; their band played "Protestant Boys" and the "Boyne Water," and the prisoners were found guilty, but unanimously recommended to mercy by the sympathising jurors. In consequence of that recommendation the Judge deferred passing sentence, and I do not know that any sentence has yet been passed, though the probability is that, according to a general custom, the parties will be discharged upon their own personal recognizances to appear when called on to receive judgment. In No. 4 case the prisoners had assembled in the town of Kilturby, they carried eight Orange flags, were decked out with Orange ribbands, and had with them fifes and drums, on which they played "Protestant Boys" and the "Boyne Water." These persons were all fully identified, and the Judge observing something in the jury box which indicated to him that there was a deep sympathy on the part of the jurors with the prisoners which it was his duty to guard against, addressed these words to the jurors—

"If you can entertain a doubt, from what you have heard, that it was a procession calculated to excite feelings of animosity between Protestants and Roman Catholics, by all means give them the benefit of the doubt; but if you have no such doubt, do your duty as honest men, and convict the prisoners whether you think the Act of Parliament is a wise one or not."

Notwithstanding that solemn appeal from the Judge—consequent, probably, upon the indications shown of the sympathetic feelings of the jurors who were trying the case, there was a unanimous verdict of not guilty, though no rational defence was set up for the prisoners. [Mr. E. W. VERNER: Who was the Judge?] Baron Fitzgerald; and the case was tried the same day, I believe, in the adjoining county to that in which Mr. Justice Keogh delivered the judgment I have read to the House. I think, then, I have established a case for coming before the House and asking it to assist in taking care that hereafter throughout the Northern provinces of Ireland justice shall be administered to Catholic and Protestant with impartiality. Need I remind the House that it has before effectively interfered in reference to this Orange confederacy. It will be remembered by the House that in the year 1835 a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the constitution, proceedings, and objects of the Orange societies; and before that Committee it appeared in evidence that Ireland was the very hot-bed of the confederation; that from thence it had spread to England; that in England at that moment there were 140,000 members of the confederacy, bound by a secret oath, and in Ireland not less than 220,000 members, all of whom were fully armed and likewise bound by a secret oath. It also came out before that Committee that every individual of these 360,000 armed Orangemen had bound himself to rally round the "head centre" of his lodge; that outside that head centre there was a still larger circle with another head centre, the baronial circle; outside that was the county circle with another head centre; outside that came the provincial circle, with its head centre; outside these was the national circle, with its head centre; and outside the national circle came the imperial circle, with an imperial head centre, and the dictum of that imperial centre the entire organization of circles and centres was bound by oath blindly to obey. Really, one would almost think that I was describing the Fenian system in Ireland. Well, it is a sort of Fenian system in Ireland; but though a Fenian system, it is a Fenian system that is upheld by the exclusively Protestant party—by the party who profess to be the monopolists of all the loyal feeling of the country. Now, when this House investigated the question in 1835, and weighed the whole of the evidence placed before it, what was the opinion of the House with regard to this Orange confederacy? Permit me to read a sentence from the Report of the Committee on the subject. They say there existed—

"An organized institution pervading Great Britain and her colonies to an extent never contemplated as possible, and which your Committee consider highly injurious to the discipline of His Majesty's army and dangerous to the peace of His Majesty's subjects;"

and they end by asking that steps should be immediately taken for the "suppression" of the society. The House will have observed that there is a reference in the extract I have read from the Committee's Report to "His Majesty's army," and the particular fact which came before the Committee to give rise to that was this:—At that time a certain Royal Duke, who was described in the Orange papers as the person "who stood nearest to the throne," gave his warrant to one Colonel Fairman to traverse the country as his deputy centre, to go from one part of the kingdom to the other, visiting the several military posts, and you who have read the accounts of the Fenian proceedings in Ireland during the last twelve months cannot fail to have remarked that, in like manner, the great head centre of Fenianism traversed England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, visiting the military depôts on a special mission, just as one of Her Majesty's colonels traversed the country with a special commission from the Imperial head centre of Orangeism, who was also a Royal Duke. The places most frequented by the Fenian Centre were the barracks in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland; and all the money he could spare was devoted to inducing the soldiers to join his confederation, just as the Orangemen admitted all soldiers without the usual fee. It came out in evidence before the Committee that Colonel Fairman, whose example General Stephens seems to have followed, went with the Royal ducal warrant in his pocket from barrack to barrack; and although the Commander-in-Chief issued a specific order that no member of the army should become a member of an Orange lodge, this Colonel Fairman, with the authority of the "person nearest to the throne," induced hundreds and thousands of His Majesty's soldiers to join the confederacy which this House considered as "dangerous." And it is this which gives a meaning to the passage I have read from the Committee's Report, that it is highly injurious to "the discipline of His Majesty's army." [Mr. CONOLLY: What is the date of that transaction?] The Committee sat in 1835. I may state, for the information of the hon. Member, the Report and evidence are in the Library of this House. Upon examining the last volume it will be found that there was not a single colony of Her Majesty into which this "dangerous" Orange system had not penetrated, corrupting the soldiers, causing them to recognise a head centre outside the Commander-in-Chief, and pledging them on oath implicitly to obey the dicta of that head centre, and within ten hours from the issue of a mandate from him, wherever they were, to assemble for the purpose of performing his behests, whatever they might be. [Mr. CONOLLY: That was thirty years ago.] Yes, thirty years ago, under the old rules; but the new rules are as exclusive, and require the same blind obedience to the head centre. At that period there was an eminent statesman who led the party opposite; and speaking of the recommendation of the Committee, of the action of this House, of the Address to his Majesty—the then King—praying Him to direct that such measures should be taken as would suppress this dangerous conspiracy; of the fact that the Royal Duke, the Imperial head centre, had given an undertaking, which he signed with his name "Ernest," authorizing a gentleman named Maxwell to come to this House with his letter, declaring that he would at once dissolve the associated confederates—the late Sir Robert Peel said on that occasion—"It matters little if you do dissolve it as regards its external form, unless you also dissolve it as regards its spirit," and I maintain that in spirit that society still lives.

MR. E. W. VERNER: I rise to order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know from you what all this has to do with the conduct of the magistrates to whom the hon. Gentleman refers?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has given notice of a Motion; and at this moment it is difficult for me to tell how this will bear upon it, though it certainly seems to be travelling rather wide of the mark.

SIR JOHN GRAY: I readily bow to your decision, Sir. I fear that for a time I must appear to travel a little wide of the Question I have put on the paper; but I trust I shall be able to show that all the facts I adduce bear directly upon the administration of justice in Ireland, as affected by the exclusive organization alluded to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh. I respectfully but confidently come to ask the House to express an opinion upon this case. It is an important case, because of the extent of the district to which the principle of that case applies. If I do not establish by the facts that the failure of justice in Ireland in this case is but an example of many similar cases, then I will admit that the hon. Gentleman is right in calling me to order. What I desire to show at this moment is, that a former Leader of that side of the House said in the year 1836 that unless the dangerous confederacy abandoned its spirit as well as its form no good whatever would result; and that afterwards, instead of dissolving in fact, they only changed their rules, the new rules having been prepared by a right hon. Gentleman who has since occupied the position of Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Upon the organization being altered it was re-established in Ireland, and before I sit down I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that that organization attempts to interfere even with this House, and certainly does interfere largely with the electoral system which is under the special protection of this House. I will give the House an illustration, which has just occurred to my mind, of the manner in which this organized system acts. After this House had adopted the Resolution I have referred to, after His Majesty had declared his Royal opinion that this organization was dangerous to the public peace and ought to be suppressed, the Orange system was rehabilitated in Ireland, and at this moment there is said to be upwards of 120,000 men in the organization in Ireland, all bound to obey their head centre. The ostentatious displays made by these confederates is extraordinary. Some time ago I went to a Northern county as a candidate for the representation, and the Gentleman who opposed me was successful, and is therefore well known to this House. Some years previously that Gentleman, who was then Grand Master of the Orangemen either of the county or of the province, drove ostentatiously to the assizes with his orange scarf around him, and, so attired, walked into the court to assume the duties of foreman of the Grand Jury of the county. Now, that is a fact which came almost within my own personal cognizance. It is also known to some Gentlemen who are sitting not far from me, and I venture to ask was that consistent with the due administration of justice? [Major KNOX: What date?] About 1850, and since its new organization. On that day there was a dinner of the Grand Jury of the county; an hon. Member of this House, who is now present, and saw the exhibition I refer to, was at that dinner, and I now appeal to him to vouch for the accuracy of the statement I made.

Sir John Gray

That dinner was attended by the Grand Jury, whose duty it was to appear in the box as impartial administrators of justice, and if they had not the virtue of impartiality at least were bound to assume the semblance of it. Now, the Orangemen have as one of their rules that no man who was, or is a Catholic, shall be identified in any way with their organization. The hon. Member to whom I have referred is a Protestant, and not a Catholic. He was sitting at a window in the room when the Grand Master who had driven to the court house that morning with an Orange scarf upon his shoulder in the capacity of Grand Master, rose as foreman of the Grand Jury, and gave as a toast—

“The glorious, pious and immortal memory of the great and good King William, who saved us from Popery, slavery, brass money and wooden shoes, and may he who refuses to drink the toast be——”

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he must appeal to the Speaker. They had been travelling back some thirty years, and now the hon. Gentleman was about to favour them with some account of certain festivities. He appealed to the Speaker to say if the hon. Gentleman was in order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is travelling wide of his notice, as he himself admitted just now. It would be more in accordance with the rules of debate if he would confine himself to the matter referred to in the notice before the House.

SIR JOHN GRAY: I am bound to abide by the decision of the Chair; but according to my view of the question, the Motion has reference to the administration of justice in Ireland, and I wish to indicate the facts which have induced me to bring before the House this particular case, and which will show that a condition of things exists in Ireland which of necessity impairs the administration of justice, and acts in such a manner as at least to destroy all confidence in its impartial administration. What I was endeavouring to show the House was that this organization alluded to by Mr. Justice Keogh in the statement which I have read to the House, exists to a very large extent in Ireland, and that persons who are bound by their official position, and who declare upon their oath that they will administer justice impartially to all the Queen's subjects, occasionally enter the Courts of Justice with all their Orange sympathies fully influencing them, and that they enter those Courts of Justice decked out in Orange insignia. As an illustration of this, I may mention the fact that when the foreman of the Grand Jury of the Northern county went into court, as I described, he was met with a cheer from his sympathisers, though he went there so attired avowedly for the purpose of administering justice; and I contend that such a state of affairs is calculated to prevent the impartial administration of justice in Ireland, and leaves on the minds of suitors an impression similar to that which is left on the mind of Mr. Justice Keogh that such persons are utterly unfit for the performance of magisterial functions. If you decide that I am not to read the remnant of this precious toast I will leave it to hon. Gentlemen opposite to give us a description of what the toast is, as they, no doubt, are in the habit of drinking it. I will not pursue the subject further; but I now wish to call attention to another matter of some importance in reference to the very principle brought before a public court by Mr. Justice Keogh, which I ventured to bring under the notice of this higher court, which I contend is bound in honour to see that the laws which it enacts are impartially administered in all parts of Her Majesty's dominions. The ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland (the right hon. Maziere Brady) having taken cognizance of the facts which hon. Gentlemen opposite say I am not in order in mentioning here—but which I take this opportunity of saying I will bring forward on a future occasion in a manner that cannot be deemed beyond my notice; for if ample justice be not done in this case I shall feel it to be my duty to place a notice on the paper for an Address to Her Majesty, praying Her to take the whole question of the Orange confederation into Her most gracious consideration, when I hope to have an opportunity of bringing out the whole of the facts—the ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Brady), taking the facts, which I am not at liberty to state, into his consideration, came to the conclusion that, as the chief administrator of the law in Ireland, as the person who represented the Executive appointed by the votes of this House to carry out the law with impartial and even-handed justice in Ireland, no gentleman who was a member of that confederation was fit to hold Her Majesty's commission; and by a letter which he addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Down he declared that he would not in future give the commission of the peace to any person who was a member of the confederation. That letter was discussed a good deal in the public press, and was discussed also in both Houses of Parliament; and I hold in my hand a statement which was made in the year 1858, with reference to that letter, by the late Lord Carlisle—a nobleman who was familiar with the whole state of society in Ireland, and was for some time chief of the Executive Government there. Speaking of the town of Belfast, which had been notorious for being perpetually in a state of civil warfare on account of the disunion which was created by that Orange confederation, Lord Carlisle said—

“The recurrence of these most unhappy and most disgraceful riots in Belfast only served to strengthen his conviction that the Irish Government last year acted in consonance both with their duty and with the strictest policy and prudence in taking the only step which it was in their power as a Government to take to show their disapproval of exclusive religious societies and organizations, by refusing any fresh appointment of members of the Orange society to the office of magistrate.”—[3 Hansard, cl. 1594.]

I wish now to call attention to the happy results that followed a more recent and more stringent proceeding in the town of Belfast. Immediately after the publication of the Lord Chancellor's letter a Royal Commission was issued to inquire into the condition of Belfast, and how it occurred that that city was always in a state of chronic civil war. The Commissioners went to Belfast, where they found that most of the magistrates were sympathisers with one side, and that the entire police force, with the exception of six or seven individuals, were members of one religious persuasion. It was reported by the Commissioners, one of whom is at present Judge of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, that out of a police force consisting of 160 men but about half-a-dozen were Roman Catholics, while the whole of the rest were Protestants. They also reported that some of the police appointed by the local magistrates—gentlemen who were themselves sympathisers with, if not members of, Orange societies—appeared in Orange processions, with Orange ribbands bound round their staves, and recommended that there should be a change in a system which tolerated such occurrences. The Report was not, however, acted upon. The brethren of Belfast had friends in high quarters, and from the year 1858 up to 1864 Belfast continued to be in that condition which warranted Lord Derby in stating that it was a disgrace to a civilized country that the most opulent, and the most flourishing, and most commercial city in the kingdom should be in a perpetual state of civil war. Sir, in the year 1864 the town of Belfast was for five whole days in a state of actual siege. [Major Knox: Belfast is not Tyrone.] I know Belfast is not Tyrone, and I mention the case of Belfast because the same system, if not of partial justice, at least of want of confidence in the magistracy, prevails all through the North of Ireland, and I desire to show that if the same remedy which was so effectively applied to Belfast within the past year were applied elsewhere, the stigma which has been removed from Belfast might also be removed from the other places where similar practices still prevail. During the party riots in Belfast in 1864, 311 persons were wounded. Of these, ninety-eight suffered from gunshot wounds, and eleven of them died. There is in this House an hon. and learned Gentleman who was deputed, in common with another learned Gentleman, to inquire into the proper means of supplying an impartial police and impartial magisterial authority to put down those Orange displays and party riots which gave such unenviable notoriety to Belfast. Those Gentlemen reported that the number of Catholics in the police force dwindled down to five; that the police were looked upon as a partizan force in that town; and that the control of the police and the appointment of them ought to be taken out of the hands of the local authorities altogether, and that two stipendiary magistrates, the one a Roman Catholic, and the other a Protestant, should be appointed in their stead. This recommendation was acted on, and the local magistrates, one of whom rode at the head of an Orange funeral procession during the riots, and was cheered by the brethren, ceased to have any control over the police force, and from that day to this there has not been a single party riot in Belfast. Now if this course were adopted throughout the North of Ireland there would be no more party contention, and no more party processions, for the persons otherwise disposed to take part in those exhibitions would know that prompt and effectual justice would be done upon all who violated the law. Sir, we were engaged last Session, and we have been occupied this Session, in endeavouring to produce a good electoral system throughout the country, by which every man entitled to a vote should receive the franchise. There is nothing which this House is more jealous of than external influence exercised over the enfranchised classes. Whether that influence be that of coercion or of bribery, or of secret intimidation emanating from some all-pervading power which issues mandates in secret from sources the existence of which are known only to the initiated, matters not. The House of Commons in all cases feels called upon to protect those whom it has deemed worthy of enfranchisement. But what, let me ask, is the practice of this Orange Association with respect to electors who join their confederacy. I hold in my hand a Report of the proceedings of the Grand Orange meeting, held in Dublin, at which Lord Dungannon and the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir William Verner) and other distinguished personages were present, and I find that among the business transacted was the consideration of a report upon the electoral condition of the county of Londonderry, and that forty-three members of Lodges in that county were expelled because they had voted contrary to the orders of the head centres.

MR. E. W. VERNER: I rise to order, Sir; we have not yet reached the Irish Reform Bill.

SIR JOHN GRAY: I am quite aware of that fact; but I merely refer to the influence which this association exerts to show the House the extent to which the classes whom it has enfranchised are interfered with.

MR. SPEAKER: The subject does not fall within the Motion of which the hon. Gentleman has given notice.

SIR JOHN GRAY: Sir, I shall cheerfully bow to your judgment, and pass to another branch of the subject. Since I gave notice of this Motion I have received several communications from the county of Tyrone, for the accuracy of which I cannot be expected to vouch, but I give them to the House as they reached me. Some of them state that there are only one or two Roman Catholic magistrates on the bench in that large county, although the great majority of cases to be decided by the magistrates arise out of party riots between Orangemen and Roman Catholics. I have also been credibly informed that the jury panel contains about 150 names, and that although the Roman Catholic population of Tyrone is, in round numbers, 134,000 against 103,000 Protestants of all denominations. Now with these notorious facts, and regard being had to the additional circumstance that so many of the magistrates are either themselves members of the Orange confederacy, or warm sympathizers, we cannot feel surprised that a strong feeling of distrust in the administration of justice should pervade the public mind. And, Sir, I respectfully submit that, when an occurrence of so remarkable a character as that denounced by Mr. Justice Keogh is brought under its notice, it is the duty of the Government and of the House of Commons to give expression to their opinions, and to indicate a determination that vigorous action will be taken to secure that justice shall be as impartially administered to Roman Catholics in the North of Ireland, as to any other class of Her Majesty's subjects in any other portion of her dominions. But we may be told that the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh was exaggerated, and not itself impartial. In order to meet any such assertion, should it be made, I may cite as an illustration of the perfect impartiality of that distinguished Judge, that on the very same day on which he passed a sentence of one month's imprisonment, with hard labour, on six Roman Catholic prisoners, and sentenced one Protestant to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, he also, in another case of riotous assembling which came before him, sentenced six Roman Catholics to six months' imprisonment with the addition of hard labour. This was in the Pomeroy case, and in that case I should state that the steward of one of the magistrates before whom the accused persons had to appear at petty sessions was the person who carried the Orange drum to excite animosity between Roman Catholics and Orangemen. That magistrate may be very just, and no doubt is; but will the public accept him as impartial in such a case? I am aware, Sir, that it was said by the learned Judge that the bell of the Roman Catholic Church was rung at Donoughmore, but what, let me ask, is the practice in the county of Tyrone, which led to the necessity of that measure. Shortly before the riot took place at Donoughmore, the Roman Catholic clergymen of Pomeroy, an adjacent district, received an anonymous letter, informing him that his parishioners would soon have a visit from the "True Blues." Now, it is but right the House should know what a visit from the "True Blues" to a Catholic district really means. The town of Dungannon, which is represented by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Knox), received a visit from the "True Blues" about a year previous to the "invasion" of Donoughmore. He will, doubtless, recollect the riot of 1865, and that the town was wrecked—that is, the Catholic houses and the chief hotel in the town were reduced to a ruin. Dungannon was wrecked in 1865, under the new rules, just as Maghery was wrecked some thirty years before under the old rules. The rules were altered, but the practice was the same. The case of Maghery is reported by the Committee I adverted to, and in that Report it is stated that the "True Blues" paid a visit to that village, which was inhabited by Catholics. The place was the property of Lord Charlemont, and on that occasion the "Killyman" Blues wrecked it, by smashing the doors and windows, breaking the furniture, and everything movable within the house, and turning out the inhabitants to find shelter in the ditches. On that occasion property of Lord Charlemont to the value of £600 was destroyed by the invading Blues, and I feel it right to the venerable Baronet opposite to state to his credit that he accompanied the wreckers during the whole of that day, endeavouring to stay their hands, but in vain. He was not at that time authorized by the chief centre to command, and they wrecked the houses before his face, against all his entreaties and remonstrances. In this case there were no imprisonments, for it appeared that the plea that there were no identifications was to the full availed of by the Killyman wreckers. This was what was meant by a visit from the "True Blues" in 1830. This was what was meant by the visit to Dungannon in 1865. When, therefore, the people of Donoughmore heard that the "True Blues" were coming among them in force, and at night, what could they do but sound the alarm, assemble together, and protect themselves against the invaders? In these wreckings of villages the Orangemen spared neither sex nor age, and the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon knows well that such are their practices. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is himself a member of the Orange confederation. The town he represents was wrecked in 1865 as he admits. He knows that on such occasions Orangemen, always of course excepting the head centres, respect neither house of God nor the house of man, and that every body who does not bow down to the Moloch of Orangeism is regarded as an enemy. I have now only to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he had read or had had his attention called to the observations reported to have been made by Mr. Justice Keogh at the assize court of the county of Tyrone on Friday last, with reference to the conduct of certain justices of the peace for that county, and the alleged consequent failure of justice; and whether any and what steps had been taken by the Irish Executive to institute a full inquiry into the facts of the case, and the conduct of the magistrates referred to; and if no steps had been taken, was it the intention of the Government to take any and what steps in relation thereto? I also beg to move for the papers in connection with the subject.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, Copies of any Correspondence that has taken place with reference to cases referred to in Mr. Justice Keogh's statement at the Assize Court of the county of Tyrone, and of the Letter of Lord Chancellor Brady to the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Down, on the impropriety of conferring the commission of the peace on Members of the Orange Association; and, of any Correspondence that arose thereupon,"—(Sir John Gray.)

—instead thereof.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that as one of the bench of magistrates attacked by the hon. Member, he had to thank him for bringing the question before the House, although, in doing so, the hon. Member had travelled into matters not at all connected with the subject. The hon. Member had abused the Orange lodges; but he did not seem to know that not one of the magistrates sitting on the bench on the day referred to was an Orangeman. He (Colonel Knox) was not ashamed to acknowledge that he was an Orangeman, and so long as he obeyed the laws of his country he believed he had a right to continue to be one. The hon. Member had alluded to confederations; but had the hon. Member never belonged to one. Had he forgotten 1848? The hon. Member had spoken of illegal processions. Had he forgotten the procession in which he himself had taken part in 1865? [Sir JOHN GRAY: Where?]

In Dublin. At that procession, conducted under the auspices of the late Government, and at which the hon. Member was prominent, there were bands, and banners, and party emblems, which brought it clearly within the Act against illegal processions. He hoped Mr. Justice Keogh had empowered the Chief Secretary for Ireland to explain the hasty and ill-judged words which he had used, and to which the hon. Member had now called attention. He would tell the House what really happened. It was the habit of the Protestants in the North of Ireland to go about in the evening and amuse themselves by the music of drums and fifes. If party tunes were played they put themselves within the reach of the law. For himself, he did not approve of such a practice. He wished it could be got rid of; but the hon. Member would find that the habit was too inveterate to be easily put down so long as the persons acted according to law. On the occasion in question a small party of Protestants went to Donoughmore to meet another party whose drums they had borrowed. On their way they met the police, whose conduct on this, as on all other occasions, redounded highly to their credit. The police desired the party to leave off their drumming, and they did so instantly. After this an attack was made upon them by a party of Roman Catholics from Donoughmore. He would read the evidence which was taken before the magistrates, and which would show how far Mr. Justice Keogh was justified in the observations he made from the bench. Constable O'Neill stated that the Protestants ceased to beat the drums when they were told, and that after this the Roman Catholics came and made an attack on them, shouting out, "We will kill every man of them," and striking right and left. The constable added that the chapel bell was rung, and that he went to stop it—

"The drumming party were conducting themselves quietly when going through the town. Heard no party tunes played. Saw no firearms with them, or weapons of any kind. When the drumming party were returning from Mr. Lyle's gate the town (Roman Catholic) party went to meet them. The drumming party were attacked before they got into the town. They afterwards went on towards the Cross, and were again attacked at it. Up to the time they were attacked I did not see a weapon in the hands of the drumming party, nor observe them doing anything improper. They committed no breach of the peace until they were first attacked on the road, at which time they were not beating the drums. They did not then retaliate, as we managed to keep them asunder."

[Mr. SULLIVAN : Where are you taking the evidence from?] He was reading from the Belfast News Letter, and he had good authority for stating that it was a correct report. Did the hon. Member wish the magistrates to commit men for trial when even a Roman Catholic policeman declared that they committed no breach of the peace when attacked, and did not retaliate? The effect of the Judge's language would be to rouse ill-blood between the Orangemen and Roman Catholics of Tyrone and the North of Ireland, and to bring the bench into contempt. The magistrates to whom this stigma was affixed did not deserve it. They were highminded men, who had acted disinterestedly, without partiality or favour. If the hon. Member opposite chose to move for a Committee on the subject, the magistrates were ready to meet him, and it would be shown that they were men who were perfectly fitted to hold the commission of the peace. The hon. Member had made much of the accusation brought by Mr. Justice Keogh against Mr. Lyle, who had been a magistrate in the district for many years, who was no Orangeman, and who had always done his duty fairly and honestly. What Mr. Lyle wished to say, when he attempted to interrupt the Judge, was, that none of the Protestants were identified as doing anything contrary to law. If he had been allowed to finish his sentence to that effect it might have made a different impression on the mind of the learned Judge. That learned functionary had himself used language which was hardly justifiable. He advised the Roman Catholics to keep within their houses, but to watch the movements of the Protestants doggedly, intently, determinedly. He would ask the House whether that was language proper to be used from the bench, or whether it was not calculated to stir up ill-blood in the country? With regard to the single Protestant who was tried by Mr. Justice Keogh, and who was told by the Judge that he ought to have been indicted, not for an assault, but for a riot, the information which he (Colonel Knox) got was to this effect—that this man pushed the constable before the Roman Catholic party came up, and when, therefore, no rioting had taken place. If he had been indicted for a riot the bill would have been thrown out by the Grand Jury. After this statement which he had made, and which he believed to contain a plain narrative of the facts, he thought he had a right to ask the noble Lord whether he would not call upon Mr. Justice Keogh to remove the stigma which he had cast, not upon the justices of that bench alone, but upon those of the whole of the North of Ireland, thus bringing the whole administration of justice into contempt. As to there being no Roman Catholic magistrates in Tyrone, he admitted this might possibly be the case; but that was because there were not resident gentlemen of that persuasion in a station of life that would qualify them for the bench. He was sure no one who knew the present Lord Lieutenant of Tyrone would doubt his willingness to act with perfect impartiality in the matter.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he felt a painful duty had been cast upon him. He would state the facts of the case as they occurred, and he would ask the hon. Member (Sir John Gray) how he could justify himself to the House for having ignored the evidence in the case, and tried to hide from the House the real facts, while he went on for more than an hour endeavouring to poison the public mind with respect to the administration of justice in the North of Ireland. This might be strong language; but he was forced to say that it had never been his painful duty to hear so extraordinary an attempt as this was to malign and misrepresent the conduct of worthy men. He could understand the object of the hon. Gentleman in going back to the events of 1835, in order to produce an impression upon the public mind which the facts of the present case, taken by themselves, would not justify. He would give the House a plain and simple statement of the facts. He would begin by referring to the charge of Mr. Justice Keogh, which was quoted by the hon. Member opposite. How far that learned and excellent Judge had been correctly reported he was not able to say; but if the report as quoted was correct, then the learned Judge must have received some secret evidence, which certainly was not brought before the public. He would tell the House what really did happen. Before doing so, he must state that just before the assizes an anonymous letter appeared in the county paper, the production of a violent partizan—a most improper letter, for the writer had the insolence to pretend to teach the jury their duty, and told them that all the Roman Catholics ought to be punished at once. The counsel for the prisoners, knowing that he had not a leg to stand upon, appealed to Mr. Justice Keogh to say whether that letter was not fitted to poison the public mind, and asked him to postpone the case, as it was impossible that the prisoners could, under the circumstances, have a fair trial. Mr. Justice Keogh read the letter, and, though he could not consent to postpone the trial, his indignation was strongly roused by the letter, and he said he wished he had the writer in court, and that he could punish him. He (Lord Claud Hamilton) heartily wished so too. The men pleaded guilty at once, and the Judge was called upon to pass sentence while the feeling of indignation was still strong upon him. It was under the influence of these feelings that he made—if correctly reported—the statements which had been read to the House. Then, with regard to Mr. Lyle, who attempted to interrupt the Judge, and who said that the Protestants could not be identified—what Mr. Lyle meant to say was, not that they were not identified personally, for they were well known, but that they were not identified as having taken part in anything illegal. But he was rather nervous, and he interrupted the court, which he had no business to do; and when he endeavoured to explain, he was put down by Mr. Justice Keogh. The hon. Gentleman opposite talked of his love of justice. God preserve Ireland! A more unworthy attempt to speak in the name of justice had never come under his notice. A certain number of Protestants and Roman Catholics were indicted for rioting and assembling illegally, and the hon. Gentleman, having read the evidence, said that the magistrates dismissed the charges against the Protestants, and sent the Roman Catholics for trial. He charged the hon. Gentleman with having made that statement, or, at least, having conveyed that impression.

SIR JOHN GRAY: I did not make that statement. I stated that one was sent for trial, and the others were not committed.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: It was pretty much the same. Was it a magistrate's duty to commit two Protestants because he had committed two Roman Catholics, or vice versa? Or was it his duty to listen to the evidence, and see how it applied to each person? Why did not the hon. Gentleman read to the House certain portions of the evidence which he had altogether omitted to refer to. The evidence of one of the Roman Catholic

witnesses—a Roman Catholic sergeant—distinctly stated that the Protestants were not guilty of anything illegal. But it would not have suited the hon. Gentleman's ideas of impartial justice to have read that. The hon. Gentleman's speech was to vilify the magistrates, and to convey to the House one of the most one-sided and unfair representations he had ever heard. A sub-constable—a Roman Catholic—stated in his evidence that the Protestants were not armed; that they played no party tunes; that they had no colours; and that they committed no illegal acts; and that the Roman Catholics attacked them with stones and other weapons, their leaders saying that they would kill every one of them. Against the six Roman Catholics who were indicted there was the most distinct evidence of their having committed a breach of the law; but every Protestant who was charged, with the exception of the one who was proved to have committed an assault, and who was now undergoing imprisonment, it was shown had done nothing. The hon. Gentleman had spoken for an hour and a half to endeavour to show that they were all equally guilty, but that the Roman Catholics were all sent for trial, while the Protestants were all discharged. That was the charge made by the representative of impartial justice, and lover of truth! The hon. Member also talked of "armed Orangemen." Throughout the whole investigation it was stated that they had no arms, and it was distinctly stated that when attacked they did not retaliate. The Protestant party came with drums along the high road. There was nothing illegal in that. There were no colours and no arms; and yet the hon. Gentleman talked of armed Orangemen. Both witnesses—the Roman Catholic sergeant and the Roman Catholic sub-constable—said they saw no arms. The party came up playing music, but not party tunes; they had no emblems, there was not a single element of illegality. At a certain place the officers met the party and said, "Pray don't go on with that drumming, it may create a disturbance." The party complied and stopped playing immediately. Other persons who were also indicted attacked the party with stones and other missiles. The sub-constable, according to the Report, said—

"The first person I recognised coming forward to attack the drumming party was Patrick McCluskey. [The witness here identified all the Roman Catholic prisoners.] M'Cluskey and O'Connor were the first to strike the drumming party. Those two men came forward shouting 'Kill them; we will kill them every one.' They struck all round them—every one that they could get a blow at belonging to the drumming party." The witness proceeded to say that he and another constable attempted to interfere. He then named other two principals, Loughlin and M'Girr, and then a third, Nogher, and gave distinct evidence of violence on the part of each. Nogher was—

"Shouting that Lyle (a magistrate) was away from home, and that they had the town to themselves. The other defendants of the same party were all striking at each other, or throwing stones."

The witness then came to the names of the opposite party. He said—

"I did not see Thornberry strike any one—on the contrary, he did all that he could to quell the disturbance. Reney only caught me. Dilworth did nothing. M'Atter did nothing but beat a drum. Stewart did nothing whatever."

Thus this party committed no illegal act, but did what they could to check others, except one, who committed an assault, and was punished for it. Thus, man by man, the evidence proved the one party to be guilty, and on the other hand, man by man, the police constables testified that the other party had committed no illegal act. Yet the hon. Member spoke for an hour-and-a-half to induce the House to believe that the magistrates had evidence before them showing that all these men were equally guilty. In cross-examination, sub-constable O'Neill said—

"The drumming party were conducting themselves quietly when going through the town. Heard no party tunes played. Saw no firearms with them, nor weapons of any kind."

The hon. Gentleman (Sir John Gray) talked of "armed Orangemen." Throughout the whole of this investigation the term "armed Orangemen" was never introduced. The witnesses always spoke of Protestants. That statement was completely confirmed by the evidence given by sub-constable Thackaber, who saw all the men who were convicted assaulting the drumming party. It appeared that Mr. Justice Keogh had made representations to the authorities, and, for his part, he would invite the fullest inquiry into the circumstances. But he could not help again asking honourable Englishmen and honourable Irishmen what was the reason for poisoning the minds of those who were to hear the evidence by a statement such as had been made to the House that evening.

Was it right to endeavour to induce the House to suppose, in opposition to the facts, that the magistrates, in dealing with men who were equally guilty, had committed all the Roman Catholics and had discharged all the Protestants. Was it by such statements as these that Ireland was to be regenerated? Was that impartial justice? Why should magistrates, when they made a distinction between the innocent and the guilty, be charged with having come to their decision in consequence of political or religious bias? He pitied the man who was capable of making such a use of his position as a Member of the House of Commons, and he trusted the hon. Gentleman's speech would have a very different effect from that intended. Some remarks had been made respecting the absurdity of people going about with bands of music, and he certainly did not think it a very wise thing to do; but a distinction must be drawn between what was sensible and what was legal. Unfortunately, there was not in Ireland so much social amusement as was desirable; and, consequently, the people were led into the habit of playing music in a manner which sometimes unfortunately resulted in a disturbance. Drumming on the high road was certainly legal, though he did not at all approve the practice, as it had a tendency to arouse bygone animosities. The House had been told that the Protestant party had been solely to blame; but no mention had been made of the most gross outrage of all, the breaking into the belfry at night by two Roman Catholics tolling the bells and rousing the whole country. The exponent of impartial justice, however, had not thought proper to allude to that circumstance, although having read the evidence, the hon. Member could not have been ignorant of it. He trusted he had made it plain to the House that the magistrates had acted in accordance with the sworn testimony given before them, without being influenced in any way by the fact of the accused being Protestant or Roman Catholic.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he would not have interfered were it not for the observations made by the hon. Member for Dungannon respecting Mr. Justice Keogh, which he would not allow to pass unchallenged. The hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon (Colonel Knox) said he was an Orangeman; but even that did not justify him in saying that the O'Connell procession in Dublin was illegal. He (Mr.

Sullivan) would rather hear the opinion of a lawyer on that point. He would answer for Judge Keogh that he had not given instructions for his defence to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Judge Keogh was not the man to intrust his defence to any other person and rested his defence on the due discharge of his public duties. He (Mr. Sullivan) defied hon. Members to point to any act of the learned Judge's judicial life that was not deserving of approval. The hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon should have quoted correctly the observations of the learned Judge. After the passage "keep within your homes, watch their movements doggedly, silently, determinedly," he should have added the words that followed—"and when they break the laws appeal to the laws of your country: they are able to protect you." Why did the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon suppress that part of the Judge's observations? Was that the practice of the Dungannon Orangemen? Judge Keogh never advised that revenge should be taken by the Roman Catholics. [Colonel Knox: The passage was read before by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray)] That was not a fair way for the hon. and gallant Member to treat the House when the character of a distinguished Judge was assailed. By omitting the material and important part of the observations the hon. and gallant Member had misrepresented the learned Judge. Again, he (Mr. Sullivan) would repeat the words that were omitted—"when they break the laws appeal to the laws of your country, and they are able to protect you;" and he (Mr. Sullivan) hoped that these words of wisdom would reach the ears of the Dungannon Orangemen. The Orangemen of Ireland assumed to themselves a monopoly of loyalty while they did enormous injury to the country. They had no right to make such an assumption; there were as loyal men Roman Catholics in Ireland as any Orangemen. It was upon sworn informations returned by the magistrates from petty sessions that Judge Keogh made his observations. It appeared that 120 Protestants, with drums and fifes, with two horsemen in front, marched into Donoughmore, and an affray took place. It was said the constable could not identify them because they were strangers and came from another part of the country; but that was a miserable and unworthy quibble; and this patent fact stood out—every

Roman Catholic was returned for trial, and every Protestant was let off except the one man who struck the constable in the face. But no great credit could be given to the Tyrone magistrates for sending the Protestant to trial who struck the constable in the face. He thought this was a serious case, and so far from the Chief Secretary having instructions from the learned Judge, the matter would be investigated. But he (Mr. Sullivan) was not going to pronounce an opinion on the conduct of the Tyrone magistrates. That would become a subject of investigation by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who would no doubt deal with it fairly and impartially. But whatever might be the result of that investigation, he was convinced it would be found that the assault made upon that distinguished Judge, Mr. Justice Keogh, was wholly unjustifiable.

LORD NAAS: Four hours of the time of the House were never, to my knowledge, worse employed than they have been this evening. The Notice given by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) was perfectly justifiable, considering the remarks that have been made on the conduct of the magistrates from the bench. The hon. Gentleman having given notice of a question—which I was ready to answer at once—took the opportunity of delivering a speech to which I will not allude at length. The hon. Member delivered a speech characterized by the worst qualities that distinguished our debates in the worst period of our history. The only consequence it can produce is unmixed and unmitigated mischief. I am sure that the English Members who agree with the hon. Member for Kilkenny in political opinions will regret that he should have thought fit to go back forty years and rake up stories and public events which every true lover of his country must desire had never happened. The learned Judge who made the remarks to which the attention of the House has been directed stated that he intended to draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the conduct of the particular magistrate and of some other magistrates. I can only say, on the part of the Government, that up to this moment no such communication has been made. When such communication is made—as I have no doubt it will be made after the words that fell from the learned Judge—I can answer for myself and for the Lord Chancellor that a fair opportunity will be given for a full and impartial inquiry near the place where those occurrences are said to have taken place. Every one who comes forward to take part in the inquiry and to offer the evidence they think they ought to offer will be heard, and then it will be for the Lord Chancellor and the Members of the Executive Government to decide upon the result of the inquiry. It would have been more generous and proper, and more suited to his position as an impartial Member of the House, if the hon. Member had waited until the inquiry was concluded before making the remarks he did. It would be unbecoming in me to offer a word on the facts. I know nothing of them beyond what I read in the newspapers; but I should be sorry on a newspaper report to make an attack upon persons holding the commission of the peace when their conduct is about to be submitted to an impartial and rigid inquiry.

MR. VANCE: I have not risen to impugn the conduct of Judge Keogh, which I am sure was committed by him under an honest but mistaken impulse, but to defend one of the magistrates whom I know — Mr. Lyle — and he is as incapable of committing an act of injustice as any human being. The way in which the hon. Member for Kilkenny brought forward this question reminds me of the observation of Madame Roland — "Oh! justice, what crimes are committed in thy name!" The hon. Member did everything to enkindle animosities and inflame the passions of the people of Ireland. A few Protestants assembled together and chanced to be playing drums and fifes — without any insignia forbidden by law. They were unarmed, and were met by Roman Catholics. A riot ensued, and the rioters were not the Protestants. One of those Protestants committed an assault for which he was most severely punished by six months' imprisonment. The Roman Catholics who committed a riot were punished with one month's imprisonment. The result of the investigation will be, that the Lord Chancellor will be obliged to confess that no illegal act has been committed by the magistrates. He will, probably, add that the magistrate who had addressed him was not allowed by Mr. Justice Keogh to state the entire of the facts of the case. The bringing of the circumstances before the House is calculated to prejudice the judgment the Lord Chancellor may pass upon them. I think the Motion for papers is uncalled for, and I hope it will be refused.

MR. BAGWELL said, he thought it was the duty of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, or of some Gentleman on that or the other side of the House, to bring forward the question. He was not going to defend the conduct of Mr. Justice Keogh, who was as well able to defend himself as any man in the country; but on hearing such discussions in the House, he could not help thinking that it would have been a mercy if they had been born Turks. In the South of Ireland the Protestants and Roman Catholics were free to differ in religion; but these religious differences did not disturb the peace and harmony in which they lived. He regretted, as an Irishman, that these discussions should take place; and he believed that the parties on either side were equally wrong in forgetting, in their religious differences, that they were Irishmen, subjects of the same Queen, subject to the same laws, and living under the same Constitution. It was really distressing that such discussions as they had been listening to that evening should take place. Both sides of the House were equally guilty in stirring up such debates, and it was unfortunate that such should be the case. At the same time, he must confess that he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny had done right in introducing the question which he had done that evening.

MR. LANYON said, he regretted that the hon. Member for Kilkenny had brought that subject before the House, and had thought fit to indulge in the discursive observations he had made — particularly with reference to the riots in the town of Belfast. That hon. Member had made a most unjustifiable attack on the Orangemen of Belfast in saying that they had caused those riots. The Orangemen were not the aggressors, and he denied that the disturbances were due to them. The navvies and Ribandmen of the town began the greatest riot which ever took place in Belfast by attacking a Protestant school in Brown Street. He believed, however, that the partial administration of justice in Ireland sometimes created an irritation in the minds of the people. Illegal meetings had been held with bands and colours under the very nose of Government, and no notice was taken of them; while occasional petty processions of a few boys with banners had been punished with the utmost rigour of the law. The sooner the Irish

Members of that House forgot the violent party feelings displayed by the hon. Member for Kilkenny that evening, and united to promote the substantial welfare and prosperity of Ireland, the better it would be for their common country.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was glad to hear from the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas) an assurance that the circumstances which had been brought under the notice of the House would be fully and fairly investigated by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The case just brought before them was one which not only justified such an inquiry, but rendered it absolutely necessary. Notwithstanding all that had been said by hon. Members, he thought they were indebted to the hon. Member for Kilkenny for having brought the case forward. This was not a case of a class totally unknown to them. He feared that although such cases were not so rife as they were once in Ireland, they were still too familiar in that country. Knowing, as he did, the impartial character of the learned Judge whose observation had originated the discussion, he was certainly of opinion that it would have been impossible not to have brought the matter at an early period under the notice of Parliament. He would not now discuss the matter; but when the promised investigation took place, he trusted the House would take proper cognizance of the case.

MR. CONOLLY said, it must be abundantly manifest to every one that the observations which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down must carry very different weight to those of an ordinary Member, when it was remembered that under the late Government he filled the high and responsible office of Chief Secretary for Ireland. Those observations were of the gravest character. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the case now brought under their consideration was only one of many with which they were familiar. Such a remark, coming from one of his high authority, was most improper. So far as he (Mr. Conolly) could recollect, no such imputation as the present had been made against the Irish bench of magistrates during the whole time the right hon. Gentleman was Chief Secretary. When the investigation took place, it would be found that the magistrates would be thoroughly exculpated.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: The hon. Gentleman opposite has been too hasty in imputing to me what he calls improper conduct. No doubt he is excited on this subject. [Mr. CONOLLY: Not at all.] At all events, I think he was not entitled to impute improper conduct to me. I wish, Sir, merely to say that the hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in thinking that I passed any judgment upon the conduct of the magistrates. I do not know who they are. I said I should reserve my judgment until after the investigation, when we should know the facts of the case. When I said that these events were too common in the North of Ireland, I meant party demonstrations of this kind.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, that the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Lanyon) had taken him by surprise. The hon. Gentleman said that the Orangemen of Belfast had been unjustly charged with being the originators of the Belfast riots.

MR. DENT: Sir, I rise to order. Have the Belfast riots anything to do with the question now before the House?

MR. SPEAKER said, that the observations were not out of order.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, that the Belfast riots of 1864 had been made the subject of a Government inquiry, of which he was the senior Commissioner, and that that Commission had affirmed that the riots were caused by the wanton and unprovoked assault of the Orangemen upon their inoffensive Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. Since the subject of Orangeism had been introduced into the debate, he ventured to express a hope that before the present Session of Parliament closed the question of the future existence of that society would be brought specifically before the House. He believed it would be well if Her Majesty's Government would take the subject in hand, and would propose the abolition of that most mischievous society. He could assure them that although by so doing they might lose the support of some hon. Members, they would be compensated by the general support of the people of Ireland. Every Member of the House who knew the judicial character of Mr. Justice Keogh would admit that he was not more conspicuous for his ability than for his strict impartiality.

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, he felt it to be his duty to stand up in defence of a body of men who had rendered the greatest possible service to their country. He was proud to say that he was a member of that body. And he could with confidence state, after an experience of nearly sixty years, that he knew of no act committed by the Orangemen of Ireland which he should be ashamed to acknowledge. Great fault had been found with them for the last few years for going in procession. Now he would state what he knew from his own actual knowledge on that subject. He acted on one occasion with General Lake, who led upwards of 30,000 men, with his (Sir William Verner's) father at their head, in the district with which he was connected, when all the loyal inhabitants, men, women, and children, turned out to meet them. He defied any person living to mention a single instance in which the Orangemen had ever attacked or insulted any man living. He would tell hon. Gentlemen opposite what was once said to him by Mr. Daniel O'Connell. He said—

"I know your tenantry as well as you know them yourself; I have heard from your Roman Catholic tenants that you never make any distinction between Roman Catholics and Protestants; and although you and I differ as much as any two men in existence, if you were to change from what you are now I should never respect you again."

He could not refrain from again expressing the pride he felt in having been for fifty years a member of the Orange body.

MR. COGAN congratulated the hon. Baronet on the courage he had displayed in standing up and so boldly declaring his opinions. He thought it required no ordinary courage to do so. It was, however, astonishing, and he thought deeply to be deplored, that at this time of day two hon. Members should have stood up in that House and avowed themselves members of the Orange society—a society which was not only inimical to the prosperity and harmony and peace under which fellow-citizens should live, which so fatally kept alive and fanned the flame of those religious animosities which had led to so many fatal conflicts in the North of Ireland, and which it ought to be the aim of every lover of his country to mitigate and extinguish, which made so many in that part of Ireland live in a sort of latent civil war at all times, which broke out periodically in such excesses as they all deplored, and which had been so strongly and repeatedly condemned by every tribunal before which its proceedings had come—by Committees of that House—by Addresses to the Throne by both Houses of Parliament—and by public opinion out of that House on so many occasions—

so far back as 1813 by Lord Castlereagh, subsequently by Mr. Canning, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Derby himself. He had hoped that after all this no member of the Orange body in that House would be found avowing his connection with it, and that the good sense and better feelings of those who represented that part of Ireland would rather have lent the weight of their influence and authority in putting an end to that mischievous organization, which by dividing against each other fellow-citizens of the same country, so tended to hurt and weaken the power of the Empire at large. This course might render it necessary to take the sense of Parliament again on the question as to whether such a society ought to be allowed to exist, and whether it did not poison the administration of justice in the North of Ireland, and shake the confidence of the people in that which it was of such consequence they should have faith in, that any injustice being suffered from, could and would be remedied by an impartial administration of the law. In the year 1860 he (Mr. Cogan) had brought this subject before the House when he proposed the introduction of the "Party Emblems Act," which was taken up at his suggestion by the then Government, and became law, and he then stated it as his conviction that, although these sort of laws might act as palliatives, and might check these insulting displays which had so often led to loss of life; that we must go deeper if we wanted to go to the root of this evil; that he trusted the increasing enlightenment of the age and greater toleration of opinion which had sprung up might induce those who had weight with the Orangemen, those who, by their education and station, held positions of influence which entailed responsibility, to put an end to these irritating party displays, and dissolve this society; but that if this hope was disappointed, it was the duty of the Government, from which they should not shrink, to discountenance and discourage it—to allow no member of the Orange society to hold public offices of honour, such as lords-lieutenant and deputy lieutenants of counties, and especially not to allow them to hold official positions, such as sheriffs, sub-sheriffs, clerks of the peace, or crown prosecutors—and above all, that they should not be intrusted with judicial functions as magistrates, for although they might act with the strictest impartiality, yet it was necessary that the administration of justice should be above suspicion, and that confidence in its entire impartiality in these frequent cases of party processions and riots should exist among the people. The whole question of Ireland must soon be dealt with boldly, and he wished he could hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be afraid to deal with this, which was a most important part of the question. He might, by doing so, lose the support of some Members from the North of Ireland by taking that course; but he would gain in public opinion, and other quarters, a strength that would more than counterbalance their loss. With regard to the particular case to which the attention of the House had been directed by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), and the conduct of the magistrates, he (Mr. Cogan) refrained from expressing any opinion whatever; the matter would be the subject of inquiry, and until that inquiry took place it would be clearly premature to come to any conclusion. His hon. Friend the Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had put the conduct of the magistrates in a point of view quite in contradiction to that presented by the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone and the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon, who seemed to have come there that night with regular briefs for the magistrates. The two defences—that by the hon. Members for Tyrone and Dungannon, and that by the hon. Member for Donegal—were evidently contradictory and at variance; they could not both be correct. If his hon. Friend the Member for Donegal was right, Mr. Lyle agreed with the Judge that informations ought to have been sent up against persons who were not sent for trial, and therefore that justice was not done. He expressed no opinion on the case as yet. Very properly, inquiry was promised, and he was confident that in the hands of the distinguished and eminent man who was now Lord Chancellor of Ireland a full and searching inquiry would take place into the conduct of the parties implicated in the matter which had been brought under the notice of the House; and that when that investigation was made, he would fearlessly deal with it so as to satisfy the people, in the words of the learned Judge, that “justice is not to be one-sided—one-handed.”

SIR HENRY EDWARDS trusted it would not be considered irregular or pre-

sumptuous on his part to address the House on what might be considered an Irish debate; but, as a Yorkshire Orangeman of twenty years' standing, he was proud of an opportunity of standing up in defence of that loyal society. He had little expected to hear such abuse lavished upon them, for they were men who would defend the Crown and the institutions of the country against all aggression—men who had hitherto been trusted by the Crown, and would, he hoped, continue to be so as long as a Protestant sat upon the Throne. He should not have intruded himself upon the notice of the House had he not felt bound to defend his brethren—the Orangemen of England—from the abuse which had been poured upon them by hon. Gentlemen opposite, not only below, but above the gangway; and also to protest against the most unjustifiable and violent attack made upon his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Dungannon by the originator of the Motion under discussion. He hoped there would be an end of such trash as the hon. Member has indulged in, for the Orangemen had as much right to have their opinions represented in that House as the Fenians had. [“Oh, oh!” “Hear, hear!” and “Order!”]

MR. AYRTON rose to order.

MR. ESMONDE moved that the hon. Baronet's words be taken down.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was out of order in applying such an expression to any Members of the House, after the terms in which the House had stigmatized Fenianism.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS hoped he had sufficiently the feeling of a gentleman to withdraw any expression which the Speaker, representing the House, might think he was bound to withdraw; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood the meaning of his words. He had simply meant the sympathizers with the Fenians. [“Hear, hear,” and “Oh, oh!”] He simply meant the sympathizers with the Fenians and Ribbonmen in that House. [“Oh, oh!” laughter, and cries of “Order!”]

MR. ESMONDE: I rise to order, Sir.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS: Sir, I will not, under the circumstances, attempt to prolong the debate.

MR. ESMONDE: I beg to move that the hon. Baronet's words be taken down—“sympathizers with Fenians in this House.”

MR. REARDEN: I second the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER : I expressed an opinion very decidedly with regard to the word "Fenian," and I express an opinion as strong with regard to the expression "sympathizers with Fenians." In answer to the Speech from the Throne, this House made use of these terms, that, "Fenianism was a conspiracy, adverse alike to authority, property, and religion, and disapproved and condemned alike by all who are interested in their maintenance." Therefore it certainly is an improper expression to address to any Member of this House, after that declaration has been made by the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sure my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Beverley (Sir Henry Edwards) will, on reflection, feel that he has, in the heat of debate, used expressions which it is impossible to justify, and which he will deeply regret; because, to suppose for a moment that any Gentleman, on whichever side of the House he may sit, can possibly sympathize with opinions of a seditious and treasonable character, is a course which it is quite impossible to justify. But I very much regret altogether the general character of the debate which has taken place. I was not present during the whole of it; but when I came in, it recalled the days when I first entered the House of Commons. About five-and-twenty or thirty years ago I did hear discussions of this kind, and when I came in I felt something like Rip Van Winkle when he awoke after his long slumber. In those days we used to bandy these accusations between the two sides of the House, and Members used to dilate on the respective merits of Protestants and Roman Catholics. But I really thought all this was agreed to be passed. For many years past, I must say, although we have had moments of great political excitement, and strong and fierce political excitement, we have never stumbled back into those old ways of bad repute, and I very much regret that by any circumstance whatever, a discussion has originated to-night which when I entered the House appeared to me to lead us back to the days which I hoped had been entirely forgotten. I am afraid it was the original character of this discussion which has brought us to the climax at which we find ourselves. But I think it so important that we should not allow the unfortunate backslidings of this evening to bring us back to a repetition of the scenes or a revival of the sentiments of the past with respect to this subject, that I hope both sides of the House will not allow this irritation to continue, but will assist any Gentleman who has been led in the heat of debate to use expressions which he must regret, to withdraw those expressions. The form of having the words taken down is not really necessary after you, Mr. Speaker, have interfered with so much propriety and such appreciation of the position of affairs. I hope we need not have recourse to these strict and technical proceedings; but that with a better feeling on both sides of the House we may put an end to this scene, and recur to those generous feelings of reciprocal regard which have hitherto characterized our proceedings. So far as the original question is concerned, I do not think there was the slightest necessity for the somewhat acrimonious feeling which has been exhibited on both sides. No doubt the subject itself might fairly have been brought under the consideration of the House, though I think it was brought forward in a manner much too elaborate and much too historical. I think my noble Friend (Lord Naas) treated it in a proper manner. If the learned Judge who is concerned makes a representation to the Government the Government will give to it that attention which a representation from such a quarter deserves. I remember the learned Judge in this House, of which he was a very able Member. He has proved himself a most admirable Judge, and I will not shrink from saying that I am proud of his personal acquaintance. I am sure he has performed his duty so far, and will for the future, in a manner not only honourable to himself but advantageous to society. I hope, therefore, that we may put an end to this misunderstanding, and that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Beverley will feel upon reflection that it will be a pleasure to him as a gentleman—and I know him to be a thorough one—to express regret that in the heat of debate he has used expressions which were not warranted, and which, I am sure, knowing him to be a man of extreme candour and friendly feeling, no one will more frankly or cordially retract than the hon. and gallant Member.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS: I have not had the experience of this House, during the last twenty years, without being able to appreciate kindness on the part of a friend. I deeply regret it is not in my power to give expression to my feelings in the manner that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has just sat down has done; but I should be the last man alive to say anything to lessen the dignity of this House; and I will cheerfully withdraw any un-Parliamentary expression used that may irritate the feelings of any Gentleman, or that may have the slightest tendency to inaugurate anything contrary to that which has always been the custom in the House of Commons.

MR. ESMONDE said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion withdrawn.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he wished to withdraw his Motion. ["No, no!"]

MR. BRADY said, he thought it would be much better, after the creditable way in which the question had been met by the Government, that the Motion should be withdrawn than that it should be negatived.

MR. SPEAKER: The rule of the House is that no Resolution can be withdrawn without the consent of the House; and as some hon. Gentlemen object to this Resolution being withdrawn, I must put it to the House.

ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT IN THE WEST INDIES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS said, he rose to call attention to the annual grant out of the Consolidated Fund of £20,300 towards the Ecclesiastical Establishment in the West Indies, and to move a Resolution on the subject—

MR. SPEAKER: One Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee of Supply having been negatived, it is not competent for the hon. Member to move another Amendment.

IRELAND—THE CONSTABULARY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he rose to draw attention to the conditions of superannuation as affecting the men of the Irish constabulary. For some time past difficulty had been experienced in obtaining sufficient recruits for the force from time to time, and the difficulty at last became so serious that the Government found it necessary to issue a Commission, which sat in Dublin for a considerable time, examined witnesses and received memorials from magistrates as to the efficiency and good conduct of the force. The Commission reduced the complaints that were made to three—first, that the claims that were made to superannuation after long service was not enough taken into account; second, that while the men had no prospect of promotion, the period of service was indefinite; and lastly, that the pay was inadequate. The first and third of these complaints were fairly met by the Commissioners, who embodied certain recommendations respecting them in a Bill that was hastily passed through both Houses of Parliament; but it was to the second cause of complaint that he desired to draw the attention of the House. The Commissioners stated, in their Report, that—

"The men feel that while the prospect of promotion is remote, the period of service is long and indefinite, and they would regard it as a great boon if they were allowed to enter for a fixed period of twenty or thirty years, and were after that time entitled to some pension."

The Commissioners consequently recommended an altered scale of superannuation. In several cases they reduced it; and, on the whole, he did not consider the alterations they made were open to complaint. But what he objected to was that in the 5th clause of the Bill embodying the recommendations of the Commissioners it was provided that no pension should be granted to the men in any case, except on the certificate of the surgeon of the force that the person claiming it was, from bodily or mental incapacity, unable to do duty any longer; and unless this certificate was granted, no member of the force was able to claim his superannuation except he had attained the age of sixty years or upwards. This rule might do very well for the higher ranks of the force; but he thought that, considering the arduous duties that the Irish constabulary had to perform—duties as much of a military as of a civil character—they ought to be entitled to their superannuation after twenty or thirty years' service. This would ensure a steady flow of promotion, retain many in the service who now left after ten years' service, and be an inducement to recruits to join. A man could obtain his pension after twenty-one years' service in the army, why not also in the Irish constabulary? They underwent as many hardships both by day and night and in all weather. Under the present system, if a man entered the force at twenty years of age, he must remain in it forty years before he could claim his superannuation. This was a great hardship, and must have the effect of keeping competent men out of the force, or of withdrawing them from it whenever they had an opportunity of exchanging the service for work that carried with it a better prospect of remuneration. The Commissioners had recommended this system, on the ground that they feared that the efficiency of the service would suffer if the superannuation were granted to the men at an earlier period, and that Parliament would refuse to sanction the extra expense that would be occasioned if twenty or twenty-five years' service were to entitle the men to superannuation. They admitted that a more liberal system prevailed in the army, and that the duties of the Irish police were frequently of a military character; but still they recommended, though without any sufficient reason, the more stringent system of superannuation for the Irish constabulary. They urged, however, that the question of promotion was one of serious importance, and no one who knew anything of the subject could feel any doubt of it. The Commissioners reported that at present—

“It requires a long period of service, verging possibly on twenty years, for a member of the force to attain the position of constable, and a further period of several years before he can become a first-class constable, where the promotion virtually stops, the advancement to the lower ranks of officers being very limited.”

They recommended that instead of three out of seven inspectors the number should be three out of six; but they left the superannuation just as it was, and in fact had passed over the whole question of promotion without any suggestion for the effectual removal of the grievance. In regard to what the Commissioners had said respecting the extra expense that would be the consequence of a more liberal scale of superannuation, he desired to call attention on the other hand to the great saving that had been effected by the number of additional duties that had lately been imposed upon the Irish constabulary without any extra remuneration whatever. There were stated in the Report of the Inspector General for 1864. The constabulary force were employed in collecting agricultural statistics. Also in the taking of the census in Ireland, the expense of which was only £2,000, while the expense in England was £67,000, and in Scotland £18,000, showing an expense of each enumerator in Ireland of 10s. 11d. against £2 3s. 7d. in England, and £2 5s. 8d. in Scotland. They were also employed in serving the notices of the Poor Law guardians, and in acting as inspectors of weights and measures. They also acted as a revenue police, looking after distilleries and private stills, and in this one item they had been the means of effecting a saving of £50,000 a year. Besides these, there were other minor duties which they performed. But he did not wish the House to be guided alone by financial considerations. The country had lately witnessed the position of difficulty into which the Irish constabulary had been placed; but they had never wavered in their loyalty, but had shown themselves to be courageous and worthy men, and deserving of the consideration of the country. He never could doubt what the conduct of the constabulary, under any circumstances, would be. He had never seen one of the force drunk in his life. All the additional duties cast upon them had been discharged most efficiently. He hoped the House and the Government would not refuse to take the case into consideration.

LORD NAAS said, he quite admitted the numerous and important additional duties which had of late years been imposed on the Irish constabulary, and the efficient manner in which they had been performed. But the question of superannuation really resolved itself almost entirely into one of finance, and he thought the House, before pledging itself to the recommendation involved in his hon. and gallant Friend's proposal, would recollect what took place with reference to this force last year. A great scheme in relation to the pay of the constabulary had been under the consideration of the late Government, and this was submitted to the Commission of Inquiry which sat in Dublin, presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich. The recommendations of that Commission were carried out by the Bill which he had the honour to introduce towards the close of last Session, and the effect of the scheme was to benefit very much the constabulary of Ireland as a body, as regarded their pay and allowances. The original Estimate for pay, allowances, and superannuation of the Irish constabulary was £736,000, and the supplemental charge was no less than £95,000, in order to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. The House would therefore see how very considerable was the boon which had been conferred on the force. A great increase of pay would take place in the lower grades of the force, for this simple reason—that the Commissioners had discovered that, though the higher branch of the force was very fairly paid, the lower grades were very much underpaid. An increase of pay had accordingly been made. The sub-constable of six years' service—representing the cream of the force—now received £38 8s. 4d., whereas he formerly received only £27 2s., and this increase in the pay of over 11,000 men amounted to a considerable sum. The sub-constable, moreover, of twelve years' service had had an increase of £11, and the sub-constable of twenty years' service one of £6 3s. per annum. In the higher branches the improvement was much smaller; but, on the whole, according to Colonel Villiers, the force had been placed in a much better position. The result had been that, whereas on the 1st of February, 1866, there were 1,864 vacancies, there were on the 15th of this month only 1,198. There were, too, 111 candidates for admission now on the books. Last year there was not one, and a superior class of men had been induced to join the force. The present charge for superannuation was very considerable, it being this year £93,127, on a pay of £849,000. The men had hitherto subscribed 2½ per cent of their pay to that fund; but in future they would subscribe 1½ per cent to the reward fund, so that their deduction would be 1 per cent less. No change was made by the Act of last Session in the amount of superannuation that was payable to the men at present in the force; but there would be a great change with regard to the superannuation of the men who would hereafter enter the force. The present superannuation was very liberal and very high compared with other services. A man who entered the force previously to 1847 was entitled to two-thirds of his salary after a service of fifteen years, and to the whole of his salary after a service of twenty years. Those who entered the force subsequently would be entitled to two-thirds of their salary after twenty years' service, and to the whole of their salary after thirty years service. If the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend were carried out, men would generally leave the service at the age of forty or forty-five, because they entered it between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four. Therefore, they would leave the force at the very time when, as constables or head constables, their services would be most valuable. No doubt if a man remained in the force till he was sixty his services would not be very valuable; but it would be most imprudent to alter the important arrangement which was arrived at last year. That arrangement conferred lasting benefits on the force, and he believed it was perfectly satisfactory to the great majority of the force. It had not conferred much benefit on a few of the older members of the force, but they stood in a very fair position previously. It would be very unwise to make so great an alteration in it as had been suggested by the hon. and gallant Member, especially as the new superannuation scale would not come into operation for nearly fifteen years.

MR. O'REILLY said, the object in view was not to increase, but simply to define, the number of years which a man should serve without being worn out, and so avoid his being compelled to hold on until he could obtain a certificate that he was unfit to serve any longer. The Army Commission found that the average soldier was not fit for service after above twenty years' service, and the same rule would, no doubt, apply equally to the constabulary, whose duties were of an arduous character. The present term of service was calculated to lead to "ma-lingering" and discontent. The difference to the public in point of money on the fixing of the period suggested would be very little compared with the beneficial effect the change would have in the force. Had the hon. and gallant Gentleman made any calculation as to how many of the men had served for twenty-five years? At the present time the police force was employed hunting Fenians through the snow in the mountains, and could it be said that as a rule men would be fit to do such work after they had gone through twenty-five years' service? A considerable proportion of the men had already retired by the time they had reached the period of twenty-five years' service, and all that was suggested was that the whole of the men should have the option of retiring at that period of their career. He was convinced that it would give great satisfaction if the men knew that they would have the right to retire at a certain fixed time, instead of it being insisted that they should remain in the force so long as anything could be got out of them.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he could not agree with his noble Friend (Lord Naas) that the arrangements that had been lately made were regarded with satisfaction by the constabulary. Had it been easier to obtain recruits during the last six months than it was previously? His experience was that they complained that they were not allowed to leave the service until they were worn out. The truth was that the men got out of the service when they wished by procuring a medical certificate, even although they were at the time in such a state of health that they could, if they liked, continue in the service. He believed that a very great proportion of the men now left the service at an early period. Indeed, many of them entered it only to acquire money enough to take them to America. It would be much more desirable that they should have a retiring pension than an increase of pay. He believed that the organization of the police might be made infinitely more perfect and at a much less cost, than under the present system. He hoped he should see the day when they would have the police force in Ireland established on the same footing as that in England. The subject was a very important one, and he hoped the Irish Government would re-consider it. It was perfectly absurd and even mischievous to put forth, as was done in the Report of the Commission, that the constabulary should be paid out of the local funds when the greater part of their duty was Imperial.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he regretted, as a Member of the Commission, that he had not had as a Colleague his hon. and gallant Friend (General Dunne), because he believed he was capable of affording a vast deal of valuable information on this subject. It was an unfortunate circumstance that when that Commission was appointed the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in Ireland, and his hon. and gallant Friend suddenly left the country. He had a very strong opinion on the subject of promotion—that the more they encouraged the men by promotion the better it would be for the force generally. He could bear his testimony to the value of the Irish police for the maintenance of good order and British rule in Ireland; but he thought the expense should be partly borne by local taxation. He denied that the Commission over which he had the honour to preside had abolished the good service pay. They found, however, that they could not both increase the pay and fix the term of service at the same time. As for a man being in the decline of life at forty-five, he should very much regret to think so.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

£2,000, Special Rewards to certain members of the Irish Constabulary Force.

LORD NAAS said, that after the gratifying discussion that took place some short time since in that House, he should only be wasting time in entering fully into the Vote. He felt certain that the Committee would vote this small sum with the greatest satisfaction, in order to place at their disposal the means of rewarding those men who had done such great service. The rewards would be distributed as fairly and equitably as possible, according to the services rendered. The Government had also under their consideration the propriety of giving honorary rewards. Of course, it was a matter requiring great consideration; but he hoped to be able to bring the subject very shortly before the House. The country was under great obligation to the force, and especially to the gallant officer at its head, who had exhibited qualities, during the late difficulties, which enhanced the reputation he had previously acquired in the service of his country. He had great pleasure in moving the Vote.

MR. COGAN said, he wished to express his concurrence in the Vote. It was satisfactory to find that the police force had been able to put down this insurrection.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he wished to express his satisfaction in the course proposed by the Government. Rewards to be effectual should be prompt. Had it not been for the recognition of the services of the force by the House on a former occasion, and also what had passed in the other House, he should have asked for the postponement of the Vote in order that it might be discussed in a fuller House; but, under the circumstances, he thought he need not do so. The manner in which the force had discharged its duty was deserving of the highest praise. He was glad that the Government had under its consideration also rewards of an honorary nature.

Mr. O'BEIRNE said, that as he had not the opportunity upon a recent occasion, when the conduct of the Irish constabulary formed the subject of so much just commendation in that House, to express his concurrence in the general and willing testimony which was borne to their devoted, and, he might add, chivalrous loyalty, he was anxious now to be permitted to do so; and as the representative of an Irish constituency also, to offer his acknowledgments to Her Majesty's Government for the well-considered and firm steps they adopted to protect the country from the serious danger which lately threatened it. He was happy to find that the noble Lord so promptly recognised the services of the constabulary, and that, as the organ of the Irish Government in that House, he had paid a just and generous tribute to a body of men who had for years entitled themselves to the confidence of the country, and who had upon a recent occasion so amply proved the high spirit by which they were influenced. But he entertained a feeling of regret with reference to the Vote now submitted. He could have wished that the Government had much enlarged the amount now proposed. He thought £2,000 was quite insufficient for the purpose intended; and he believed the country would readily offer a more substantial recognition of the services which that Vote was intended to reward. However, he was unwilling to interfere with the action of the Government, and his support should be very heartily given to the proposal now submitted by the noble Lord; although he could not help repeating his belief that it was by no means so substantial a return as the very remarkable and exceptional circumstances which had led to its being submitted to the Committee would have justified. The noble Lord had informed them that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to confer some honourable distinction upon the Members of the constabulary who had so eminently entitled themselves to the gratitude of the country; and he hoped in that recognition they would find a compensation for what he believed to be the insufficiency of the amount now asked for.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he could bear testimony to the excellent manner in which the Dublin metropolitan police had discharged their duty in Dublin in apprehending members of the Fenian conspiracy, much larger than the body of men who apprehended them.

LORD NAAS said, that the Dublin metropolitan police would be included in any honorary reward.

PETITION FROM COLCHESTER.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in presenting a Petition praying for the Industrial Employment of Troops in their leisure hours, said, that it was a petition which had been agreed to at a large public meeting in Colchester, and had been forwarded to him by the Mayor of that town. The subject was one of considerable importance, and had already engaged the attention of Parliament. It appeared to the petitioners that the condition of the troops required some alteration in order to improve their sanitary condition and increase their usefulness, and they represented that if the soldiers were more regularly and more usefully employed it would tend not only to the improvement of their discipline but also to the improvement of their sanitary condition. At present the soldier had about eight hours out of every twenty-four, which he spent in idleness and dissipation, to the injury of his health. It was well known that on various occasions when our troops had been called into active service, and especially during the Crimean war, those of the troops who had previously been stationed in large towns found their constitutions so much damaged by the life they had led that they were unable to bear the ordinary hardships and privation of the campaign. The petitioners thought that at the various stations where Her Majesty's troops were permanently placed—as at Aldershot—it would be well, after the exercise of the day, to employ the men in some useful work which would tend to their instruction and the improvement of their general health, and which might also be remunerative to them, and the money they thus earned might be husbanded for them by the Government until the end of their term of service. They thought the troops might be taught the use of the spade, and gardens might be allotted to them, and they might also be taught to repair their own arms and construct their own barracks. Four hours a day out of the eight which were now given up to idleness might be thus employed, and if they were to receive  $1\frac{1}{2}$  an hour for the time, they would have at the end of their twenty years' service a considerable sum to draw, which might be of very great advantage to them.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that the subject was one which had attracted considerable interest and had been much considered of late years by the War Office and others concerned. The late Lord Herbert and Sir George Lewis took great interest in it, and invited Committees to report upon it. This interest had been fully maintained by their successors up to the present time; and Parliament itself had been well informed in the matter. He would mention a few of the papers laid before Parliament since 1862 which he now had before him. In the year 1862 a Report was presented on Soldiers' Recreation Rooms. The next was the Report of a Committee of 1863 on the Instruction and Employment of Soldiers in Trades. The Sessional Paper No. 181 of 1863 contained Correspondence as to the Employment of Soldiers in Trades. In 1864 there was a valuable Return respecting the Success of Soldiers' Workshops in India. In 1865 there was a Return of the soldiers instructed in trades, &c.; and in the same year there was a Report of garden grounds allotted to troops, and a Return of regulations of army libraries and recreation-rooms. These documents showed that Parliament had not been idle. The reason why greater progress had not been made was the expense; because if all the recommendations of these Committees had been carried out, a much greater expenditure would have been incurred than Parliament could reasonably be expected to sanction. There were, however, Votes in the Army Estimates of the present year of £1,000 for soldiers' workshops; £5,000 for schools; £8,000 for gymnasia and skittle-grounds; £5,000 for reading-rooms; and £4,500 for supply of books. The question of the employment of soldiers in trades was one of considerable complication. It was spoken of as a simple and easy project which was certain to be followed by satisfactory results; but satisfactory results did not always immediately follow these excellent proposals. It might be possible, as the noble Earl's (the Earl of Hardwicke) petition seemed to contemplate, to make on paper an accurate distribution of the soldier's time, allowing eight hours for sleep and recreation, eight hours for military duty, leaving a balance of eight hours for industrial employment; but in practice the calculation would fail. The only instance in which the experiment of employing soldiers in workshops had been fairly tried was in India. There the circumstances were peculiarly favourable, because there were there a large number of troops who had a great amount of leisure time and not much military duty to perform. Lord Strathnairn, whose energy in war had not failed him in peace, had personally visited every workshop at every station within his reach, and the result appeared in the Return moved for in April, 1864, by Sir Harry Verney—a very valuable paper, well worthy of their Lordships' attention. It was comparatively easy to withdraw a number of soldiers from their regimental duties for a time and employ them in military work. This was sometimes done in the case of the Engineers and other troops; but it was by no means so simple and easy to provide tools and workshops, without interrupting their military duties, for soldiers who might be disposed to work for two or three hours or at odd times in the intervals of their drill, &c. The question was put some years ago to several soldiers of the old school—among others, to Sir George Brown, who was second to no officer in the army in the interest which he took in the real welfare of the soldier; but who saw great doubts and difficulties in the way; and his opinions was shared by many other officers. At the present time, however, from the information he had received, he (the Earl of Longford) anticipated the most cordial assistance on the part of every officer whose co-operation in these schemes might be invited. There were two or three foreign stations—such as the Mauritius and Hong Kong—in which the system was now in operation, but from which no exact reports as to the results had been received. The circumstances of the army at home were known to their Lordships. The troops were kept in constant movement, and were consequently unable to commence any scheme which required a settled position and a greater command of leisure than the military authorities were enabled to place at their disposal. As to the proposal for allotting garden grounds to soldiers, it was obvious that the scheme could be carried out only at a few stations where the soldiers being fixed for a length of time would reap where they had sown. The soldiers themselves had exhibited a desire to undertake any useful work; the public seemed to approve the proposal; and, as both War Office and Horse Guards were entirely favourable to the project, he hoped progress would be made in the right direction, and that before long Returns would be presented to their Lordships showing results at home as distinctly favourable as those in places where experiment had firmly established the feasibility of the scheme.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: No one is more anxious than the military authorities to adopt the proposal spoken of by the petitioners; but the difficulties in their way are obvious, and in some cases I am afraid they are almost insurmountable. The position of the troops in England is very different from that of the troops in France. In that country there are troops sufficient for every purpose; but in England the forces are kept down to the lowest point that the requirements of the service will allow. The requirements of the service at home are such that the troops are seldom more than two or three months together at one station; so that a regiment would think it inexpedient to incur the necessary expense for starting the soldiers in their work, either in the workshop or the garden. If the troops were fixed a long time at one station, there would be nothing to prevent us carrying out the admirable system suggested; but, as a matter of fact, we cannot insure their non-removal, and hence the difficulty. In India the case is different. There the troops remain for long periods in one quarter, and Lord Strathnairn was able to introduce the system of workshops with marked success. I believe the same was done in Bombay and Madras by Sir William Mansfield and Sir Hope Grant. In the Mauritius, too, the same facilities exist; at that station the troops remain for four or five years together, and have time for military duties and also for industrial employment. The opportunities offered by these conditions of military life are such as should not be lost sight of, and we take advantage of them; indeed, we are introducing the system in every part of the world to the fullest possible extent; but nowhere do we meet with such difficulties as we are likely to meet with at home. In some cases a regiment is not more than a few months on the same station, and when removed it may never probably return, and these removals would entail considerable loss and disappointment if the men had to leave their workshops and gardens. Indeed, the difficulties in the way of adopting this scheme are greater than the public, and perhaps your Lordships, are aware of. The military authorities, however, from myself down to the junior officers, all appreciate the advantage the army would derive from the adoption of the system, and they will, I am sure, all endeavour to further any arrangements which may be made to carry it out efficiently. The question of expense has been referred to; but in cases where absolute advantage will accrue from additional expenditure no objection to incurring it will, I am sure, be made on the part of the public. The question of troops repairing their own barracks has already been under discussion; that, I think, is employment which soldiers may very well be put to. The vexation caused by the item "barrack damages" cannot well be overestimated; the troops not only object to the charge itself, but think the proportion charged above what it should be. Very little skilled labour, too, is needed for repairing barracks beyond what troops can well perform; so that in this respect we may hope for satisfactory results. For my part, I hope the system will be largely introduced; and, if it should not be so, your Lordships may rely upon it that nothing prevents its general adoption but the difficulties incident to the nature of the service at home.

EARL GREY thought it must be gratifying to their Lordships to hear that the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War and the illustrious Duke who followed him were impressed with the importance of the subject, and were disposed to adopt the system which the petitioners advocated; of the difficulties alluded to he was quite aware, but he believed they would be overcome as soon as the subject received the attention it deserved. He had reminded their Lordships not long since of the great anomaly that when the great establishment at Aldershot was being formed all the draining and road-making—descriptions of work peculiarly adapted for the instruction of soldiers in the requirements of actual service—were executed not by the soldiers but by contract. He had not made that statement on official authority, but he had read it in the newspapers, and it had not been contradicted to his knowledge. That single fact called for improvement, and he hoped the disposition to favour a better system of things would prevent such an incident occurring again.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he could not refrain from expressing his satisfaction at the tone of the discussion. He was glad to hear the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War and the illustrious Duke approve the adoption of the system proposed as far as possible. The difficulties were undoubtedly considerable; but he had been led to think them far from insurmountable, especially when considered in the light of the Report of a Committee appointed by the late Sir George Lewis in 1862. The Committee was composed of officers of distinction and experience; they put a series of questions upon this subject to all the General Officers commanding districts in Great Britain, Ireland, and the Channel Islands, and only one General Officer and one regimental Board reported unfavourably upon it. The General Officer was Sir George Brown, who was at that time Commander of the Forces in Ireland, and the regimental Board was one at Dublin, under the immediate influence of that officer. That gave him hope that the difficulties in the way of adopting the system might be overcome. He was quite sure that as soon as it became known that the War Office and Horse Guards desired the system to be fairly tried, commanding officers would be anxious to assist in doing so; and he would suggest that the orders regulating the experiments might not be too stringent; commanding officers should, he thought, at first have great latitude allowed them in this respect, and when experience had given the authorities some solid information to work upon, fuller regulations might be framed for the future.

BANNS OF MATRIMONY.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether he considers the doubts which have arisen as to the legal time for the publication of Banns of Matrimony in churches during morning service to be well founded; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure during the present Session for removing those doubts, for legalizing Marriages knowingly solemnized without due publication of Banns, and for relieving clergymen who may have celebrated such Marriages from the serious penalties they have incurred under the Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 76?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I do not, Sir, myself entertain any doubt as to the proper time for the publication of banns; but different opinions are held on the subject by gentlemen well entitled to express an opinion. In point of fact, it is well known that marriages have been solemnized at both the times in question. The subject is undoubtedly one of very great importance, and the Government are considering whether it may not be possible to bring in a Bill this Session to remove the doubts and to remedy the consequences of those doubts.

KINGSTON ASSIZES.—QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a trial at the Kingston Assizes, where two men, Burton, aged twenty-three, and Hay, aged twenty-nine, were indicted for burglary, before Mr. Baron Bramwell, and sentenced to seven and ten years' penal servitude respectively ; to the fact that the convicts were violent and abusive on receiving their sentence, and, having been removed from the bar by the police, were ordered to be brought back by the Judge, who thereupon sentenced them each to a further term of five years' penal servitude ?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that his attention had not been called to the circumstance until after the hon. Member had given Notice of his Question ; and as no official communication had been made to him on the subject, he was unable to make any statement on the subject at the present moment.

MR. GILPIN said, he would repeat the Question on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, when he lately gave notice to the House that he intended to disregard the recent Resolution of a majority of the House in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment in the Army, and to introduce the usual Clause on that subject in the Mutiny Bill, as if no such Resolution had been carried, he had consulted His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief on the subject, and had the approval of his Royal Highness in making that announcement ?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON : Sir, I must, in the first place, take exception to the terms of the Question of my hon. Friend. I cannot admit that I ever gave notice to this House that I intended to disregard the recent Resolution which it came to on this subject. I merely intimated to the House my opinion that, under all the circumstances of that majority, I thought it was desirable that the extent of that Resolution should be re-considered ; but I think I have given abundant evidence to the House that I did not intend to disregard that Resolution. In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have only to say that, in accordance with the Constitution of the War Department, the communications between the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State for War are very frequent. The Secretary of State, however, is responsible for the Administration of the War Department. He is responsible for what he says or does in his official capacity in this House ; and I cannot think that the House will expect or desire that the Secretary of State should be called upon to state the times, circumstances, and subjects of those consultations with the Commander-in-Chief, which are almost of daily occurrence.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH : I wish to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman declines to answer my Question ? ["Order, order !"]

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House a Copy of the Judge's or short-hand writer's notes of the evidence on the trial of John Toomer, who was convicted of rape and sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude at the last Summer Assizes for Reading ; and, of all Memorials and Correspondence relating to the case ?

MR. WALPOLE : Sir, I regret very much that for reasons which I will briefly advert to I do not think that I am at liberty to lay the papers to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers upon the table of the House. Those papers are of a peculiarly private and confidential character, and contain matters affecting the character and conduct of third parties, and unless an opportunity were given to those parties to explain such observations as might be made about them, it would be a great injustice to them to make the papers public. Moreover, there is no precedent for the production of such papers, and to establish one will virtually be an interference with the prerogative of the Crown, and will make the House a Court of Appeal in criminal cases. Any one, I think, who considers the subject, will agree with me that it would be hardly competent for me to produce the papers asked for. At the same time, I may say that the facts of this case do not appear to me to have been sufficiently well understood—nay, in some respects appear to have been much misrepresented—if not perverted. Although, therefore, I cannot consent to lay the papers upon the table, because it would introduce a precedent which would be very inconvenient were it to be followed, yet I wish it to be understood that any explanations which I have to offer, or any requirements which may be made of me with reference to any conduct that I have pursued upon the matter, are perfectly legitimate subjects of inquiry, and I am perfectly willing to offer such explanations as may be required. Having said this much, I shall now, Sir, with the permission of the House, venture to state what really has taken place in regard to this matter so far as I myself am concerned. Toomer was tried for rape in July last. An application was made to me a few weeks afterwards on his behalf. Toomer himself signed a petition, in which he stated his own view of the case; said that the prosecutrix had been living with him on familiar terms; that he was entirely innocent of the crime, and asking that further inquiry might take place with the view of granting him a free pardon. That Memorial was accompanied by other documents, and I, in accordance with the course which I always take upon such occasions, referred the Memorial and the other documents to the Judge who presided at the trial. The learned Judge subsequently forwarded to me the notes of evidence and also his own opinion upon the case. From those notes two things were clear—first, that whether Toomer was innocent or guilty of the crime, it was perfectly clear that the statement which he made in his Memorial was not only unfortified but was totally at variance with the evidence; and secondly, that the whole matter apparently turned upon the credibility of the different witnesses. If the prosecutrix was to be believed, then the verdict of guilty could be sustained. If, on the other hand, the two female witnesses were to be believed, then Toomer was certainly not guilty. The matter, therefore, resolved itself into a question of credibility, as any one will see who takes the trouble to go through the evidence. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy. On being asked what was the meaning of their recommendation, they stated that there were extenuating circumstances; and on being again asked what they meant by that, they said that the prosecutrix had been indiscreet. The jury, however, did not appear to have any doubt that the crime was proved against Toomer, and the learned Judge was certainly of that opinion, as also were many of those who were present at the time of the trial. The application which was made to me was for a free pardon; but the House will see that I could not have recommended a pardon to be granted without deliberately deciding that the prosecutrix was guilty of perjury, and that the two maid servants ought to have been believed and not disbelieved as they had been by the jury. This was a case rather coming within the peculiar province of a jury, as it was a question involving the determination of facts. It was a case relating to the credibility of evidence, which could not be tried by me or any other tribunal, excepting in one way, and that was to allow Toomer to prosecute for perjury the person who had accused him, and upon whose evidence he had been convicted. A letter was accordingly written from the Home Office, giving no opinion upon the merits of the case, but intimating to Toomer that he would be at liberty to prosecute Miss Partridge for perjury. Had such a course been adopted, and had such an indictment been sustained, there can be no doubt that the innocence of Toomer might have been established. But objections have been stated against the recommendation of prosecuting the woman who gained the case for perjury. The first was that a conviction for perjury could not be obtained except upon the testimony of two witnesses, and the second was, that as Toomer was a felon he had forfeited his property to the Crown, and would have no means of trying the case. In answer to the first point, I may say that there were two witnesses—namely, the servants—and I am told it is perfectly clear that if these two servants could have corroborated the evidence of Toomer as to what took place on the Sunday night, and there was no reason to doubt them, that a verdict would have been obtained in favour of Toomer. With regard to the second point, I may state that I made inquiry and found that the property forfeited to the Crown was only a very limited proportion, Toomer having previous to his trial conveyed a very considerable amount of property to his father. Both objections, therefore, were such as could not be sustained. The prosecution took place last autumn, and from that time to this I have received no application whatever upon the subject. Since the meeting of Parliament, I have been asked by hon. Members whether the sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude ought to be allowed to stand. My answer is that that point has never been brought before me in any way. Had any memorial been presented upon the subject, it would have been considered, or if any deputation had waited upon me it would have been received, and their representations would have received due consideration.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether Papers, such as those I have just asked for, were not laid before the House in the case of Jessie M'Laughlan?

MR. WALPOLE: Yes; but the case of Jessie M'Laughlan was a very peculiar case. In that case there was this important difference, that the question of the guilt or innocent of a third party (Mr. Fleming) was involved. If the papers are granted in the present instance similar papers cannot be refused in any other, and the appeal in criminal cases will virtually be transferred to this House.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any alteration in the arrangement or the provisions of the Bill for amending the Representation of the People before inviting the House to discuss the Clauses in Committee; and, whether he is willing to lay upon the table the Reports or other documents from which he quoted on Tuesday the opinions of the present and late Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue respecting the proposed taxing franchise?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is not my intention to lay on the table the communications from which I read freely, and without reserve to the House, the other night, but which were strictly of an informal character. I shall therefore not place them on the table. With regard to the other and more important Question put by the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that to-night I shall put on the Paper a Notice that in Committee of the Whole House on the Representation of the People Bill I shall move the omission of Clause 7—that is, the clause which proposes to give a second vote, in respect of which I act according to the statement I made to the House the other evening. With regard to all other controverted points, I beg to state that I think the House in Committee will be able to find the best solution, and that we shall enter into that Committee with the most anxious desire, in co-operation with the House, to bring the subject of Parliamentary Reform to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: With reference, Sir, to the answer just delivered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I beg to ask my noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn, who on a previous night said the Government would introduce a Bill by which they would stand or fall, what are the provisions of that Bill by which the Government will stand or fall?

LORD STANLEY: That, Sir, is rather matter for argument and discussion than for a Question; and when our debates on that subject are resumed, I shall be quite ready to answer any observations my noble Friend likes to make.

UTILIZATION OF SEWAGE ACT.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, looking to the doubts that exist as to parishes, any part of which may be under the Local Government Act (1858), being able to avail themselves either of the Utilization of Sewage Act (1865) or of the Sanitary Act (1866), the Government is prepared to amend the Law so as to enable parishes so circumstanced to bring themselves under the operation of those Acts?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, in reply that the object of the Sewage Utilization Act was to extend the powers and benefits of the Local Government Act to rural parishes. The reason why a parish, any part of which may be under the Local Government Act, is unable to avail itself of the Sewage Utilization Act, or of the first part of the Sanitary Act of 1866, was the difficulty of avoiding contemporaneous jurisdictions and two systems of rating over the same area. Taking the case of Enfield, for example. That town was situated in a large agricultural parish, twenty miles in diameter. Farmers twenty miles off objected to be rated for the sewerage of that town. Enfield, therefore, put itself under the Local Government Act and rated itself and sewered the town. Now, it would be manifestly unfair that the whole parish should come under the Sewage Utilization Act, and erect a second jurisdiction over Enfield, and subject the town to two rates merely for the benefit of the rural part of the parish. The only way in which the rural part could obtain these advantages, as it seemed to him, would be to extend the boundaries of the town, and therefore of the operation of the Local Government Act also, over the whole parish. But here, again, the rating difficulty would stand in the way. This point, however, and other amendments in the Sanitary Act, were under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but he could not say what they might see fit to carry out during the present Session.

GRAND DUCHY OF LUXEMBOURG.

QUESTION.

MR. SANDFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information of the sale of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg to the Emperor of the French?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, in the course of this morning I received from the Hague a despatch containing a translation of a notice which appeared in the official organ of the Government of Holland. It is to this effect:—"We are requested by the Luxembourg Chancellerie to contradict most positively the report that a cession of the Grand Duchy has taken place." I apprehend there can be no doubt that communications have passed between the Governments of France and of Holland with reference to the possible transfer of that territory; but as to the result of those communications, I am not in a position to give any information to the House, not knowing what has happened.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether he will postpone until after Easter the Second Reading of the Bankruptcy Bill, in order that Commercial Associations in the provinces may have an opportunity for the due consideration of its provisions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, he should regret if the commercial bodies interested in such a Bill had not the fullest opportunity of considering its provisions; but if an opportunity between this and Easter arose for taking the second reading of the Bill, he thought that if he did not avail himself of it it would be equivalent to an abandonment of the measure. There would be abundant opportunities of considering any point that might arise, and he hoped the hon. Member would not object to the second reading should it come on before Easter.

ARMY—THE WAR OFFICE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any application has been made by the Secretary of State for War to the Lords of the Treasury, founded on a memorial from the permanent staff of the War Office, and recommended by the heads of departments and the Under Secretaries of State, for the payment of the salaries monthly instead of quarterly in the War Department; and, if such an application has been made, whether he intends to give orders that it shall be complied with?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that such an application had been made by the War Office this year. Applications had also been made in previous years to a similar effect. But as it would be impossible to give that privilege to the War Office without extending it to the other branches of the Civil Service, which would involve an increase in the establishment of the Pay Office, the applications had been refused. At the same time, he might state that the clerks in the War Office whose salary was under £100 per annum were enabled to draw their pay half-quarterly.

CESSION OF RUSSIAN AMERICA TO THE UNITED STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has received any official corroboration of the statement in The Times of that day relative to the cession of the whole of Russian America and the adjacent islands to the United States?

LORD STANLEY: When I left the Foreign Office, Sir, a quarter of an hour ago no despatch had been received from our Minister at Washington, either confirming or contradicting the rumour. I telegraphed this morning to St. Petersburg for information upon the subject, but sufficient time has not elapsed for me to receive an answer.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to know, whether any information has reached the Government of any negotiations between Russia and the United States, with reference to this alleged cession of territory?

IRELAND—THE TYRONE MAGISTRATES QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received from Mr. Justice Keogh any Report in reference to the Magistrates of whose conduct he (Captain Archdall) complained some three weeks ago; and whether, in the event of no Report being received by the Government within a reasonable time, the noble Lord will, in justice to those gentlemen, institute an inquiry with reference to that complaint?

LORD NAAS: Sir, I have received no communication of the nature referred to from Mr. Justice Keogh. As to the second part of the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, that will be matter for the Government to consider before I can give an answer.

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the House will adjourn for the Easter holidays, and when meet again?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The usual recess, Sir, will commence on the 12th of this month, and close on the 29th; but whether the usual recess will be moved or not is at present in the hands of fate.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE REFORM LEAGUE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, Whether the report in the leading journals of his speech to Mr. Beales and the Reform League deputation was substantially correct. He believed that reporters were present, or he should not ask the Question. ["Order, order!"]

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my answer will be very simple. I have not had the pleasure, or satisfaction, or advantage, of reading that report.

WAR CLERKS' SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE, alluding to his former Question as to the payment monthly of the clerks in the War Department by the Treasury, asked, Whether this privilege was not in force at the Admiralty, Post Office, and the Treasury?

MR. HUNT said, he believed that the privilege was confined to the Post Office, and there it had occasioned some additional expense.

MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

New Clause 22.

(Every soldier shall upon enlistment be placed in the First Class of the Army, and no soldier in such class shall, in time of peace, be sentenced to the corporal punishment of flogging; every soldier in the First Class, for the commission of certain offences, to be specified from time to time in the Articles of War, be degraded to the Second Class of the Army, and every soldier in the Second Class shall be liable to be sentenced by Court Martial to corporal punishment not exceeding fifty lashes for the following offences, viz. mutiny, insubordination accompanied with personal violence or disgraceful conduct of an indecent kind; every soldier, when serving with a military force in the field or on board ship, shall be liable to a like punishment by Court Martial for any of the offences before enumerated, or for desertion, drunkenness on duty or on the line of march, misbehaviour, or neglect of duty.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'may' be there inserted."

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask the Chairman what was the exact position in which the Committee were placed with regard to this clause. As far as he understood the matter, the first two lines of the clause were agreed to on Thursday evening, when an Amendment was moved to substitute the word "may" for the word "shall" in the third line of the clause. It was now proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for War to substitute another clause for the clause under the consideration of the Committee. He wished to ask the Chairman of the Committee whether, on the present occasion, the Committee could consider any other clause than the one before them?

MR. DODSON: The question which is before the Committee is whether, in the third line of the proposed new clause, the word "may" shall be inserted.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The hon. Member is quite accurate in the description he has given as to the position at which the Committee has arrived with reference to this clause. I take this opportunity of expressing my hope that the Committee will allow the whole of this clause to be omitted, and that they will permit me to substitute in its place the clause of which I have given notice. If the Committee will indulge me for a short time I will endeavour in a few words to explain my reasons for making this proposal. In the first place, I have to state that in consequence of misapprehensions that occurred on Thursday night, I have found it very difficult so to alter the clause now before us as to make it accord with the alterations which I consented to make on Thursday night. Therefore, I thought that the better and more simple course would be to move to omit the clause before us, and to bring up a new clause in its place. The position in which we stand is this. On Thursday evening a decision was taken on the principle which is common to both these clauses—that principle being that whatever alteration the Committee might make the punishment of flogging should not be altogether abandoned in the army. The decision of the House was in favour of that principle by a very large majority in a full House. It then became a question what arrangement could be made consistently with the concession that the Government desired to make in order to carry out the decision of the House. It is perfectly true that I had expressed my willingness to exempt altogether from corporal punishment soldiers of the first class, and it is equally true that I had also intended to exempt soldiers in the second class from liability to corporal punishment except for three descriptions of offences; but, after listening to the debate on Thursday evening, I could not help seeing that there was a very strong feeling on both sides of the House against retaining the punishment of flogging for the third offence, and therefore I felt that it was my duty to defer to that feeling. The result of this decision is, that in the clause I have drawn up the punishment of flogging will be restricted to the offences of mutiny and insubordination accompanied with personal violence. I must further say that I could not be insensible to the opinions which were expressed by hon. Gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House—opinions which were entitled to great weight—that it was not desirable that with regard to these two grave offences any classification should exempt the soldier who was guilty of them from corporal punishment. The clause I ask the Committee to insert, therefore, extends the punishment of flogging for offences of this description to all soldiers in the army without distinction of class. I must remind the Committee that this is not in any way a party question; and therefore I trust that the clause will be supported by a large majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House. For my own part, I conceive it to be my duty to endeavour to carry out to the best of my ability the view on this subject which the House may take. Under these circumstances the Committee will, I trust, adopt the clause, about the latter portion of which, as it relates to the army when engaged in active service and is not a new regulation, I need not detain the Committee.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, after the disposition shown by the right hon. Gentleman he would make an appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham to rest and be thankful for this year, and not to press his views further than the Committee had arrived at on Thursday evening, particularly as they would bear in mind that the Mutiny Act was renewed yearly. At present the matter stood thus—that all soldiers upon entering the army were placed in the first class, and were not while in that class subject to the punishment of flogging. That question was put and carried on Thursday evening. He was therefore surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to negative the whole of that clause, and to insert this new clause, leaving out altogether the important concession which he himself had formerly granted. He was sorry to think that somebody with more knowledge of military matters than the right hon. Gentleman had obtained an influence over him on this question, and that circumstance, no doubt, had induced the right hon. Gentleman to propose the withdrawal of the clause; but he (Captain Vivian) should oppose the withdrawal of it, because he thought it would be a step backwards instead of forwards. He would therefore suggest that the right hon. Gentleman's new clause should be added to the clause under discussion, immediately after that part of it which referred to the classification of soldiers.

MR. LOCKE said, he understood that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro now proposed to give up the concession made by the right hon. Baronet. ["No, no!"] He hoped that the Committee would stand by the clause now under discussion, and not substitute any other for it. By the new clause every soldier would be liable to be flogged for the two offences named; but the Committee had decided that all soldiers in the first class should not be flogged at all. He thought they were going to give up the concession made by the right hon. Baronet, and that he deprecated.

MAJOR JERVIS adverted to the Queen's regulations, and maintained that soldiers in the first class could be flogged for aggravated mutiny, and therefore this clause in the Mutiny Bill was not necessary; besides which all men entering the army could not but be placed in the first class. The only question was whether they should retain the punishment of flogging for mutiny and insubordination. Flogging might be necessary in the field or in other emergency, when there might not be means of inflicting other punishment; but at any other time there was no necessity for it. At the same time, he thought the present clause was a great improvement on that which was presented the other night, inasmuch as it was grammatical, and it was logical, and brought straight before them the retention of the punishment for only two offences, these two offences amounting practically to but one offence. Up to the year 1859, there were twenty-four offences for which flogging was inflicted; but after the revision which was made by Lord Herbert, flogging was retained only in eleven out of the twenty-four. By this clause they abolished nine out of these eleven offences, which, as he had said, left practically only one cause of punishment. The point which was required by the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) was already provided for by the Queen's regulations, and was not necessary to be inserted in the Mutiny Act.

Captain Vivian

MR. MOWBRAY said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Major Jervis) had rather misapprehended the bearing and effect of the proposed alteration. By the Queen's regulations no man in the first class could be flogged except for mutiny and aggravated insubordination. The proposal offered by the Government the other night would have given him absolute exemption from that punishment; but it was urged by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that there would thus be no means of punishing first-class men at all, and that if flogging was necessary for such serious offences in the case of second-class men, it was equally necessary in the case of the first-class. It was also urged that if the punishment were retained for mutiny, and for insubordination accompanied by personal violence, no faith would be broken with the first-class men, seeing that they were already liable to it for aggravated and mutinous conduct, which was tantamount to the two offences it was now proposed to reserve. The Government, therefore, wished to meet what appeared to be the feeling of the House, and the new clause suggested by his right hon. Friend had been framed with that object.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he understood the state of the question to be this—that whereas some years ago regulations were adopted by which first-class men were exempted from corporal punishment, except for mutiny and insubordination, it was alleged in the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Chatham, and was, he believed, not denied, that notwithstanding these regulations, first-class men had been flogged in some instances for minor offences. In order to correct this, he understood the right hon. Baronet opposite to say that he would place the exemption in the Act of Parliament, so that the benefit might be secured to the soldier by the authority of the Legislature instead of depending on regulations. He did not, however, understand that, corporal punishment being retained, it was in contemplation to exempt the first-class men from flogging for the two offences for which its retention was declared necessary. When, therefore, on Thursday night corporal punishment was affirmed to be necessary for the summary repression of mutiny and insubordination, it struck him as preposterous to propose that 91 per cent of the army should for these two offences be exempted from it. If, for example, a mutiny were to break out, the leaders, if in the first class, could not be so punished, although they might be the most guilty. The right hon. Baronet, on seeing what would be the effect of the concession he had proposed, admitted that it was open to objection, and consequently agreed to the retention of corporal punishment for mutiny and insubordination, for which, if it was necessary at all, it was certainly required for all alike. He should be very glad when the time arrived for altogether dispensing with flogging; but he was not prepared to take the responsibility of saying that it had yet arrived, and that it was unnecessary to retain it for the two most serious offences, the prompt repression of which was indispensable. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member (Major Jervis) that the new clause proposed by the right hon. Baronet was far better than that which he originally proposed, and the best course would be to negative the original clause and proceed to the consideration of the new one.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman misapprehended the intention of the Amendment. It was clearly not that soldiers of the first class should be degraded to the second and then flogged. He wished, however, to go to the wider question. It seemed to him that they had entered on quite a new phase of the question; for ever since it had been agitated it was the House of Commons, backed by public opinion, that had sought for concessions on behalf of the army. The other night they learned that the Commander-in-Chief thought that the first class could do without corporal punishment; but now the House of Commons said they could not do without it. The Secretary for War had taken the advice of the Commander-in-Chief, the Adjutant General, and other high military authorities, and they authorized him to come down to the House to make what he (Mr. Whitbread) admitted was a great concession. He was not prepared, as a Member of that House, to force upon the Secretary for War and the Commander-in-Chief a policy which they had announced would be useless. If the right hon. Gentleman carried his clause as it now stood, abolishing the classes as regarded corporal punishment, he might depend upon it the matter would not rest there. He trusted that the House would negative the clause.

MR. SAMUDA said, he had on the last evening given his vote for Government under the impression that the clause provided that no soldier in the first class should be flogged; but the clause now under consideration admitted of the interpretation, whatever its real purport was, that for any offence committed by a soldier in the first class he should be degraded to the second; and in the second, for his next offence he should be liable to punishment. His own feeling was against personal punishment; and he believed a great number of votes were given the other night under the impression that there was to be a considerable reduction in the amount of punishment. The present proposal went exactly in an opposite direction; and certainly if it went to a division he should vote against having the first-class men liable to the punishment.

GENERAL PEELE reminded the Committee that by the 15th clause of the Mutiny Act, which had already been agreed to, the penalty of death was imposed for mutiny or aggravated insubordination; no distinction being made between the first and second classes. If therefore that penalty was not inflicted, and corporal punishment were abolished for first-class men, what was to be the substitute? Mutiny and insubordination were obviously more aggravated offences in the case of first than of second-class men; because all the sergeants, corporals, and non-commissioned officers were naturally in the former class; and if the extreme penalty were not inflicted, the next most severe punishment ought surely to be enforced. If flogging were retained at all, it ought to be retained for the first class as well as for the second.

MR. HORSMAN reminded the right hon. and gallant Member that although the 15th clause did say that mutiny should be punished with death, yet the 16th clause provided for the commutation of that penalty to penal servitude or any other punishment. The question before them might be put in the smallest possible compass. The House had affirmed a Resolution abolishing corporal punishment. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War consulted the military authorities, and with their consent, almost at their suggestion, he came down with a new clause for the Mutiny Act, which made a great concession—namely, that corporal punishment was to be abolished in favour of 91 per cent of the army, leaving only 9 per cent still liable. The right hon. Gentleman said, "I offer this concession that corporal punishment shall be entirely abolished in the case of the first class, thus exempting all good conduct men." Upon that question the House divided; and hon. Members now said they should not have voted with the Government had they not conceived that all good conduct men were to be exempt from corporal punishment. So the matter stood until it came to Committee, and then the late Judge Advocate, to his (Mr. Horsman's) great surprise, persuaded Her Majesty's Government to abandon the distinction, and to apply the lash indifferently to the good and bad conduct men. He (Mr. Horsman) objected to withdrawing the concession; and he felt much indebted, and the House felt much indebted, to the hon. Member for Bedford for the way in which he had stated the question. He hoped that the Government would abide by their concession, which every one felt had done them so much credit. He hoped that the good conduct men of the army would still be exempt from corporal punishment.

COLONEL NORTH said, he believed he was the first Member who inquired on Thursday night whether it was intended to exempt first-class men from flogging—no matter what offences they might commit. The clause now proposed by the right hon. Baronet was, on the whole, a very fair one; but he should like to have a clear definition of the term "insubordination accompanied by personal violence." He should like to know whether these words meant simply the striking of an officer, or whether they included the offence of refusing to obey orders. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War would give the House a decided answer to that question. The right hon. Member for Stroud quoted on Thursday cases in which men had been repeatedly flogged, arguing therefrom that the punishment was ineffectual. It should, however, be borne in mind that those were cases in which men had over and over again sold their kits: an offence for which "marking" was not sanctioned by military law. If therefore such men were discharged as had been suggested, there would be nothing to hinder their joining another regiment and repeating the offence. He held that if a man deserted his regiment and went off and joined some other, thus robbing the public by receiving a new bounty, such a man should be made a severe example of. Discharge, moreover, must not be made too easy, or soldiers would commit offences on purpose to obtain it. The right hon. Gentleman also mentioned the number of lashes and the term of imprisonment which had in certain instances been inflicted, and that statement had been reported in the leading journal, and had been circulated all over Europe; yet he suggested no substitute for those punishments, but simply recommended that bad characters should be discharged. Would he approve, however, of branding them? It was surely necessary that blackguards who were discharged from the service should be marked in some way in order to prevent their enlisting again. There are as many Gentlemen on the other side of the House as on his own who have sons, or nephews, or other relations in the army, and therefore this question was as important to the one side as to the other; and it was most desirable that proper regulations should be agreed upon. It was all very well to talk about punishing offenders by imprisonment. There was this difference between the imprisonment of a soldier and of a civilian—that in the former case the performance of his duties devolved upon his comrades. It had been stated the other night that for many years no man had been flogged in the 7th Hussars. ["No, no!"] A Return before the House showed that statement to be incorrect. It had also been erroneously said that there was no flogging in the Guards. He did not himself believe that flogging could be entirely done away with; and he thought the proposal of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was well worthy the consideration of the House.

MR. OTWAY said, he thought that it was quite unnecessary to follow the hon. and gallant Member into details which had been so often discussed; but he would remind him that the statement as to there having been no flogging for some years had reference to the 14th, and not the 7th Hussars. His object in rising was to call the attention of the Committee to two important considerations that should not be lost sight of during the discussion; and the first was the very serious imputation which would be cast upon the House of Commons if they did not maintain the concession which was granted by the Government the other night. What would be said by the country if when a Minister of the Crown announced, after consultation with the military authorities, that he had determined to make a certain concession, the House of Commons forced him by their action to withdraw that concession? There then came this further consideration. The right hon. Gentleman's majority was largely augmented by his statement that they were about to make very important concessions ; and with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman he must say that it would be a breach of faith if, after the division, the right hon. Gentleman, on the mere intimation of the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey), should withdraw the concession that he had made with such a flourish of trumpets, and they should be placed in a worse position as to flogging than they were in some time ago. This subject was never discussed without some light being thrown on it, and some new inconsistency developed ; and an instance was to be found in the observations of the right hon. and gallant General that night. They had always been told that it was necessary to have corporal punishment, especially in reference to ill-conditioned privates assaulting non-commissioned officers. The clause, however, as it was now proposed that it should stand, would be not for the protection of non-commissioned officers, but it would inflict a hardship upon them, for these non-commissioned officers would be in the first class, and might be flogged if they misconducted themselves. He was opposed altogether to corporal punishment in the army in time of peace, believing that it might be safely dispensed with ; but if the Secretary for War would accede to a proposition which would enable recruiting officers to tell recruits that they could not be flogged until by misconduct they had caused themselves to be degraded into the second class it would have, in his opinion, a very beneficial effect upon recruiting. He hoped the Government would consent to let the matter stand in this position.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he thought that it was desirable that a few facts should be known to the Committee before they came to a decision upon the question before them. It had been asserted that recruiting was impeded because men were afraid of the lash, and, on the other hand, he himself had said that recruiting was impeded because the pay was insufficient. He had obtained an official document, duly signed and authenticated, to show the results of recruiting for the years 1865 and 1866, and the figures would conclusively establish the fact that the lash had no effect in deterring men from entering the army. In the first quarter of 1865, 4,167 men were enlisted, and in the corresponding quarter of 1866 the number was only 3,547 ; and in the June quarter 3,250 were enlisted in 1865, and over 3,273 in 1866. But in the September quarter of 1866, when it had become known that the Commission was about to propose certain recommendations, the number rose to 4,108 against 3,408 in the corresponding quarter of the previous year, and in the following quarter the figures were 4,269 in 1866 against 3,605 in 1865. In the last eleven weeks the returns from the recruiting establishments gave the unprecedented number of 3,832 enlisted, which was at the rate of 4,578 for the quarter. But the case of the Royal Marines was still stronger. The strength of this corps was 16,400, and they had never had the slightest difficulty in keeping up their numbers ; they had for several years never been more than fifty below their number, though fifteen men per month were allowed to purchase their discharge. Now in the Marines corporal punishment was more frequent than in any other branch of the army, and when the men were enlisted the provisions under which they were to serve were read to them, yet there was this remarkable fact, that there was no recorded instance of any recruit for the Marines refusing to enlist upon the ground of corporal punishment. If the lash only deterred men who were likely to commit aggravated mutiny from entering the army, it was well for the service that it existed. Experience and experiment both confirmed his view, for when, in 1832, Sir Henry Bouverie commanded in the northern district he ordered that under no consideration should the men in his district be flogged, and the result was that several regiments got into a terrible condition. It ended in one regiment getting into a state of mutiny ; it was hurried off to Dublin, and it had not been there a week before a man stepped from the ranks, shook his fist in his colonel's face, and said, " You cannot flog me." The man, however, was tried and afterwards flogged ; and the bad spirit ceased, as if by magic, and there was no trouble from that moment. He had a letter from an officer who commanded the 78th for five years, and he said that he had had only one man flogged, though others had been sentenced by courts martial to be flogged, but he considered that the state of discipline permitted him to remit that punishment ; but at length the discipline got into so bad a state that he was bound to have a man flogged. Reference had been made to foreign armies, and he wished to say that in the Prussian army soldiers were beaten with a cane, and there was far greater power than in our army intrusted to young officers as to ordering the punishment. He had a letter from an English officer who had been a good deal in France, and he said that in 1855 in the French army 140 men were sentenced to death, and in eighty-two instances the punishment was carried into effect. Four years ago a young French soldier, who formed one of a fatigue party under a corporal, being drunk sat down and refused to move further, and struck the corporal repeated blows in the face. For this he was sentenced to death, and the sentence was carried out. He believed that they must have corporal punishment, as it was necessary to the maintenance of discipline, and he hoped that the House would not hastily abolish it, and thus place officers who were responsible for the discipline of the army in a very difficult and unfair position. He was sure that officers who were intrusted with the power to flog would exercise it with the greatest care and consideration; and that a commanding officer could have no greater pleasure than to know that for a number of years he had maintained proper discipline without having recourse to the lash.

Mr. COWPER said, he hoped the House would not be led away by feeling and sentiment, for the question before them was one of vital importance. The question was whether they were to have an army with discipline or an army without discipline. If discipline were not maintained an army was more terrible to its friends than to its foes. When a man joined the army he bound himself to obey the commands of his officers. These might be men whom he did not respect, and their orders might be such as he might consider unwise; but it was of the most absolute necessity that these orders should be implicitly obeyed. The question, then, was what punishment should be inflicted for insubordinate and mutinous conduct. In every army there was the power of inflicting the punishment of death for mutiny and violent insubordination; but the question now was what should be the punishment for secondary offences. His hon. Friend maintained that it was not necessary to retain flogging as the secondary punishment, because there was already the power of inflicting penal servitude. But it was obvious that penal servitude, unlike flogging, could not be applied at the very nick of time. What was wanted was a punishment that could be inflicted just at the moment when the spirit of insubordination and mutiny was rising. Under such circumstances, it was obviously useless to tell men that if they went on in that course they would render themselves liable to penal servitude. The experience of all armies had told them that there must be a summary punishment, applicable to extreme cases, and that without it an army would become demoralized and useless, if not dangerous, as a military force.

Mr. PUGH said, he rose to express the hope which had been already expressed in the course of the debate, that the punishment of the lash would soon be abolished altogether. This discussion seemed rather retrograde, for they were discussing whether certain classes of the soldiers should be exempted from such punishment, while they knew quite well that in other countries and other times whole armies had been exempted from corporal punishment without any danger to the State. But he would not have attempted to take part in this discussion if he had not observed that the minds of military men were divided on the subject. The question at issue was not whether the country should have an army with discipline or without discipline, but whether discipline could be maintained without corporal punishment, and where history was concerned one man could mention a fact almost as well as another. Under these circumstances, he thought they might advantageously refer to a work which had lately appeared, and which had received considerable attention; it was the Life of Julius Cæsar, by the Emperor of the French. In the preliminary survey of Roman history, the Emperor, referring to the condition of the Roman soldier after the Punic wars, said—

“The allies were always in a state of inferiority. Their contingents, more considerable than those of the metropolis, received but half their pay; and they were subjected to corporal punishments, from which the soldiers of the legions were exempted.”

They knew what the Roman army then was; it had destroyed Carthage, and it had conquered one of the greatest generals of any age or country. If the Roman soldier could march to victory while exempted from corporal punishment, why not the British soldier also? Was he less amenable to discipline and order? Hon. Gentlemen doubtless remembered the description of Cromwell's army in the late Lord Macaulay's History of England, where he said—

"In that singular camp no oath was heard, no drunkenness or gambling was seen, and during the long dominion of the soldiery the property of the peaceable citizen and the honour of woman were held sacred. Not an ounce of plate was taken from the shops of the goldsmiths; no servant girl complained of the rough gallantry of the redcoats."

The historian then went on to describe their military achievements on the Continent, of which their country might well be proud. It might, perhaps, be said that the times were different now. Certainly they were different in one respect, and he admitted it, for the benefit of military men who were anxious for the welfare of their soldiers. The pay of the soldier was then double that of the common labourer, while the pay of the labourer was at the present day far more than double that of the soldier. But they could appeal to higher and nobler motives. They could improve the condition of the soldier, they could discharge bad characters from the army, and by raising the men in their own opinion and making them proud of their profession and influencing them by love of country, they would be able to abolish the lash.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not enter now upon the subject of corporal punishment, although it was one on which he entertained a very strong opinion. The real question before them was a very serious one; it was whether the House would support the right hon. Baronet opposite in making his concession, or whether they would compel him to retract it. It had been argued that recruiting was carried on under great difficulties, because every man who enlisted was liable to be flogged; and he believed the right hon. Baronet himself had acknowledged that such was the result of the existing system. At all events, it was extremely important that they should have a good and plentiful supply of men for the army, and he believed that this supply would be seriously affected if the concession which had been made were retracted. It was now proposed that every recruit should be liable to be flogged instead of soldiers in the second class being alone liable, and this proposition, if carried out, would render it more difficult to get men of good character to enter the army, as recruits would then think that the House of Commons and the War Department together intended to keep them all liable to the lash.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought it would be more convenient to take the opinion of the Committee on the clause first proposed by the right hon. Baronet, and if that were negatived, the right hon. Baronet could then bring forward his second proposition. The question that should be put now was whether the word "may" should remain in the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY suggested an Amendment of the clause to the effect that "upon conviction of certain offences by court martial," instead of "for the commission of certain offences," a soldier of the first class might be degraded.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. WHITBREAD proposed the omission of the last part of the clause, and the substitution of the words:—

"Any court martial may sentence any soldier in the second class to corporal punishment for mutiny or insubordination, accompanied with personal violence, of which he may be guilty while in such class," with the addition of the following words from the new clause, of which notice had been given by Sir John Pakington:—

"And, save as aforesaid, and as hereinafter mentioned, no court martial shall have power to sentence any soldier to corporal punishment; provided that any court martial may sentence any soldier to corporal punishment, while in active service in the field, or on board any ship not in commission, for mutiny, insubordination, desertion, drunkenness on duty, or on the line of march, disgraceful conduct, or any breach of the Articles of War, and no sentence of corporal punishment shall exceed fifty lashes."

Amendments agreed to.

On Question, "That the clause, as amended, be added to the Bill,"

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought, from the tone of the discussion, it might be supposed that he was making no concession, whereas in point of fact his proposal went to the extent of abolishing corporal punishment for eight or nine offences which under the existing law were liable to it, and thus leaving that punishment applicable solely to mutiny and insubordination accompanied with personal violence. He was also taunted with having acted under the influence of military authorities. It was true that the highest military authorities had pronounced a strong opinion upon the question as it had been recently discussed in the House of Commons. But while the Government desired, as far as it was possible, to give effect to the strong opinion expressed by the House of Commons, by acceding to the proposition of limiting the punishment of flogging to those offences he had referred to, it was with great reluctance that they consented to abolish it for mutiny. He himself expressed doubts on Friday night, and he now desired to take upon himself the responsibility of so far retracing his steps as to express his conviction that, after the sentiments expressed on both sides of the House, it would be far more prudent to leave the crime of mutiny to be visited with corporal punishment. An hon. Gentleman had asserted that he was thus placing the soldier in the first class in a worse position than he was at present. That was not the fact, for the soldier in the first class was now liable to be flogged for either of those offences, and he merely left him as he then was.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR spoke amid loud cries for a division. He was understood to say that he gave full credit to the Secretary for War for the disposition he had shown to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had been induced to withdraw the concession he had made. For his part, he objected to men of the first class being liable to corporal punishment for isolated cases of insubordination.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 162; Noes 175: Majority 13.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON then proposed the following clause, which was read a first and second time:—

"Any court martial may sentence any soldier to corporal punishment for mutiny, or for insubordination accompanied with personal violence; and, save as aforesaid and as hereinafter mentioned, no court martial shall have power to sentence any soldier to corporal punishment. Provided, that any court martial may sentence any soldier to corporal punishment while on active service in the field or on board any ship not in commission, for mutiny, insubordination, desertion, drunkenness on duty or on the line of march, disgraceful conduct, or any breach of the Articles of War; and no sentence of corporal punishment shall exceed fifty lashes."

MR. OTWAY said, that this clause also involved the question of corporal punishment; but after the division which had just taken place, he thought it useless to waste the time of the Committee by dividing. He must, however, enter his protest against the clause; and he would tell the right hon. Baronet that by the course he had pursued he would have brought upon himself the implacable hostility with which hon. Gentlemen opposed to flogging would pursue him in reference to this question. He (Mr. Otway) would certainly deem it his duty to do all he could to put an end to this most barbarous and disgraceful punishment. [Ironical cheers.] When hon. Gentlemen opposite taunted him with those cheers, he would remind them of the declarations that had been repeatedly made throughout the discussions upon this measure, that it ought not to be considered a party question. But who, he asked, had made it a party question? It was made so by the whips on the Government side who, from remote parts of England and Scotland, brought up Members to support their proposition. The right hon. Baronet had chosen to recall the concessions he had deliberately made to the House of Commons upon this question. The conduct of the right hon. Gentleman would not be forgotten next year, when efforts he (Mr. Otway) hoped of a more successful character would be again made to abolish this system of flogging in the army. So satisfied was he of the justice of the alteration for which he and his friends contended that he would lose no opportunity of urging the abolition of corporal punishment.

MR. LAYARD said, that the right hon. Baronet, after having stated to the House that with the concurrence of the military authorities he had exempted 153,000 British soldiers in the first class from corporal punishment, leaving only 17,000 exposed to it, had now deliberately withdrawn this exemption. He hoped this would go forth to the country, and the right hon. Gentleman must be held entirely responsible before the country for this proceeding.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I also express a hope that it will go forth to the country as the hon. Gentleman desires, and I also hope it will go forth at the same time that it has been my good fortune to propose the relief of many thousands of our soldiers from ten or eleven offences which were punishable by corporal punishment.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that this was the last question on which any party feeling ought to exist, and he could not therefore concur in what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham; but he thought his hon. Friend might sincerely congratulate himself—looking at the great alteration made in the Mutiny Act this year—upon having been the means of diminishing to a large extent corporal punishment in the army.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham that party politics had not guided him (Major Jervis) in the course he had taken with reference to this subject, and he asked the hon. Gentleman to drop all asperity of feeling, and be satisfied with what he had achieved. The position of the first-class soldier was the same now as it was before—namely, that he could not be flogged except for mutiny or insubordination, whilst the second-class soldier had been relieved from corporal punishment for desertion, drunkenness whilst on duty, or on the line of march, embezzlement of public monies, stealing from a comrade, theft, making away with necessaries, and other offences. In all he had been relieved from corporal punishment in eleven cases, and besides that, arrangements had been made by which the incorrigible blackguard could be got rid of without his being returned to his regiment.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he believed that the army at present could not be governed except by the lash; but it depended upon that House whether the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War should be enabled to do without it. When, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman in some future year should propose measures with the view of abolishing the lash, and should say that it would cost money, let not hon. Gentlemen who talked against flogging say "No!" The strong feeling which had been manifested in the House against flogging would enable the right hon. Gentleman to bring forward such measures, and he felt sure there was no one more desirous than the right hon. Gentleman to free the country and the army from the disgrace of the lash. No one entertained a stronger feeling against the lash than he did, and he rejoiced at the spirit which the House had manifested. But did they suppose that in foreign armies the punishments were not as severe? In the French army, out of 123 military offences, no less than forty-three were punishable with death. An American general was under the gallery the other night during the debate on the subject, and when asked what punishments they had got in the American army in place of flogging, he replied that though flogging was against the "Articles of War," they flogged the bad characters after all.

MR. HORSMAN said, he was bound to admit that both the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War and the military authorities had shown every disposition to meet the wishes of hon. Members on that occasion. The question came upon the Government very suddenly, and they knew it was one on which the military authorities felt very strongly, and he must say that they had conceded far more than could have been expected under the circumstances. He could not, however, refrain from expressing his surprise that when that concession had been made by the right hon. Gentleman, and when it would have passed the House without opposition, difficulties should have been raised, not from that (the Ministerial) side of the House, but by right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the front Opposition Benches. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman not only for the concession he had made, but also for the manner in which it had been made, as showing that the military authorities were willing even to concede more. The manner and spirit in which the Resolution had been met confirmed the opinion he expressed the other night that this was the last time they would see corporal punishment continued by a clause in the Mutiny Act for infliction in time of peace. He wished to correct an error referred to by his gallant Friend, relative to what he (Mr. Horsman) stated the other night as to the number of lashes inflicted. He did not intend to represent the large number of lashes given, but the number of days the offenders were committed to hard labour; because he knew at the time that not more than fifty lashes could be given at one time. In the first case to which he referred he stated that the man had fifty lashes and 250 days' hard labour; in the second, fifty lashes had been inflicted on three separate occasions and 434 days' hard labour.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he was anxious to mention to the Committee a circumstance of considerable practical importance relating to the matter before them. The division which had just taken place strongly illustrated a complaint he made last Session, that when the House was full the smallness of the space in which they were assembled prevented Members from getting into the House to know what was going on. Several hon. Members, himself amongst the rest, were unable to get inside the House before the last division took place, so as to hear the Question put. He heard many hon. Members around him ask the questions, "Are we voting right?" "Are we voting for the 'ayes' or for the 'noes'?" and he heard one hon. Member say, "I am voting for Otway," when in reality he was voting against him. He thought the subject ought to be considered by the House. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Committee was a Committee on the Mutiny Bill, and it was not therefore competent for him to consider the arrangements of the House. If the hon. Baronet wished to raise that question he must do so in the House when the Speaker was in the Chair.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that with all deference to the Chairman he was speaking about the late division, and whether it was one which ought to have weight with the House. He thought it ought not.

MR. M'LAREN said, he agreed with the right hon. Member for Stroud that the result of the late division would give great dissatisfaction to the country, and all the more so, because, as had been pointed out, the deterioration of the liberality of the measure proposed came from the Benches on their (the Opposition) side of the House. There could be no mistake that that was the fact. He must, however, altogether deny that a great concession had been made. Before the clause which had just been carried the state of the army with reference to corporal punishment was this, that 153,000 soldiers, a number equal to the population of one of their great towns, were altogether exempted from the lash under the clause as originally proposed by the Secretary for War; but under the clause as it had now been carried, they were all liable to be flogged for two offences, and the second-class soldiers were liable to be flogged for five separate offences. Under the Articles of War any offender could be visited with flogging, even for smoking in one of the sleeping apartments, if the Commander-in-Chief made it a punishable offence under the Articles of War. He thought the Committee would find that the effect of the clause just passed would be to make the labour of the recruiting sergeant more difficult and less productive than it had hitherto been.

MR. WHITE said, he was at a loss to conceive that any concession had been made. Six or seven years ago, when he brought the subject before the House, he was asked by the late Lord Herbert, the then Secretary for War, not to press his Motion to a division, because the army had been divided into classes, and that the first-class men would not be liable to corporal punishment. The same argument was used by the late Sir George Lewis, and by the present Lord Northbrook; but now that distinction was abolished, and the question so far from advancing was positively retrograding. The Duke of Wellington, twenty-two years ago, said he hoped to live to see the day when corporal punishment would be abolished. Yet they were now in the same condition with regard to it as they were then. He must therefore express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman had not persisted in the concession which in the first instance he offered to the House.

SIR EDMUND LECHMERE said, he could not admit that this question was regarded on the one side or the other as a party question. He and many hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had supported the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham, and the result had been a great advantage gained, which might be used to improve the status of the British soldier. From the information he had obtained from sergeants under whose drill instructions he had been, he ventured to think that the result of this discussion would be to very much facilitate the labour of the recruiting sergeant, and at the same time to give great encouragement to a large body of intelligent men to join the army. There were other subjects connected with the condition of the soldier, which required consideration, but he did not believe they contributed to the same extent to keep respectable men out of the army as flogging.

MR. OTWAY, in explanation, said, he did not mean to use the term party question in the sense in which it had been taken by hon. Members. It was perfectly true, as every one knew, that every exertion had been used to get a Government majority.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, it was assumed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham, and not contradicted, that the late Lord Herbert, who was a most benevolent man, and one who was exceedingly anxious to serve the soldier, had divided the army into two classes, exempting by the Queen's regulations those who were in the first class from corporal punishment. At first he understood that privilege was to be retained; but to his astonishment, and he believed to the astonishment of many other Gentlemen also, that privilege had been taken away. It had been his fate to see soldiers receive more than fifty lashes each at a time, and he, for one, should be glad to see the punishment entirely abolished. He was convinced that in time they might abolish flogging from the army; because since 1834 the statistics showed that a less number of lashes had been given, and a fewer number of men flogged than formerly, and yet the discipline of the army had not in the slightest degree diminished. They had lost the boon of the men in the first class, which was a great pity; but they must for the present be content with those advantages they had gained, hoping, however, that another year's experience would induce whatever Ministry should happen to be in power to come down to the House and say that, except in time of war, they were prepared to abolish flogging altogether.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clauses 10 and 11, with Amendments, agreed to.

Preamble.

MR. OTWAY said, he thought that it was absurd, considering the small numerical strength of the British army and the events which had recently occurred on the Continent, to declare in the preamble that the army was maintained "for the preservation of the balance of power in Europe." He would therefore move that those words be omitted.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH complained that the Government had been afraid of bringing the important question involved in this Bill before the Horse Guards, and had neglected to do so from the 15th of March to the 22nd, when they were forced to adopt that course; and whilst on one occasion they had invoked the authority of the Horse Guards in favour of their views, they had subsequently evaded the responsibility of communicating with that Department. The answer which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) had given him at an earlier period of the evening upon the subject of the Commander-in-Chief was eminently unsatisfactory; and he must go further and characterize it as evasive. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman himself, and he was sure the House did not understand where the power of the Horse Guards commenced and where it ended. It was a great responsibility to quote the opinion of the Horse Guards to the House, inasmuch as there was scarcely a single hon. Member in the House who was not interested in some persons immediately under the control of that Department.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON assured the hon. Member for Devizes that the inferences he drew were perfectly inaccurate. With regard to the words in the preamble to which objection had been taken, he observed that they had been inserted in every Mutiny Bill for a long time, and he advised the hon. Member for Chatham, who had given notice of his intention to propose in a future year great changes in the Mutiny Bill, to reserve this point for consideration among others.

MR. OTWAY said, that was no reason why those words should remain in the Act. They were a perfect absurdity, and their omission would not affect the Mutiny Bill at all. He moved that they be omitted.

COLONEL SYKES thought the words had been so long in the Act that it was quite time they were invalidated.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GENERAL DUNNE asked the Secretary of State for War if the classification of the civil departments had been decided on, so as to place all the civil departments on a similar footing as to allowances, and whether civil officers of the Royal Engineers department were included? He believed this matter had been referred to a Committee which had finished their labours, and he wished to know whether the Report would be carried out?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, it was quite true that the subject to which his hon. and gallant Friend referred had been under the consideration of a Committee; but, so far as he was aware, his hon. and gallant Friend was mistaken in supposing that the Committee had concluded their labours. The subject was still under the consideration of the Committee; at all events, they had not yet reported, and till they had done so, he could not tell what decision would be arrived at.

"That 87,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines."

Whereupon Question again proposed,

"That 85,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines."—(Mr. Childers.)

MR. STANSFELD said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the point at which they had arrived when the Chairman was ordered to report Progress. His hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract had reviewed the Estimates at considerable length and in considerable detail, pointing out evidence, as he thought, of the absence of an economic hand in their construction. His hon. Friend complained of the excess of £500,000 as compared with the Navy Estimates of the preceding year, and he went on to propound in great detail a policy and a scheme for the reduction of our foreign squadrons, which, without at all impairing the efficiency, but rather adding to the immediate efficiency, in time of peace, of our navy, would effect a considerable saving, which it would be open to the Admiralty to apply as far as necessary in the construction of fighting vessels of war. No one could deny that when a new Government came down to ask for an addition of £500,000 on the Navy Estimates, and, on the whole of the Estimates, of £2,000,000, they were at least bound to offer some clear and complete explanation, some sufficient defence and justification of that extra charge. The first point to which he addressed himself was this—had they been furnished with that complete explanation? What was the line of argument adopted by the noble Lord who introduced the Navy Estimates, and by the present and late First Lord, who followed his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract. The first thing he noticed was—he would not say the deliberate intention, but the tendency and desire to shift the responsibility of this heavy and increased charge on other Departments of the Government, and also on the proceedings and policy of the late Government.

Then the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty said that the maintenance of a squadron on the slave coast was a Cabinet question, and that as long as the Cabinet decided on keeping up squadrons of this kind, the Admiralty were bound to find the men and ships.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the hon. Member was mistaken. He did not say anything of the kind. What he did say was that on a question of national policy the Cabinet must decide.

MR. STANSFELD: The noble Lord certainly talked of vessels on foreign stations which on the outbreak of war would have to "cut and run." He also talked of the African squadron, and expressed a strong hope that it might at least be reduced. Then the present first Lord gave some recollections of an older date, when he was Secretary to the Admiralty some years ago, and told them that the Admiralty were the victims of the Foreign and Colonial Departments. But the true doctrine as to responsibility for Estimates was laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the subject of cost the First Lord was responsible as a Cabinet Minister; and the whole Cabinet were fully responsible to the House for the policy of the Estimates and the charge which the House of Commons were asked to defray. Therefore, he repeated, when a new Government asked £500,000 in excess of previous Estimates they were bound collectively and individually to give some good reason for the demand. The right hon. Baronet the late First Lord appeared to be disposed to throw the responsibility of the existing scale of foreign squadrons on the late Board of Admiralty and the late Government. The right hon. Baronet read a list of the number of men and tonnage of vessels employed in foreign squadrons from 1860, downwards, showing that during the time of the late Board of Admiralty there had been a progressive diminution in the number of men and tonnage of ships employed in foreign squadrons. He also showed that in 1867 there was a still further small reduction. The reductions stated to have been made in particular branches of the service at the beginning of 1867 had not affected the amount of the charges nor the number of men asked for the year 1867-8. He admitted that the Naval Estimates of recent years were also open to criticism, and that the measures which had been taken to improve the efficiency of our naval force had been hesitating and illogical, and had involved a great waste of public money. But with reference to the policy proposed to be pursued by the present Board of Admiralty, he could not forget the old maxim which asserted the desirability of "being off with the old love before taking on with the new," and he thought the Board of Admiralty ought to be sufficiently satisfied of the value of the new power, offensive and defensive, before they gave up the old. The nation, however, had a right to ask that our naval force should progress in strength and efficiency, and the objection he had to make to the present administration of the navy was that it allowed the naval power of the country to remain stationary. It was impossible to calculate the strength of the navy upon the principle that would have been correct some years since. In the days of wooden sailing vessels and of 32-pounders, when we had plenty of reserves, the man was rightly and naturally taken as the true unit of power; but since that time our naval force had undergone a rapid and violent transition, and we had now to look more to the power of the gun and to the strength of the vessel than to the number of men on board. If the men were not provided with the best guns and the most improved vessels, they would only be a source of needless expense. The ships which composed our foreign squadrons would have to "cut and run" in the event of war, and in time of peace they cost us large sums for repairing and maintaining them. What the Admiralty had to do was to produce naval power, and he did not think that the method they were now adopting, of building a vast number of small vessels which would be of no use in time of war, was likely to produce that power. There were two lines of policy, two alternatives—as it seemed to him—policies by which the result desired could be arrived at. In the first place, by spending an enormous sum to provide the navy with a vast number of the best modern iron-clad vessels on which to place the men who were asked for, we might obtain a navy of overwhelming power for a time, but in the course of a few years the whole work would have to be done over again. The other policy was that indicated by his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) in his speech the other evening, which would necessitate every possible saving of men and ships on foreign stations in order to add to the number of fighting ships in our possession and under our immediate control. He must, however, point out that the details of that scheme were suggestive, not dogmatic. The noble Lord the Secretary told the House the other night that a Committee was to be appointed to inquire into the working of the dockyards; and he thought it would be of advantage to the service if the two gallant Admirals who had been named were empowered to inquire into the subject of the cost and use of our stationary and harbour ships, since he was certain that those vessels were a source of unnecessary expenditure, and not of real power. The noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) had told the House the other night that the Admiralty had given up repairing the large old-fashioned ships in consequence of their being so expensive to repair and man, and that they were building new vessels of a more manageable size, which would be infinitely more useful and more economical. To a certain extent such a policy would be a good one; but the question was whether it was wise to build 16,000 tons of such vessels besides the composite gunboats for China in the course of the next financial year. But, after all, the great question was whether the Admiralty were justified in asking the Committee for £500,000 for the purpose of building vessels. The noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty told them that the late Board had rather neglected the construction of iron-clad vessels.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: What I stated was that £128,000 had been put down in one year for iron-clads, but had not been spent on iron-clads in dockyards; and that in the following year no estimate at all had been proposed for iron-clads.

MR. STANSFELD: That could be only with regard to dockyards.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I said so.

MR. STANSFELD said, that remark only applied to vessels that were to be built by contract, and not to those building in the Royal Dockyards. However, the view of the noble Lord was that it was necessary to do more in the coming year than had been done during the two previous years in the way of building iron-clads. He would take Vote 10, and of the additional £500,000, roughly speaking, £160,000 was for engines. He presumed that these engines were not all for iron-clad vessels. The balance of the £500,000, or £340,000, was intended for two iron-clads—one the sister ship to the Inconstant—and for ten composite gunboats designed for service in China. But as iron-clads could be built but slowly, his belief was that of that £500,000 in the Controllers' section of Vote 10 not more than one-half, or £250,000, would really be devoted to the construction of iron-clad ships, or of the engines that were to be put into them. The £500,000 to be devoted to the strength of the navy was thus reduced to £250,000. Confining the question to the addition to the real fighting strength of the country, he could not admit that there would be much gain. He found that in the Estimates for 1866-7 the late Board of Admiralty proposed to advance the construction of the Hercules and the Monarch by what would be equivalent to 5,715 tons, and in the present Estimates he found that the Hercules and Monarch had only been advanced 2,752 tons, and the present Board had thus done less by one-half (2,963 tons) during the financial year just expired than the late Board had proposed to do in advancing the construction of these vessels. It was urged in explanation of this that there had been a failure in respect to the armour-plates, and that a caisson had been damaged; but that was not a sufficient reason to account for so very great a difference in the amount of progress made. It was a question of labour; and as much labour had not been given to those two vessels in the course of the financial year as had been intended, or as might have been done if that labour had not been diverted to the building probably, or to the repair, of other vessels, to which he attached smaller importance. From the Estimates of this year he found that they proposed to advance their iron-clads 4,195 tons; but they were already in arrear 2,963, and therefore, deducting that arrear, it only left the present Board credit for 1,232 tons of dockyard building of iron-clads. Taking, then, these facts and figures into account, he said that their £250,000 for the construction of iron ships dwindled down to nothing. Now, what was the practice in regard to the framing of the Navy Estimates? All the sub-departments were summoned to rack their brains in finding out work, and then, as a matter of policy, they sent in greater demands than were reasonable, or than were expected to be conceded, because they knew the docking process to which their demands would be subjected, and they wished to provide against it. Those various demands having been cut down still produced a total which could not be submitted to that House, and then the Estimates underwent a yet further docking to meet the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and not to carry out any clear and definite naval policy. That was a most illogical system, and led to extravagance. The Government ought to set out with a notion of general policy and of total cost, and then it should sub-divide and appropriate that total under the different Votes, so as to purchase as much real power as possible, and keep down waste. He was not surprised at schemes of re-construction being brought before the Board of Admiralty. Men feeling themselves responsible for the efficiency, and not at all for the cost of the navy, naturally and logically brought such schemes before the Board. They saw that we had got so many men, and that we had not got fighting ships, and they asked if a serious war arose, what was to be done with our men and our ships. And how had they met the proposals made to them? They retained the men for whom they did not propose to build ships, they also retained the ships which could not fight, and then they professed to add to the strength of the navy by £500,000, though in reality this proposal amounted to next to nothing. His hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) and himself put forward their views as their contribution towards the solution of the question of naval policy, and they thought that their views at least deserved a fair consideration. What was the justification of a naval expenditure of £10,000,000 or £11,000,000? Could it be justified merely for the purposes of peace, and to maintain the police of the seas? No naval man, he believed, would pretend to vindicate it on such narrow and limited grounds. Their reason for incurring so vast an outlay was to provide for the possible contingency of a serious naval war. The object of their preparation, then, should surely be to give them immediate efficiency; for in modern warfare hard, rapid, and decisive blows were required to be struck. If they could imagine a naval war lasting beyond a few months there would be in that case practically no bounds to the resources of this country. No two countries in the world could put as many men on board ship as this country could, and the whole world combined could not surpass England in the power of manufacturing the most modern inventions of maritime warfare. The only justification for a large naval expenditure in time of peace, was that it should be so appropriated and expended as to give a maximum of immediate efficiency in time of war. The expenditure proposed by the Government could not in that view be justified. Were men an element of naval strength if we had not fighting ships into which to put them, or were these vessels of the noble Lord, which were to "cut and run" as soon as they were attacked—if, indeed, they could run—to be regarded as an element of strength? Ought it to be necessary to pay £500,000 more than last year, or ought they not to take the expenditure of last year as a maximum, and more or less gradually to reduce it? Let the House compare the naval power of England with that of America and France. The American Monitors were all iron-clads. Two had certainly crossed the ocean, but they were vessels for defence and not for offence. The number of seamen, officers, and marines after a gigantic war had been reduced to 17,000 men. France had seventeen sea-going iron-clads and ten others proposed and partly building. He purposely left out of the account the third class French iron-clads available for home defence. This country had twenty-six sea-going iron-clads, four turret-ships, four building, and three proposed this year to be built, making a total of thirty-seven. With such a force no one could doubt that, taking ship for ship, our vessels were immensely superior to those of the French navy. Naval science was still in a condition of violent and rapid transition, and the true policy of the Admiralty was not to lay down any great scheme of naval re-construction at the present moment, but to concentrate their strength upon one or two vessels and get them afloat as rapidly as possible, and by that means get work out of them before, by the march of invention and improvement, they fell behind the time. The lesson that modern warfare had taught ought to be borne in mind. It was this, that war was now so costly that nations would not go to war without the most powerful motive to do so. Italy had such a motive; so had Prussia. That country, after years of deliberate preparation, had gone to war to secure a united Germany. The United States went to war under the pressure of motives so overwhelming that it was almost impossible to conceive their recurrence. Considering our present policy of non-intervention, which was safe in the hands of the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it was unlikely that any nation would wantonly incur the danger and risk of a war with England. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the end of last Session, addressed the House in explicit and almost solemn terms in favour of economy. He said it was the "Intention of the present Government in spirit and in truth to carry into effect that policy in respect to the expenditure of the country which we recommended to the late Government, when sitting on the Benches opposite."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 1289.]

And the right hon. Gentleman assured the House that in the administration of the finances they would be guided by the principle of economy—

"Not meaning by that negligence, inefficiency, and imperfection, but that prudence in the application of our resources which engages in nothing but what is necessary for the public welfare, but takes care to accomplish its purpose in the most complete manner."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 1290.]

He knew no better or more complete definition of naval or other administrative economy than was contained in these words. The Resolution in favour of economy proposed by him in 1862, was called at the time an abstract Resolution, yet it was in its result a practical Resolution, for it led in the following year to a reduction of £2,000,000 in the present Estimates. The Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, on the contrary, had led to a precisely opposite result, for there had been an increase of £2,000,000 in the present Estimates. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer still held the same opinion which he expressed at the end of last Session, and the Cabinet had probably resisted still greater demands than they had conceded. It was still open to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues to make their influence felt, if not on the Estimates, at all events on the expenditure of the year. There were two Members of the Cabinet who, more than any others, could affect the expenditure—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Secretary. The former could no doubt persuade his Colleague to say to the Admiralty and to the War Office that the problems of the year must be worked out within the Estimates of the year; and the latter could form himself into a sub-committee with the First Lord of the Admiralty, and cause to be ordered home every ship which was not a fighting ship from foreign squadrons. A great saving could thus be effected—in the building of ships, in repairs, and in outfits. That might seem to be an arbitrary position; but it was not so in reality. The consequence would be to compel, as it were, the departments to go deeper down into the causes of expense, and into the true uses and real power of armaments, and in that way to economize the resources of the country without detracting from the real power of the country.

COLONEL SYKES said, he was glad to see that the form of the Estimates had this year been improved as compared with those of former years. He alluded particularly to the new table, which gave a programme of the works being and about to be executed in the several dockyards. He would be glad to see a tabular form of the total number of persons employed by the Admiralty. It was to be found in the French Estimates, so that by a birds-eye view a knowledge of the total numbers employed in the navy, whether military or civil, was obtained. It was no doubt right upon the part of the British Government, when they found a Foreign Government doing so, to build a new class of ships, and not to go to sea with the old ones. They laid out their money, and so did the French, in iron-clads, and he would now state the condition of the French navy, and also that of the British; the result of the competition which has been going on. The information respecting the French navy is supplied by the "Ordinary Budget," the Extraordinary Budget, and the Report to the Legislative Chamber—all for 1867. The Secretary to the Admiralty had accurately stated, as regards number, that the French had 43 armour-plated vessels; but in the French Ordinary Budget he found only 10 vessels spoken of as sea-going, and only two of those were of the first-class. The largest ship in the French navy, the Magenta, had a displacement of 6,737 tons, while England had three ships of 10,000 tons displacement—namely, the Minotaur, Agincourt, and Northumberland. Of the 43 French vessels 14 of them were not sea-going at all, but were for rivers and lakes, and those were not likely to come in contact with the ships of this country. Then, instead of having 16 first-class vessels, as he had understood his noble Friend, the French had only 13. This was shown by a report made to the Emperor, entitled Exposé de la situation de l'Empire, and dated the 31st of December, 1866. He also found that the French had 340 vessels altogether, while we had 414. The French had 120 in commission, and the total number for which credit had been given in the Budget of this year up to the 1st of January, 1868, was 157. In 1862 the French had only 6 iron-clad vessels and 10 frigates building. One of them had been lost, and two were no longer effective, so that the number was reduced to 13; while the Return granted to Mr. Laird, dated August 10, 1866, showed that we had 30 iron-clads afloat, 4 first-class building, and 4 floating iron-clad batteries, so that no urgent need existed for our spending money on building ships to meet opponents who had not the means to oppose us. The French had been actually discontinuing the annual credits they had given for construction. In 1861-2 England had devoted £755,782 to construction, and £469,307 to armour-plating, which made a total of £1,225,089. In the same year the French spent a total of £660,000, or just one-half, for the same purposes. It would be found, too, that in every department of the navy, whether it regarded men, ships, or money, their expenditure was just one-half that of this country. In 1863-4 England spent £630,203 in construction, and £408,822 for armour-plates alone, giving a total of £1,039,025. The French expenditure that year, including everything necessary for the completion of their vessels, was only £560,000. In 1864-5, we required £448,452 for construction, and £346,619 for armour-plates, making a total of £795,071; the French £480,000; and in 1865-6 the total was £544,300, including only £17,600 for iron matters, so that there had, up to that time, been a gradual diminution. The French allowed for construction in 1865 and in 1866-7 only £420,000, so that the French had annually diminished their credit for construction from £660,000 in 1862-3, to £420,000 in 1866-7. In 1866-7, however, when we had unquestionably established our naval superiority over our neighbours, a reaction set in, the sum required for construction and armour-plates that year being £663,280, although the French had reduced their expenditure to £420,000; and in 1867-8 the amount was £860,559 for construction, and £310,360 for armour-plates, or a total of £1,170,919. What reason could be given for that increase of £448,000 last year, and of £491,000 this year? Why was it that while the French outlay was decreasing ours was increasing? Had this country gone back to the state of panic which existed in 1861? With regard to the men, we had in 1861-2, 59,000 seamen, including boys and the Coastguard, but not including the 18,000 Marines. In successive years the numbers declined to 58,050, 57,000, 53,000, and 52,000, till in 1866-7 it was 51,450; but this year it was again rising, the number being 52,912. He could not see any reason for this. As for the French, they had in 1864-5 30,473 officers and men, against our 53,000, not including the Coastguard, and this year they had 27,589, while we had 52,912. I trust the above figures from official sources, French and English, will sufficiently dispose of the relative powers of the French and English navies. With regard to the cost of the effective service, there was an increase of £1,153,218 in 1859-60, the amount being £8,259,299, and this was £626,360 above the effective Estimates for 1858-9, and it went on increasing till 1862-3, in which the decrease for the effective service was £450,378. The total charge for the effective services in 1862-3 was £10,228,029; for 1863-4, decrease, £1,139,773. In 1864-5, decrease, £357,502. In 1865-6 the decrease was £348,567. In 1866-7 there was a nominal decrease in the effective services of £105,633, which unhappily turned out to be wrong. In 1867-8 the deficit in the effective charge is £480,360. He could not understand why the reduction should have been interrupted during the last two years. Our Estimates for 1866-7 was £10,388,153, whereas the French credits were only £5,802,059, or but little more than half; and for 1867-8 their expenditure was £5,926,253, being an increase of £33,083, while ours was £10,926,253, being an increase of £491,518. He thought that as the Admiralty had succeeded in effecting a reduction for several years, that reduction might be continued, especially as we were not in danger of being attacked by any other navy, whether European or American. He wished, also, to know why the expenditure for 1863-4, which was estimated at £10,462,322, was stated the following year to have been £10,472,298; and why that for 1864-5, which was estimated at £10,169,022, was afterwards corrected, first to £10,507,792, and subsequently to £10,483,678. For 1865-6 there had also been three different statements, the first being £10,152,905, the second £10,234,633, and the third £10,071,805; and for 1866-7 there had already been two, and there would probably next year be another, so that Parliament did not know the actual expenditure of any year until the lapse of three years. In fact, all the figures I have given from the Estimates are little better than approximations subject to a variety of subsequent corrections, probably owing to the looseness of the Estimates. One instance of reckless cost in this department was to be found in the large number of gunboats we had in the China seas, which was stated by the noble Lord to be 30, though a late distributive return he had just received from China, dated on the 1st of February, made the fleet to consist of 44 vessels, eight of them being hospital and store ships, or without captains. But taking the noble Lord's number as a correct statement of our naval force in those waters, what on earth, he asked, could be the use of 36 gunboats on the China station? A single gunboat was able to destroy a fleet of pirate junks; and though the enemy's boats had from 12 to 14 heavy guns on board, they could be run into and set on fire by one of our gunboats with the greatest ease, and of this there were many instances. Why, then, were 36 required, or why should there be 12 lying in Hong Kong Harbour, and spending the taxes of the country and rendering no service, except sallying out when there was an intimation of pirates? Why were we to be the protectors of the whole world in that part? Why were we to be made the maritime police, as it were, in the Chinese seas? France, America, and other countries were carrying on an increasing trade with China, and ought to bear a share in the maritime police. Under any circumstances, six, or at most ten, gunboats would be sufficient for the purpose of protecting our trade, and there was in reality no excuse for employing more. On these grounds he trusted that the present Admiralty would follow the good example set by their predecessors for four years, and reduce these Estimates, thus taking one step towards the reduction of the national taxation, which, in conjunction with the municipal taxes, was crushing the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. GRAVES regretted that the debate had taken so wide a range as it had done, though perhaps it was unavoidable. Still, he could not help thinking that to mix up questions of great national policy with points of minute detail, as had been done in the present instance, was only to prejudice both. There was no man on whose judgment he placed greater reliance than the hon. Member who opened the debate, and there were some points to which he adverted in which he (Mr. Graves) heartily concurred, especially in thinking that the time had come when our ships of war should cease to carry specie, and also in thinking that the number of boys entered for the navy should be increased. He believed that the number of boys entered on the Estimate of this year was wholly inadequate to supply the annual waste in the navy; and he adhered to the statement he made last year, that it would require yearly 1,500 more boys than were entered to replace the loss of men in the service. He might here state a fact which had recently come to his knowledge, that, notwithstanding every effort at our home ports to obtain seamen, only 150 had been engaged during the past eight months, and the present number was 500 short of the number voted. But the great question was our policy in connection with the employment of our squadrons on foreign stations. He wished to deal with that question, not only as it affected the maintenance of national interests, but also as it affected the protection of our commerce, a view which he thought had been somewhat overlooked by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld), who laid the weight of his arguments on the foreign policy of this country. With regard to our ships in the China seas, the utility of which had been questioned by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, the reason why they were required was that we had more to guard there than all other nations put together; we had in the Chinese seas a trade direct and indirect, amounting to not less than £40,000,000 per annum, carried on under treaties which are best respected when backed by British gunboats. It was notorious that those seas were still infested by pirates. Indeed, notwithstanding the presence of our squadron twenty-five merchant ships were attacked by pirates last year, so that piracy had not been suppressed. No one will for a moment suppose our naval officers are wanting in zeal or energy or that the existence of piracy can be attributed to them. Possibly our ships were too slow for the purpose of pursuit, and it was with a view of supplying faster vessels that the construction of so many gunboats was now proposed. He found by a Return moved for last year that seventy-one pirate junks were destroyed and 220 men captured and handed over to the Chinese authorities. So long, therefore, as piracy existed we must maintain a force there for the protection of a commerce—which, great as it is, is yet but in its infancy. He admitted, however, that other nations ought to co-operate with us in that service, ten of the vessels which had been captured last year belonged to foreigners, and it was reasonable they should assist; but instead of withdrawing our squadron we ought first to induce other Powers to enter into an arrangement, and then consider to what extent we could reduce our force. As to Japan, where a reduction had also been proposed, it was well-known that we were forcing a trade, there being large inland seas in which our commerce required protection; and until we were on terms of greater amity with that country, we were more likely to command respect by maintaining a good force at that station. A few years since and England had no trade with Japan, it now amounts to millions and with promise of a brilliant opening for British enterprise. He thought we might make a considerable reduction on our African station by sending out suitable vessels of greater speed. The vessels which were on that station were not of that character, they were most unsuitable. In reference to that point he should observe that he felt much surprise at the sending out of the Bristol to the African coast, for she was much too large and unmanageable a vessel to be fit for such a service. The natives on the coast were becoming attached to regular trade, and, as that feeling spread, there would not be the same occasion as had formerly existed for a large squadron there. With respect to the Mediterranean and the North-American stations, he believed that the amount of the force we should maintain at either of them must depend mainly on the state of the political horizon; and that was a point with which it would be impossible for the Committee to deal. As to our station on the coast of South America, he thought that as long as the Republics on that coast made war their normal condition, our commercial interests would require a good force in that direction. On the Pacific station, from Valparaiso to Vancouver's Island, we had sixteen ships and 3,800 men. Comparing our squadron with the American squadron on that coast—and he did not think we should have our squadron there much below that of any other country—he found that the Americans had twenty-eight ships and very nearly the same number of men, but comprising an armament greatly supe-

prior to ours, as recent events at Valparaiso sufficiently showed. Our vessels were divided into two squadrons, North and South, the Admiral's head-quarters being Vancouver's Island, a commodore having charge of the South Pacific. Now, he thought it would be better for all purposes that this arrangement should be reversed, and that the Admiral should be where our interests demanded his constant presence. On the whole, he thought that our foreign squadrons were not larger than the interests of our commerce demanded; but putting aside the commercial point, he believed the interests of the navy required that we should keep up our foreign squadrons. It appeared to him that the only redeeming feature of our naval expenditure was our foreign squadrons. The magnificent discipline which was enforced on those stations served more than anything else to keep up the morale of the navy and the efficiency of the ships. Those stations were schools for our officers and seamen, and what should we do with our 6,000 or 7,000 boys if it were not for the means which the ships in the foreign squadrons afforded for their employment and instruction? Was it by serving in iron-clads, lying rusting in our home ports, that we could hope to make blue jackets of these boys—he thought not—if it be a matter of economy he ventured to think it might be secured better at home than abroad. While he had great reliance on the judgment of his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract, yet, as the opinions put before the House were so conflicting, he should like to know whether the plan proposed by his hon. Friend had been introduced with the approval of men of experience in the navy. The noble Lord the late Secretary for the Navy (Lord Clarence Paget) was a naval officer of great experience, and always anxious for economy where a saving could be judiciously effected; yet what had he said when moving the Navy Estimates last year?—

“And now, Sir, with regard to the Vote for the personnel of the navy. We take this year, as I will presently show, a somewhat smaller force of men, and consequently our Vote for the personnel of the navy will be less during the year 1866-7, than it was during the present year. And here, again, I want to call the particular attention of the Committee to what our prospects are in future years. Now, it is all very well to talk of reducing the naval expenditure, but the fact is, that I cannot hold out any hopes of a reduction in that which principally governs the expenditure of the navy—the number of seamen of the fleet. We have carried on during the last two years a gradual reduction of our seamen to what has come to be a very considerable diminution; but if we are to make the naval force which we have afloat adequate to the demands upon it, that reduction cannot go on. I have a paper here which, if hon. Gentlemen wish me to quote from, will show that, so far from there being a prospect of further diminution of our fleet, we are pressed from all quarters of the Globe for additional assistance. We are pressed from China. We are told that the seas there are infested with pirates, and large demands are made upon us for additional forces. In Japan they tell us that, in order to carry out the treaties which have been made with the Tycoon, we must be prepared to have a large force in the inland sea. In the River Plate, Chile, Peru, the presence of ships is asked for, and let it be remembered that most of all these demands come at the desire of our merchants. In short, such are the calls upon the Admiralty that I confess I should be deceiving the Committee if I were to hold out a prospect of any further reduction in the number of men.”—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 1144.]

That opinion had recently been confirmed by the distinguished nobleman who had so long presided over the Admiralty. In a pamphlet which, though it did not bear his Grace's name, was known to have been written by the Duke of Somerset, he stated “That the efficiency of the navy depended on the number of men, and those who insisted on the efficiency of the navy would not be willing to reduce the number of men.”

Now, on examining into the reductions which have taken place of late years, he found that in 1860 the number of ships was 178, and the number of seamen, boys, and marines 35,000. In 1866, the number of ships was 146, and that of the seamen, boys, and marines 26,000; being a decrease of thirty-two ships and 9,000 men. It was now proposed to reduce the men by 7,200 more, which, with the previous reduction of 9,000, would make the reduction in eight years amount to 50 per cent; while during the same time our trade had increased 20 per cent. [Mr. CHILDEES said, he had not proposed such a reduction as his hon. Friend stated.] He would not do his hon. Friend any injustice. It was proposed that we should reduce the number of our seamen by some 7,000 men, and that we should substitute a flying squadron at Lisbon which would add 4,000 men. He (Mr. Graves) could conceive of nothing more valuable or useful than such a squadron in a national point of view, and he would rejoice to see such an addition; but it would not be valuable for the protection of our commerce, which required vessels to be on the spot where our trade was carried on.

The hon. Member had alluded to the progress which had been made in improving and extending the electric telegraph, and argued that the institution of a flying squadron would be useful because orders could be flashed to them ordering them to repair instantly to particular parts of the Globe where British interests were at stake. He (Mr. Graves) thought, however, that a very different conclusion could be deduced from the present efficiency of our telegraph system, and that in fact the argument of the hon. Member for Pontefract could be brought to bear against the value of a flying squadron. If, for instance, any complication were suddenly to arise abroad, our diplomatic agents would telegraph to the Foreign Office, who in return would send back instructions by the same medium, for diplomatic communications must in future rely on the telegraph rather than the special messenger. When these instructions arrived it was of the utmost moment that we should have the means of enforcing whatever might be our demands, and for this reason it was essential to have vessels near at hand, rather than appearing on the scene of action some three months after the necessity had passed away. Looked at in this light, the telegraph was rather an argument for carrying out our present system than abolishing it and establishing a flying squadron, simply as a substitute. In the absence of the reasons for which the recommendation was made, he must decline to adopt it; he was inclined to think that, until a higher code of International Law was accepted by European nations, under which private property would be exempted from capture at sea, we ought to keep up efficient fleets for the protection of our commerce and the maintenance of England's honour. He now came to what might be termed the domestic administration of the navy, and here he wished to express his admiration of the lucid speech with which the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had introduced the Estimates. No part of that statement was received with more satisfaction than the announcement of the disposal of useless vessels; but he was somewhat surprised that those vessels, with a tonnage of 30,000, had realized only £85,000. Why could not one or two of our condemned docks have been used for the purpose of breaking them up, and if they could have been broken up there instead of by private individuals, why were the profits realized by private individuals to be lost to the public Exchequer? It could not be that the cost of breaking up was more in the public than in private yards, for if so, a large and awkward question arose. The thirteen vessels in question realized £85,000, or an average of about £6,700 each, and he had made some calculations to show what amount they would have produced if they had been broken up in Her Majesty's Dockyards. The figures he was about to read to the House were rather under than above the mark, and on this point he challenged contradiction. The copper and other metal from each of these vessels would fetch £7,500; the machinery and boilers, £2,500; and other materials and stores on board, £2,000. That would give a total of nearly £12,000. From that sum, however, he would deduct 9s. per ton for the labour of breaking up, 5 per cent for auction fees, and the cost of the coal consumed in towing the vessels to Devonport or the Thames dockyards, amounting altogether to £2,000. Thus each vessel would realize £10,000 net, and the whole number £130,000; whereas only £85,000 had been actually realized by the Admiralty. He could not learn that these vessels were disposed of by public advertisement, or that there were more than two or three tenders invited, he would be curious to see the conditions of sale and the quantity of stores included; he believed that his Estimates were greatly below the truth, and that it would be found a very large sum had been sacrificed by the anxiety to get the credits for the Estimates. On the subject of the constructive portion of our naval administration, he was compelled to speak adversely, though he did so in no narrow and carping spirit. He must confess, looking at our enormous expenditure, we were further off than we had a right to expect from obtaining a swift, handy, and sea-going iron-clad; he would not go back over old ground, he would merely take the results of the last twelve months. And first, with regard to the three ships of the Vixen class, which were the lowest in the scale, being about 800 tons—it was found that on the trial trip of the Vixen off the Land's End, she met with bad weather and was forced to bear up. On return to port the ship's company memorialized the Admiralty, asking that they might be removed from that vessel, as she was entirely unseaworthy, and he understood that their request was granted, that the Vixen was put out of commission, and that she was now lying with her sister ships as they were launched, perfect useless. Then, again, with respect to the Amazon class, which he had ventured last Session to predict would be unsuitable for the service for which they were designed. As soon as the present Board of Admiralty came into office he understood an order was issued that the two vessels of that class, then uncommenced, should be altered, and their length increased twenty-five feet or thirty feet, the same as the Dane. Accordingly, these vessels, he understood, had been altered from the original design, and it is fair to infer that the other five would also have been improved if the proposed alteration had not amounted to a total re-construction. What good these vessels in their improved shape were to do he could not say; but the facts he had mentioned showed that there was an absence of any settled system of design for our ships-of-war. With regard to the armour-plated vessels, the most important class of all, he regretted that the Returns moved for by the hon. Member for Birkenhead and by himself, and which had been that evening laid upon the table, were not yet in the hands of Members. From the information, however, which he had received, he believed it would be found that the trials of vessels last autumn showed a deficiency and inequality in speed, a great want of fuel-carrying space, a large consumption of fuel, and, worse than all, an unsteadiness at sea, which rendered them almost useless for offensive or defensive purposes, in anything beyond a moderate breeze. The Bellerophon and Lord Clyde, our newest vessels, in an Atlantic swell, with the wind at the force of 6 or 7, rolled through an arc of 34 degrees; what they would do in a gale of wind he would leave hon. Members to draw their own conclusions. He believed they would tear themselves to pieces; and that they would be practically unseaworthy. Besides, such a roll exposed the most vulnerable part of the ship to attack, to the smallest vessel which could fight with a steady platform. In the same breeze the Achilles rolled only through an arc of 16 degrees, and, as he was informed, shot away her target, while the other vessels dared not open their ports nor loosen their guns. Comparing the tonnage, horse-power, and speed of the Achilles (6,121 tons, 5,724 horse-power), and the Bellerophon (4,270 tons, 6,048 horse-power), and yet the Achilles steams away from the Bellerophon, he asked, when a vessel was proved to be eminently successful and to go faster through the water with 50 per cent greater tonnage than another of the same horse-power, why we could not reduce the model and apply it, instead of retaining the inferior model, or be continuously indulging in these unsuccessful experiments? He would next pass on to what he considered to be the greatest blot of all upon the efficiency of their ships, and that was the enormous consumption of fuel. Scarcely any of our newest vessels could carry five days' full steaming fuel. The Bellerophon did not carry four days' fuel, and he would ask how a vessel could be considered sea-going which depended so much upon steam, but which could carry only 3½ or 4 days' fuel on board? And yet this ship cannot be trusted under canvas, for she will not come round in stays. Last year he ventured to call attention to scientific and mechanical appliances, which he showed had answered admirably in economizing the consumption of fuel in the mercantile navy. The firm he then referred to had during last year launched several vessels—indeed, he might say one in every eighteen working days. On the 25th of July last they wrote to the Admiralty—

“As patentees of the double-cylinder engines we are not entirely unknown to my Lords, having, in the year 1860, received an order for a set of these engines for Her Majesty's ship Constance, and though we can confidently point to the results, both in economy of fuel and the speed obtained by that ship on her trials, we laboured under great disadvantages owing to her peculiar sectional form obliging us to put in two medium-sized cylinders in place of one larger one, thus adding to the weight and space occupied. Since then, our greater experience in the working of these engines has enabled us to make important improvements, and we are now prepared to make our engines and boilers to occupy less space and equal weight with those of any other builders, while in fuel we venture to assert that they effect a saving of 33 per cent at full speed, graduating to 20 per cent at half speed, or, in other words, we will undertake to steam at full speed with a given quantity of coal at least one-half further than the single cylinder engines of the most approved principle are capable of doing.”

Up to this time no notice had been taken of that offer. He was glad that the Admiralty intended to build such a ship as the Inconstant; and, seeing that America had already turned out six such vessels, not armour-clad but possessing great speed, he hoped that the advantages of speed combined with economy of fuel would be considered, and that it would be made a sine quâ non in the contracts that tenders should state the number of miles the engines would run upon a given quantity of fuel. He questioned the economy and judiciousness of putting old engines into the new gunboats for India and China, inasmuch as new engines would drive at the same speed with half the consumption of coal, which was £4 a ton in China, so that new machinery would be the cheapest in the long run—new boilers would be required—the engines alone could be utilized—and in his opinion it would be wiser to break them up for old iron rather than injure the efficiency of this new class of vessel. The consumption of the two-high-pressure engines was not less than 1,200 cwt. per hour for each vessel, whilst engines of the newest construction could accomplish the same speed at half that consumption of fuel; and, considering that coals cost £4 per ton in China, the economy must be self-evident, and would in a very short time pay for the new engines. It was difficult to reconcile this adherence to old machinery with the fact that engines of 800 horse-power, ordered three or four years ago from an eminent Glasgow firm, at a cost of £40,000, had never left their premises, and had recently been re-sold by the Admiralty to the makers for £12,000. Could it be that, notwithstanding that engines of this class had been wanted, such great improvements had been made since they were ordered that it was considered desirable to sacrifice £28,000 rather than use these engines? Whatever the cause may have been, the circumstance was most unaccountable to him, and he hoped would be explained. What he found fault with was the system; and he implored the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Admiralty to take up this question with a full determination, if possible, to wipe away this stain from our national character for administration.

MR. SEELY said, he wished to make a few observations upon the mode in which the navy accounts were presented to that House. Business men expected to find in accounts not merely what money was received, but what was got for that money. In these Estimates the Admiralty asked for upwards of £10,000,000. In showing the application of this money they were tolerably clear with regard to officers and seamen, and very precise as to the amount required for the provisions of the seamen. But no precise information was given as to the amount of money required for building and repairing ships, this amount being scattered through several Votes. It might be said that Vote 6, which was the Vote for the salaries and wages of men in the dockyards, was for shipbuilding purposes; but he questioned whether the whole of the Vote ought to be so appropriated. That Vote included a sum, for instance, for the admiral-superintendent at Malta, of £1,930, including his sea pay: for the flag-lieutenant, £219, and for the domestics of the admiral-superintendent £353. But the commander-in-chief at Malta required a house, and that was entered in this Vote as £140 a year. What, he asked, had the commander-in-chief's house to do with shipbuilding? In fact, many items were charged to shipbuilding that should be omitted, and many omitted that should be charged. At Malta 298 men were employed in the dockyard; but the cost for supervision, including the pay of the admiral and flag-lieutenants, was more than 100 per cent on the wages of the men, all of which he believed was charged to ships. To ascertain the cost of any ship with any accuracy, one had first to go through the Navy Estimates, which gave details not elsewhere found—then the navy statement of savings and deficiencies, which showed the amount expended in comparison with the money voted; thirdly, the manufacturing accounts, which gave the cost of the articles made for shipbuilding, as well as the rate book value thereof, at which latter sum all articles were charged to ships; and lastly, the navy ships' accounts. Great alterations appeared in the mode of presenting the navy ships' account. Up to 1861 they had simply the wages and materials used in and upon the ship included in the cost of the ships; from 1861 to 1863-4, the wages and materials used outside the ships, but incidental to shipbuilding, were added. This increased cost about 20 per cent; and in 1864-5, wages to foremen and other items were charged, so that something like 40 per cent was added to the cost of wages and materials, or to the cost of ships as given up to 1861. Taking these variations into account, the Committee would perceive how difficult it was for any one to ascertain what the actual cost of a ship was. The process of going through all these accounts, adding items omitted, he had to pursue with respect to the Frederick William (about whose cost he and Sir John Pakington differed), which had been several years in building; and in order to know what this ship cost it was necessary to refer to successive Estimates, to receipts and expenditure, and to the navy ships' accounts, and to the manufacturing accounts, in order to see the difference between the actual cost of materials put in a ship and the rate book price of the said materials, at which latter sum materials were charged to the ships. For instance, in 1863-4 the articles made, cost no less than £92,374 over and above the rate book price, and this ought to be added to the cost of ships. As a particular example of this method, and to show to what errors it might lead, three 15-inch topsail yards were charged to the ships at the rate book price of £150, but they cost £430. No wonder, then, that different parties should estimate the cost of ships, &c., variously with such data before them. A remarkable instance to elucidate this might be quoted from a pamphlet supposed to have been written by the noble Duke who a short time ago was at the head of the Admiralty. The pamphlet stated that about £10,000,000 had been required by the Admiralty for shipbuilding in the course of six years. The noble Duke must have calculated only the wages and materials used in the ships themselves—not even all the materials and wages used for shipbuilding, which in the years he spoke of amounted to (or the ships built reckoned as the Admiralty reckoned up to 1860-1) £10,036,626; but if he had calculated the cost of ships as the Admiralty calculated them in 1861-2 to 1863-4—that is, taking all the wages and materials used in and about or incidental to shipbuilding—the amount would have swelled to £12,259,569; and if he had calculated them as ships were calculated in 1864-5 by the Admiralty, when wages of foremen and other items were for the first time added, they would have swelled to £14,172,609. The effect of this would be that a ship might be calculated to cost on one set of data—that is, as ships were calculated up to 1861—£100,000; while calculated on another set of data—as calculated from 1861 to 1863-4—£120,000; and if as in 1864-5, the amount might be put at £140,000. It was of the utmost importance, therefore, that they should have clear and precise accounts, showing the amount received and the amount expended for shipbuilding purposes. The accounts should be made out, not as now, by lumping a great part of the expenditure for all dockyards in the gross, and charging to ships pro rata, but for each dockyard separately. The House should have, as it had been promised, an account of the stock of stores at the beginning of the year; the amount of money received for shipbuilding purposes during the year; the amount of work done during the year; and the quantity of stock left on hand at the close of each year for each dockyard, as well as for the whole of the dockyards. With regard to the charge to ships for incidental expenses, it had been said by the noble Duke lately at the head of the Admiralty that it would be necessary to re-consider how many of the incidental expenses should be continued to be charged in the cost of ships. That might be a very necessary question; but he urged upon the House that if they did not charge the incidental expenses to the cost of ships they would, nevertheless, have to pay them. The pensions paid to artificers ought to be included in the cost of ships, and next year he was glad to say they would be. Again, the charge added by the Admiralty to ships for interest on plant, stock, &c., amounting in 1864-5 to £46,398, was so small, so much below what the correct charge should be, as to be neither more nor less than ridiculous. With regard to the manufacture of ropes, on the question of hand spinning as compared with spinning by machinery, it would be found that in some cases there was little or no difference between the cost of the two; and although the erection of machinery for machine spinning had been strongly recommended, he hoped the Board of Admiralty would not, without inquiry, blindly rush away with the idea that it was cheaper in all cases to employ machinery than hand labour. He understood that the Admiralty were now putting up extensive machinery at Devonport, at a cost of from £20,000 to £23,000, for spinning ropes; and if he was not misinformed, that might be altogether obviated by a small expenditure at the Chatham ropery, which would enable the Government to produce all the ropes required for the navy there. It would surely be much cheaper to manufacture all the ropes required at one place instead of distributing the manufacture to several dockyards. It had been urged by the Duke of Somerset and the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) that it was impossible to build ships so cheaply at the Royal as at private dockyards; but he very much questioned that conclusion. The Royal Dockyards were certainly placed at one disadvantage, inasmuch as the managers of the Royal Dockyards had not the pecuniary interest in good management which was felt by the managers of private yards. But he believed it was possible to get over the difficulty to some extent, and to give the managers of Royal Dockyards some interest in the economical production of ships, and if that could be done the Royal Dockyards would have several advantages over private yards. The Royal yards possessed unlimited credit, and were never compelled, like private contractors, to go to the worst market and to force sales. They had no necessity to employ travellers or to seek by other means to obtain orders; they only paid 3 per cent interest instead of 5 per cent on money obtained, and they had no profit to make, while private contractors would not be satisfied with less than 10 per cent clear of interest. If the managers of the Royal Dockyards were well paid, and were treated fairly and liberally, there would be numbers of men anxious to be employed in those yards in preference to any private yards. The true principle was to pay men liberally, and to give honour where honour was due; but so long as the present wretched and bad system of putting men at the head of establishments when they knew nothing about the work to be done, was continued, so long they might depend upon it they would have extravagance and inefficiency. The evils of the present system were shown by its results. Some reference had been made to the excess of timber in the Royal Dockyards; but he did not agree with the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that the House itself was more to blame on that point than the late Government. The late Government forced the purchase of the various lots of timber upon the House. During the ten years from 1833 to 1842, £2,274,708 was spent for timber, or £227,470 per year; during the ten years from 1842 to 1852, £3,609,152, or £360,915 per year, was spent for the same purpose; and during the ten years from 1852 to 1862, £5,209,757, or £520,975 per year, was spent on the same account. In the three years from 1859 to 1862, when the Warrior was laid down and iron ships were brought forward, the yearly average cost of timber had reached the enormous sum of £795,783; and twice during these three years, first, on the 23rd May, 1861,

Mr. Seely

Mr. Lindsay moved to reduce the Vote for timber by £300,000; and secondly, on the 27th February, 1862, by £100,000, and divided the House on both occasions and was defeated, almost solely by the votes of Members of the Government. The Votes also granted by the House since (from 1862 to 1865) for timber had been exceeded by the expenditure by £275,000. Under a proper system of management this vast accumulation of timber, a great portion of which had now to be sold at a considerable sacrifice, could not have taken place. In the item, anchors and cables, he found the same increasing expenditure. In the ten years from 1833 to 1842 the amount spent under that head averaged, anchors £1,355, and cables £11,680 per year; in the ten years from 1842 to 1852 it had reached, anchors £16,948, cables £16,860 per year; and in the ten years from 1852 to 1862 it was at the rate of anchors £16,586, cables £33,714 per year. The fault was that they went on spending money for things that they did not want, and for what purpose nobody could tell. He wished to refer to one point connected with the iron ballast. He had asked the noble Lord if he could give the Returns of the iron ballast, stating the quantity in the United Kingdom and abroad. It was stated that there was no ballast in the country beyond what was included in the Returns printed on his Motion. In speaking of this, he must in justice say that he believed that there was no one more inclined than the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty to make the best of that iron ballast, for he had no prejudices, he had given no opinion, and was anxious to make the most he could of the stock. If he (Mr. Seely) was correctly informed, there were at Devonport and Keyham 3,000 or 4,000 tons of these "pigs" which were not included in the Returns to that House; and he was further told that when the Great Eastern was launched some hundreds of tons were lent to the Great Ship Company, which he was told had not yet all been returned to the Admiralty. He was told that part of this was returned, but that a message had been sent that the Admiralty did not want more of such stuff; and he believed that a good deal had not been fished up from the river, and he was not sure whether a portion of this might not yet be found in the Millwall Yard. If this were the fact, it showed how loose must be the manner in which the Admiralty kept their accounts, and he wished to impress upon them the necessity of having precise accounts of what became of the stock, of the work done, and of the money received. He would call the attention of the Committee to the increasing, and he thought unnecessary expenditure connected with medical superintendence. At Sheerness Dockyard there was a staff-surgeon at £500 per year, and close to, lay the Formidable, flag-ship, which had on board altogether five surgeons. But, besides this, there was a guard ship, the Cumberland, close to, on board of which there were four surgeons; that was altogether nine surgeons on shipboard, whose pay was £2,813, and one in the dockyard at £500 per year. How did it happen that some of these surgeons on ships could not attend to men in the dockyard? Deptford had a staff-surgeon, with a salary of £450 for the shipbuilding department, and another at £450, with a dispensary assistant at £100 per year for the victualling and transport department (and every staff-surgeon had a house in the dockyard). At Woolwich there was a staff-surgeon having £500 a year, and house-rent £75; there was likewise an assistant-surgeon of H.M.S. Fisgard at £40, and close by there was a marine infirmary, with a medical inspector and assistant-surgeons. The total salaries of these latter gentlemen with allowances amounted this year to £1,310; last year they were £1,130, and the year before only £1,000; and during this increase of salaries the wages of matrons, nurses, and other inferior servants, and clothing for nurses, had decreased as follows:—in 1864-5 the amount was £2,251; in 1865-6, £2,054; in 1866-7, £2,003; in 1867-8, £1,903; so that from this it would appear that there was less work to be done in 1867-8 than in former years. At the same dockyard there was a commodore superintendent, who was to have £1,250 this year, whereas last year he had £1,000. He hoped to have an explanation of the cause of this advance. In this Marine Infantry Hospital, the Deputy Inspector General of the hospital was put down to receive upwards of £600 this year, whereas it was £570 last year, and £511 in the previous year; the two assistant-surgeons were to receive £456 this year, whereas two years ago it was £419, and the allowances this year were £215, last year £141, and the year preceding £70. He wished to be informed of the reason of such increase, which, in respect of the allowances, had increased threefold in two years. If expenses went on increasing at this rate they would soon be something enormous. He wished to know why, when there was an infirmary close to the dockyard gates, its advantages should not be utilized. There was a Mr. Hay, a chemist, who was receiving £400 a year at Portsmouth, and there was also a Mr. Hay who had invented a process for coating ship with a particular preparation. If, as he (Mr. Seely) had been informed, the same gentleman appeared in both characters, he protested against the principle of a gentleman appearing in a capacity where he had an interest in selling his own articles. At Portsmouth Dockyard there was a surgeon and assistant-surgeon, having together £800 per year. Close to was Forton Hospital. The medical expenses had increased at Forton for the Royal Marines from £918 two years ago to £1,178 this year, the wages of matrons, nurses, servants, and clothes for nurses remaining the same, and being only £47, the patients being about fifteen in number, although there was an infirmary for marine artillery at Fort Cumberland, which was within a short distance. At Haslar, which was within a mile of Forton, he found a similar increase in the medical staff. The expense this year for Haslar was £4,957; two years ago it was only £3,956. At Fort Cumberland the medical salaries had increased from £798 in 1865-6 to £1,197 in 1867-8, the wages of matrons, nurses, and clothes for nurses, remaining the same—namely, £251. Close to Portsmouth Dockyard was the flag-ship Victory, and the guardship of reserve Asia—nine surgeons being on the books of these ships at a total salary of £3,156. Surely some explanation of these items of increase ought to be given, and this vast amount of medical superintendence could not be required at and near Portsmouth. There was a similar increase of expenditure at Devonport, Chatham, and at Plymouth. At Malta the charge for the medical establishment had advanced from £1,257, which it was two years ago, to £1,682. The charge for gas and water at all the dockyards was continually increasing. The hon. Member for Pontefract had put before the House a plan for diminishing the number of our seamen and still maintaining our fleet in a state of efficiency. One branch of the service might be dispensed with altogether, and that was the Coastguard afloat, numbering 2,950 men. The total Vote for pay and provisions for these men this year was £184,528, and the Vote for civil superintendence, &c., amounted to £40,000, so that £224,528 per year might be saved without really affecting the efficiency of the navy, for he understood that these ships were of no use whatever, either for the prevention of smuggling or as training ships. There was also a large expenditure upon the training ships, which he was told were of very little value, as they were rarely fully manned, and their anchors were seldom weighed. Then with regard to Greenwich Hospital, the accounts showed a constant increase, the charge for medical officers and allowances to them this year being £3,280 against £1,869 last year. It appeared to him that in all these matters, to which the public had not paid much attention, there had been a continual and gradual increase, and it was principally in these small items of hundreds that the public money was squandered away.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE suggested that the discussion with regard to the dockyard management and the Admiralty organization might be postponed until the system of re-organization promised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite was before the House. Before he adverted to the subject introduced by the hon. Member for Pontefract, he would first say a few words on the explanation given by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich with respect to the state in which he found the navy when he entered office. He regretted that the right hon. Baronet did not make that explanation a little earlier. A misapprehension had been allowed to exist for several months; for it now appeared that the right hon. Baronet did not refer to the general state of the navy, but to small vessels only. The hon. Member for Pontefract had referred to the foreign squadrons, and upon examination it would be found that the increase in the Estimates of the present year was mainly due to the small class of vessels which the Board of Admiralty proposed to build. It was intended to build thirty-three of these vessels, and the cost of them could not be less than £700,000. He suggested that the building of some of those vessels should be postponed, so that a portion of the expense might be thrown on another year. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had referred to the number of vessels broken up and sold during the last six years; but he did not state the number that had been built within the same period. Now, it appeared by a Return he had from 1860 up to last August, when the present Board of Admiralty came into office, 162 vessels had been broken up or sold out of the navy, and 140 were added. Of those removed there were 45 paddle-wheel steamers, 87 gunboats and gunvessels, 11 sloops and corvettes, 11 line-of-battle ships and frigates. Of those added there were 14 paddle steamers, 28 gunboats, 24 sloops and corvettes, 19 frigates, 15 line-of-battle ships, and 30 iron-clads. This showed a decrease of 52 gunboats and 31 paddle steamers, and an increase of 34 sloops, corvettes, and frigates, and 30 iron-clads. The real efficiency of the navy was therefore very greatly increased. At the same time, he admitted that there had been a falling off in the number of gunboats. He found that we had altogether 122 vessels under 1,000 tons in commission, which were well described by the noble Lord as "cut and run" vessels. Of these, 102 were screw steamers, and 20 paddle steamers; 16 were on the North-American station, 29 in China, 9 in the Mediterranean, 7 in the East Indies and at the Cape, 7 on the South East Coast of America, 16 on the West Coast of Africa, 7 in the Pacific—91 out of 122 being on foreign stations. If, as his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract had argued, it was possible to diminish the force of our foreign squadrons, there would be the less necessity for increasing the number of this class of vessels. Upon the question of the policy of maintaining these squadrons he did not mean at that late hour to follow his hon. Friend; but he would venture to say one or two words with reference to two of these squadrons—that in North America and the China squadron. The North-American squadron had been increased from 14 vessels in 1862 to 41 in 1864, during the Civil War in America; it had now been reduced to 29 vessels; but as the American navy had been reduced to a peace footing, he thought the time had now come when our force in that part of the world might be safely reduced to what it was in 1862—14 vessels. If we went to war with America, which no hon. Gentleman anticipated, hardly any of these vessels would be fit to cope with the Monitors that would be brought against them on the coasts of the United States. We should have to recall nearly the whole of them, or supplement them with vessels of a very different kind. Again, the China squadron had been doubled within the last twelve years. Its efficiency was also very greatly increased by the substitution of steamers for sailing vessels. No doubt our trade had vastly increased during the same period; but he thought the time had come when we should endeavour to secure the co-operation of America, Germany, and France against the pirates. The Chinese Government should also be required to pay for keeping down pirates. Piracy could not, in fact, be put down externally; it was a disease, and arose very much from the character and action of the Chinese Government itself; and it was by making the Government feel the responsibilities of its position by compelling it to fulfil its international obligations, that the best prospect lay of putting down piracy. Objections had been made to the concentration and reductions proposed by his hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Liverpool had stated that one of the principal benefits arising from these foreign squadrons was the training of the men and officers, and the instruction of officers in International Law. But these squadrons were very often stationary; they very seldom came together for the purpose of squadron exercise. Besides, the advantages of the training referred to would be equally or better gained by a flying squadron. And as to training officers in International Law, if that could for a moment be considered as a reason for maintaining these expensive squadrons, it was to be observed that it was daily becoming of less importance in consequence of the improvement in the means of communication, which rendered it unnecessary for officers to act upon their own responsibility. The great point of his hon. Friend's observations was to effect greater concentration of our force, and thus, while effecting a considerable reduction of force and expenditure, an increase would be gained both for purposes of offence and defence. What occurred at Valparaiso showed how little protection a fleet could give to British property. In that case our Admiral in command of the fleet had remained as a spectator while the property of British merchants was destroyed by the bombardment of Spanish vessels. In the opinion of the Government he had acted rightly; because to interfere would have been equivalent to a declaration of war with Spain—and if any wrong was done it should be the subject of direct negotiations between the two Governments, and ought not to be decided by the Admiral on the spot. If that were rightly decided, for what purpose did we maintain so large a fleet there? The First Lord of the Admiralty had asserted that the concentration of our squadrons nearer home would alarm European Powers, and lead to increased activity in the building of ships on their part. But surely that was the best evidence that such a concentration would give us greater power both for defence and offence, and would therefore be an advantageous step. There would be no danger to the country in a reduction of the number of men. He had during last autumn visited the American dockyards, and he could confirm the statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for Halifax, as to the reduction of the American navy. There was absolutely nothing going on in the naval yards of that country, with regard to the production of that class of fast vessels of which we had heard so much, that could occasion us any alarm. On the subject of their navy yards he would read a few observations lately made by the Secretary of the Navy to Congress. He said—

“During the past year the operations of the navy yards have been reduced to the lowest point consistent with the public interest. On several vessels work has been altogether suspended, and on others only so much has been done as was necessary to enable the contractors for the steam machinery to place portions of their engines in the hulls. Six vessels of the class intended for high speed have been launched, and also three others, in which the steam power has been somewhat reduced in order to increase the armament. Steam machinery for twelve vessels of the classes here referred to is in an advanced condition, and the Department is under contracts made during the war to provide the vessels in which these engines are to be placed. It has, however, been considered advantageous under the circumstances, there being no pressing necessity for this class of vessels since hostilities have ceased, to make temporary arrangements for storing the machinery and postpone the construction of the hulls. During the year, the force in the navy yards has been principally engaged in placing in efficient condition the vessels which had been almost constantly employed during the war, and but very little progress has been made upon the hulls of new vessels.”

He could say from his own observation that six vessels of the larger type of 3,000 tons had been built. Three of them had been tried. The first had been rejected because it did not come up to the speed promised. The second also did not come up to the speed promised. As the third vessel steamed at the rate of 12 knots an hour he supposed that it must be called a fast vessel; but, at the same time, its capacity for stowage was but small. It should also be borne in mind that the Americans had no really good sea-going iron-clad vessels; and therefore it was the less necessary for us to build vessels to cope with them since we had vessels like the Warrior and Black Prince, with which the Americans could scarcely hope to cope. He would conclude by saying that the navies of France and of America need create no alarm whatever in this country; and therefore any reduction in the naval service which we might make would not expose us to be taken at a disadvantage.

MR. CORRY said, that the questions that had been raised that evening were of great importance, but they were approaching the hour when the patience of Committees usually became exhausted; and therefore he hoped the Committee would not think he was treating them with want of respect if he confined his remarks to the most material points which have been referred to, reserving further explanations for a future day. In the first place, he must remark that he thought it would be more convenient if hon. Members confined their attention to the general policy of the administration in the preliminary discussion which was usual on the first Vote, and abstained from going into details with reference to particular subjects that might be much more advantageously discussed at a future stage. When the particular Votes to which those details referred came on for discussion, he and his Colleagues would be most happy to give every explanation that might be desired of them. With regard to the question of ships upon foreign stations which had been raised the other night by the hon. Member for Pontefract, and which had been again referred to that evening by the hon. Member for Halifax, he might observe that it was singular enough that this criticism upon the subject of the distribution of the fleet had proceeded solely from three former Civil Lords of the Admiralty. He was the last person who would wish to speak disrespectfully of Civil Lords, since he himself had been a Civil Lord for five or six times as long as the duration of the service at the Admiralty of any of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. But from his own experience during that time he was enabled to state that upon one point the advice of the Civil Lord never was asked, and that was as to the distribution of Her Majesty's ships. The manner in which the naval power was to be distributed was a Cabinet question, and depended upon considerations with which even the Lords of the Admiralty themselves were sometimes unacquainted, and which were kept within the bosom of the Cabinet. The Admiralty implicitly obeyed the instructions they received from the Cabinet upon this point. This was, of course, not a party question; still, it was singular that during the last nine or ten years the naval force upon foreign stations was much greater under Whig Governments than it had been under Conservative Governments. Thus, in 1858, when a Whig Government was in office, the number of men upon foreign stations was 28,657, whereas, in 1859, when his right hon. Friend Sir John Pakington prepared the Estimates, the number was reduced to 24,138; the average number between 1860 to 1866, when hon. Gentlemen opposite prepared the Estimates was 33,153, while, during the present year, it was only 24,560. Therefore, the present Government could not be accused of acting very extravagantly in this respect. The hon. Member for Halifax had laughed at the idea of the Foreign Minister directing the Admiralty; but the demands for ships for foreign stations had been generally irresistible, and if the Foreign Minister and the Cabinet said that one, two, five, or ten vessels were to go to a certain station the Admiralty must send them. It must be recollected that the ships on foreign stations did great service in acting as the police of the seas, and if they were withdrawn the greatest loss would fall upon our commerce, especially in the Chinese seas. It would be a most unsatisfactory thing were eight or ten of our fine merchant vessels to be burnt or plundered in consequence of our leaving the police of the seas to the care of the Chinese, which was one of the suggestions that had been made. He did not think that such a policy would be approved by the nation generally. The hon. Member for Pontefract had indicated the other night a scheme for maintaining a flying squadron at Lisbon, instead of distributing our force on the different stations, so that at the flash of the electric telegraph it might be sent to any part of the world in which its presence might be required. That would, undoubtedly, be a good plan if the vessels could also be sent by telegraph wherever they were wanted; but as the ships might have to go from

4,000 to 10,000 miles, and in many instances, perhaps, with only five or six days' coal on board, he was afraid the squadron would be of but little assistance at the critical moment. With regard to the amount of the Estimates, the Admiralty were called upon to justify the demands for the extra £500,000 asked for the service of the present year. It had already been stated by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, who had moved the Navy Estimates in his absence, that the whole of that £500,000 was required for building new ships; and the question, therefore, was whether the Admiralty could justify the proposal for so increasing our present force. It must be admitted on all hands that it would be impossible to send iron-clads all over the world as cruisers to protect our commerce. It would be necessary to reserve the greater part of our iron-clads for the great political stations—such as the Mediterranean, the Channel, the East and West Indies, and North America. What would be the use of a squadron of iron-clads in the Chinese seas, where the work would be much more satisfactorily performed by smaller vessels? In the event of war, if we had not a sufficient number of small vessels to protect it, our commerce would be open to destruction by Alabamas to an extent that would spread dismay over this country. A most distinguished French Admiral had remarked in a pamphlet many years ago, that France must keep her corvettes and frigates in hand for the purpose of sending them to distant stations at the first outbreak of a war with England for the purpose of stabbing her to the heart by attacking her commerce, and thus compelling her to make peace. In order to meet such a mode of attack we ought to maintain a considerable force of vessels of the smaller classes, so as to enable us to protect our commerce from such attempts. He found that the number of ships under the rank of frigates at the disposal of this country in 1860 was corvettes and sloops, 61; gunvessels and gunboats, 166; paddle sloops, 35; building—corvettes 20, gunvessels and gunboats 24, making a total of 306, whereas in 1867, the numbers are, corvettes and sloops 55, and gunvessels and gunboats 127, paddle sloops, 10; building, corvettes and sloops 6, gunvessels 17, making a total of 215, or 91 less than in 1860. The right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) thought it desirable, under these circumstances, that 21 additional vessels of the smaller classes should be built—namely, 3 sloops, 8 gunvessels, and 10 gunboats, which would give us a total of 236, or 70 less than in 1860. Perhaps it might be imagined that the number of vessels of the smaller classes in 1860 was unnecessarily large; but having been Secretary in the preceding year, he would state that the reverse was the case, and the number even then was insufficient. Hon. Gentlemen had talked about the number of our ships in comparison with that of other countries; but it had always been the policy of England to maintain a commanding fleet, greatly superior to that of other nations, and that for obvious reasons. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen said, "Look at the number of our men, compared with the number in the French navy." He (Mr. Corry) might say look at the number of soldiers which France had as compared with England. The reason why France had more soldiers than England, and why England had more sailors than France, was because the requirements of the two countries were totally different. It was absolutely necessary to the existence of France that she should have a large military force; and, on the other hand, it was equally a necessity to England that she should be a great naval Power, and he hoped that she would always aim at maintaining a commanding fleet. At that late hour he would not further prolong the debate, but should be happy to afford any information which might be required on the discussion of the separate Votes. He hoped the Committee would pass the Vote in the hands of the Chairman before they reported Progress.

MR. CHILDERS said, it was perfectly true that he and his hon. Friends who had spoken in that discussion, having held office as Civil Lords of the Admiralty, had nothing to do with the strength or disposition of the foreign squadrons; but that was precisely the reason why they had come forward on that occasion, for no one could taunt them with now suggesting a line of policy different from what they had formerly pursued. They had raised a discussion which he hoped would prove useful on a point of great national importance. The Committee was now asked to vote 67,300 men; but that number did not include the number of men to be employed in the troop ships. He therefore suggested that the Vote should be for the entire force that would be brought under the provisions of the Naval Discipline Act, which would give 69,313 for the true total of the number of men to be voted. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he hoped that the remarks of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre), respecting the British squadron at Valparaiso, would not be lost on the House, because the British merchants there had looked for protection from the British squadron; but it turned out that that squadron had not been strong enough to go into action, and the prestige of England suffered greatly in consequence. We should either maintain an adequate squadron in those waters or none at all.

MR. CORRY said, he considered the number of men proposed to be voted was correctly stated in the Estimate; but he had no objection to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract if he wished to press it, although he thought it unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £1,900,952, Wages—[“Progress, Progress!”]

MR. CORRY said, he hoped the Committee would allow him to proceed until they came to a disputed Vote. It was desirable that as many Votes should be taken as possible, as it was uncertain when he should be able to take the Estimates again.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he hoped the Committee would allow the next Vote to be taken, because it followed the number of men as a matter of course.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £1,241,614, Victuals and Clothing.

Whereupon Question again proposed,

“That 65,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines.”—(Mr. Childers.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £176,018, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries of the Officers and the Contingent Expenses of the Admiralty Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868.”

MR. OTWAY moved to report Progress.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would assent to the Motion, as it was too late at that hour (quarter past twelve o'clock) to raise a discussion on the Vote. He wished to ask how it was, that so many temporary clerks having been discharged on account of the expense, the salary of the private secretary to the First Lord had been increased from £300 to £507; and also, who he was [Cries of “Progress! and No, no!”]; and also why the chief clerk’s and the chief instructor’s salaries had been increased £100 each?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the objection raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman with reference to the private secretary no longer existed. It was an appointment by the late First Lord of the Admiralty, and as that right hon. Gentleman had ceased to hold the office of First Lord the private secretaryship ceased to exist. As to the two extra clerks, they were not really additions, inasmuch as they had formerly been employed as temporary clerks, and were now made permanent.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he thought the explanation was most unsatisfactory, as he considered it was rank jobbery that a First Lord should have appointed his son, who was not a naval man, to this position.

MR. OTWAY said, he saw that the three Naval Lords received £1,000 each; but by a note he found this included £300 a year for a house, so they appeared only in fact to get £700. Was this so?

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Serjeant Gaselee.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CANADA RAILWAY LOAN BILL.—[BILL 99.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Hunt.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Adderley.)

MR. MONK said, he felt bound to record anew his protest against the passing of the measure. He did not look with dissatisfaction upon the Confederation; but he did not think that this country could properly be called upon to agree to the proposed guarantee.

MR. CRAWFORD was quite content to regard this Bill from an Imperial point of view, and he thought that on this ground it was most important to this country to facilitate the construction of this railway. In the course of the previous debate the right hon. Member for Calne had said it would be absurd for us to think of communicating with Canada by way of Halifax, while the port of Portland in the State of Maine was open to us. But he thought it must have escaped the observation of the right hon. Gentleman that in using the port of Portland in the winter months, extending over nearly half the year, we did so entirely upon the sufferance of the people of the United States. This consent might at any time be withdrawn, and so long as the present protectionist policy was maintained by the United States, it would be for the interest of this country to secure admission for our exports to Canada without passing through a foreign territory. Then with regard to postal communication by a steamer arriving off Halifax and landing her mails, they would by means of this line reach the extreme west of Canada, as well as Minnesota and the Western States of the American Union, forty-eight hours sooner than they did at present via New York. The 2d. now paid on every letter, and the 1d. paid on newspapers, would also be saved by Canada, and the line would probably carry a great deal of the correspondence between this country and the far West. Lastly, it was of the utmost importance that, as Halifax was our great naval station in the Atlantic, means should be secured of ready communication with the valuable coal mines of New Brunswick, which already competed at New York with the Pittsburg coal. Looking at the question from a purely Imperial point of view, and not having himself the slightest pecuniary interest in British North America, he believed the construction of the railway would be a great advantage.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE agreed that the reasons assigned by the hon. Member might be a good ground why the Canadians should make the line, but they afforded none why we should give the guarantee asked for; and he protested against the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) asking the House to assent to the Confederation Bill because it would not bind it to grant the guarantee, and then telling the House that the guarantee must be given because the Confederation had been sanctioned by Parliament. Such a course was calculated to mislead a young Member like himself.

MR. ADDERLEY emphatically denied that he had ever told the House it must agree to the Bill because it had sanctioned the Confederation. On the contrary, he had told hon. Members that they were quit free to deal with the question, and they had given leave to bring in the Bill by a majority of 4 to 1.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS (DESPATCH OF BUSINESS) BILL—(No. 58.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that on the introduction of the measure he stated its object to be to enable the Masters in the Judges' Chambers to transact business which was at present thrown on the Judges to the great inconvenience of the public. When he made his statement a noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth) who had had great experience of the Superior Courts, and knew the practical inconvenience which the Bill was intended to remedy, said that he entirely approved the measure; but since then that noble and learned Lord had suggested that it was desirable to have an appeal from the decision of the Masters in certain cases. He entirely agreed with that suggestion, and he had since framed a clause, which he proposed to move in Committee giving effect to the proposition.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL—(No. 55.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the Bill had been sent up to their Lordships by the House of Commons. As the law at present stood it was not in the power of the Secretary of State to order the discharge of any criminal lunatic, who being detained in custody during Her Majesty's pleasure, or who after conviction has been transferred to a lunatic asylum by order of the Secretary of State, or has after conviction been shown to be unfit for penal discipline, otherwise than absolutely. This Bill proposed to give to the Secretary of State power to discharge any such criminal lunatic on conditions binding on the person discharged, or on such other persons as the Secretary may think expedient. The Bill also enabled the Secretary of State to order the removal of any criminal lunatic to a county asylum on the expiration of his sentence.

—(The Earl of Belmore.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he approved generally of the measure; but the Bill contained one clause so important that it partook of the nature of a principle, and might therefore fairly be discussed upon the second reading. The 5th clause provided that it should be lawful for the Secretary of State to discharge absolutely or conditionally any criminal lunatic. No doubt the Secretary of State had at present the absolute power of discharging a criminal lunatic. But he had not the power of discharging him conditionally. The conditions would probably be that the friends and relatives of such lunatic should undertake the charge of him. Now he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was anxious to draw the attention of their Lordships to this clause, with a view of impressing upon the Secretary of State the necessity of great caution in the exercise of such powers; because the fact that the lunatic would be liberated, and would appear to be restored to society, would be known, while the conditions under which he was released would not be known. Now, if it should so happen that a dangerous lunatic were restored to society, it might have a pernicious effect on the public mind. We were living in stirring and peculiar times, and it was impossible to shut our eyes to the fact that the educated and commercial classes were much more subject to nervous excitement and habits of mind and body that were likely to bring on desultory and dangerous actions than at any former period of our history. It should also be remembered that there was a manifest tendency in Courts of Justice to admit readily the plea of insanity, however grave the offence that was charged might be. Counsel were fond of pleading insanity; medical men were easily found to maintain that plea; and juries, who felt themselves perplexed by the law and the facts of the case, were only too glad to get rid of the matter by giving a verdict that the crime was committed under the aberrations of insanity. The result was that in many instances the merest trifles of eccentricity committed at any former period of life were brought to bear at the trial, and were deemed sufficient to exonerate the criminal from the penalties of the law. He was then confined as a criminal lunatic during Her Majesty's pleasure; and in a short time, when he was either actually or apparently recovered, and under the advice of medical men, was restored to society. The consequences were very serious. The Commissioners of Lunacy were generally consulted in these cases, and they invariably confined themselves to the testimony of the medical man, to the effect that, so far as he could judge, the patient was not likely to do harm to himself or injury to others. The Commissioners carefully abstained, and he thought on the best ground, from ever advising absolutely that a patient who had committed a grave crime should be restored to society. They had, however, made an exception in the case of crimes committed under puerperal mania, but only in cases where the woman was past child bearing. It was a very serious question whether criminal lunatics who had committed dreadful crimes should ever be restored to society; and it was very doubtful whether a patient who had manifested a suicidal or homicidal tendency could be safely restored to society. Recollecting the disturbing influences of society upon a patient who was restored to it, they could never be sure that he might not have a sudden access of passion or violence which might lead to a repetition of the act for which he was originally tried. There were a great number of those who were called lunatics who had full powers of calculating the probable consequences of any act they might contemplate, and who were open to deterrent influences of various kinds. If these deterrent influences were removed from them, they might easily be induced by a sense of impunity to commit acts which they might otherwise not have thought of doing. In proof of this, he might mention that on the last occasion upon which he visited Bethlehem Hospital he put this very question to the eminent medical man who presided over that establishment. Dr. Helps told him that perhaps twenty men then present in the room had, in effect, said to him, "If we get out we will take your life, and no harm can happen to us, because we have been examined and declared to be lunatics, and the utmost possible punishment we can incur is re-confinement here." Time was when these deterrent influences to which he was referring were stronger than they were now. He was far from complaining of the altered state of things at Bethlehem; but there was no doubt that formerly the mere mention of Bethlehem Hospital and its horrors were sufficient to set the imagination of lunatics to work; they magnified the horrors of the place, and numbers of them were thereby deterred from the commission of acts which would result in their confinement there. But now the question of simulation had to be considered. He believed that in many cases simulated madness had preceded the commission of a crime in order that the consequences might be escaped; beyond doubt many more cases of simulated madness occurred after the commission of a crime with a similar object; and as hospitals for lunatics were improved and made more comfortable, criminals would simulate madness in the hope that they would exchange the hardships of gaol life for a home in one of the most happy, healthy, and beautiful spots on the face of the earth. He could conceive of nothing more enjoyable to a man of few purposes than life at Broadmoor, where the inmates had at their command spacious assembly-rooms for lectures and entertainments, billiard-rooms, pleasure-gardens, and admirable diet, and kind superintendence. All that was, of course, perfectly right when intended for persons who were suffering by the visitation of Providence; but it did entail upon the Secretary of State the utmost possible caution. He would not say that lunatics never should be liberated; but cases of that kind ought to be of exceedingly rare occurrence. Although all desired to see those afflicted with lunacy restored to perfect health, the security of society at large was even more important, and he had said what he had upon the subject in order to impress upon their Lordships the imperative necessity which existed for the greatest caution in carrying out the provisions of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked, what reasons had weighed with the framers of the Bill when they inserted Clause 3, making the Act inapplicable to Ireland, and why some such Act was not thought necessary for Ireland?—because the asylum at Dundrum was very similar to that of Broadmoor? He noticed, also, that Clause 5 directed that any person who had been acquitted on the ground of insanity, and had thereon been ordered to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure, might be dealt with as a person whom the Secretary of State was empowered to discharge either absolutely or conditionally: was not this encroaching upon the prerogative of the Crown? Lunatics acquitted of a crime on the ground of insanity, and lunatics who had escaped trial on the same ground, were now confined during Her Majesty's pleasure, and could be liberated by Her Majesty on the advice of Her Ministers.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that he was unable at the moment to give a positive answer to the first question put by the noble Earl; but his impression was that the Bill dealt with many Acts which did not extend to Ireland, and that it was thought prudent to limit the scope of this also. With regard to the second question, he did not think the 5th clause would be found to encroach on the prerogative of the Crown.

LORD WESTBURY was understood to say that the prerogative of the Crown could not be taken away without express words to that effect; no such express words were in the clause, but it appeared to invite the Queen to confer upon a Secretary of State powers now exclusively possessed by the Crown.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

NOTICE.

LORD REDESDALE gave Notice that on an early day he would call attention to the state of the new Government Offices in Downing Street. Notwithstanding their immense size, he was told that those at present built comprised only the India Office and Foreign Office; and this suggested that either the number of officials had been enormously increased, or that the buildings were too large. He proposed to inquire what were the facts in this respect, and also to draw attention to the little now being done towards the completion of the buildings, having regard to the immense sums paid for the site, and the large rents paid for temporary offices. He thought that if we were to have new offices the sooner they were supplied the better. He had heard that it was intended to pull down the Colonial Office before the new offices were built. He hoped that would not be done, as it would involve a wanton and unnecessary expense, and be attended with great inconvenience, arising from removal of papers and other circumstances. Another question which he wished to ask was this—whether any plan had been devised and submitted to Government for the connection of the present buildings belonging to the Privy Council Office, which faced Whitehall and ran partially along Downing Street, with the new buildings, which were in a different line, and with which, it seemed to him, it would be very difficult to establish such a connection? And then he wished to know how much of King Street lying in front of the new offices it would be necessary to purchase and to pull down. That he might be in order in putting these questions, he would move for a Return of the property purchased in King Street by Parliament.

CESSION OF RUSSIAN AMERICA TO THE UNITED STATES.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, in the absence of the noble Earl at the head of the Government, I take the liberty of asking any of the noble Lords opposite whether they may be able to give the House any information on a subject of great public interest. I allude to the cession of Russian America to the United States, of which we received information yesterday by telegraph. A similar Question was asked yesterday in "another place," and my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office said that he had telegraphed to St. Petersburg for information, and had not yet received an answer.

Lord Redesdale

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM: My Lords, I am much obliged to the noble Earl for having put the Question, because it affords me an opportunity, in the absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, of giving all the information which we at present possess with reference to the cession of Russian America to the United States. Within the last two hours a communication has been received from St. Petersburg confirming the impression that negotiations have been entered upon, or are on foot, for the purpose of treating with the United States for the cession of that territory; but how far these negotiations have progressed, whether they have arrived at any definite point, or whether any answer or communication has been received from the United States, the authorities at St. Petersburg were not aware when the information thence was sent to us. The question of the cession of that portion of America to the United States is one likely to cause great feeling and possibly considerable excitement; but I trust it will not be allowed to have undue weight in the minds of Englishmen—for I cannot myself think that the cession or purchase, if it be so, of the territory in question, by the United States, is likely to have any such overwhelming influence upon the progress of the colonies sprung from English blood which have been established on that side of the world as at first sight appears to be imagined.

GRAND DUCHY OF LUXEMBOURG.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, At what time the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would be in his place?

MR. WALPOLE said, he believed that his noble Friend was now receiving a deputation from what was called the Reform League.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he can give the House any information with reference to the question asked the other night respecting the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg? Has the right hon. Gentleman received any fresh information as to the proceedings of the Governments of France and Holland?

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the right hon. Baronet would admit it to be proper that such a Question should not be answered before the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs came down to the House.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Public Works, Whether the buildings to be erected at the back of Burlington House for the accommodation of the London University are to be in the same style of architecture as that edifice, or whether the Report be true that they are to be in the Gothic style; and, whether he will give directions for the exhibition, in the Library, of the elevation and plans of the new buildings, in order that Members may have an opportunity of inspecting them? He also wished to know whether it is true, as reported, that Mr. Pennethorne has protested against the employment of the Gothic style, and has furnished a design in harmony with the architecture of Burlington House; and, whether the noble Lord will allow that design to be exhibited with the others?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that the buildings to be erected would not be in the same style of architecture as Burlington House, but they would be in the style called Italian-Gothic, and he had no objection to the exhibition of the designs in the Library of the House. He believed there was no truth in the report that Mr. Pennethorne had protested against the use of the Italian-Gothic style, for he had himself presented a design in that style.

COLONEL FRENCH: May I ask the noble Lord what he means by Italian-Gothic?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The hon. and gallant Gentleman had better consult the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard) who sits next to him.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to know, whether Mr. Pennethorne did not furnish an elevation in the same style as Burlington House; and whether the noble Lord would have any objection to put that plan in the Library?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, both the alternative designs of Mr. Pennethorne could be placed in the Library.

MR. BENTINCK asked, from whom this monstrous proposition emanated?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that Mr. Pennethorne furnished two designs, and he was not aware that either of them was objected to.

FACTORY ACTS AND GLASS MANUFACTURES.—QUESTION.

MR. HARTLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there has been any official inquiry to ascertain the expediency of extending the Factory Acts to glass manufactories; and, in case he has received any official Reports, will he lay the same upon the table of the House before the Easter recess?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that the hon. Member would find in the Commissioners' Report the most elaborate information in reference to the subject.

LANCASTER BOROUGH.—RESOLUTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Petition (presented on the 14th of March) relative to Lancaster Borough, and to move that the petitioners be heard at the Bar of the House upon their petition, if they thought fit. Before addressing the House upon this point, he would present a petition from 1,200 householders in the borough of Lancaster, who had looked forward to gaining the franchise under the provisions of the Reform Bill, and who stated that as they had been totally unconnected with what had taken place at the last election, they considered it would be an act of injustice on account of the malpractices of others to deprive them of the advantages they would otherwise have had. They prayed the House to take their case into consideration, and not to pass that portion of the Bill which included the disfranchisement of Lancaster. He had also to present petitions from two persons, electors of Lancaster, whose names had been inserted in the list of those found guilty of bribery, but who declared that they had taken no part in such bribery, and asked the House to take their cases into consideration, in order that their interests might not suffer. He had now to bring under their consideration a petition which he presented some time ago from the mayor and corporation of Lancaster, praying to be heard by counsel at the Bar of the House against the disfranchisement of that borough as proposed by the Representation of the People Bill. After the presentation of that petition he had been intrusted with another, signed by about 500 electors of Lancaster, who were quite uncontaminated and unconnected with any of the corrupt practices at that election. The House might confidently rely upon his statement, when he said that no individual who had been either directly or indirectly found guilty of corrupt practices at the last election had been allowed to add his name to this petition. These petitioners also prayed to be heard by counsel against that part of the Reform Bill which proposed to disfranchise their borough. He was aware of the difficulties he had to contend with in introducing the question of which he had given notice. When the Reform Bill was introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer it was impossible not to note the more than ordinarily favourable manner in which that portion of the scheme of the Government was received by both sides which involved the disfranchisement of those boroughs which had been reported as guilty of bribery. Having himself read with great pain the Reports of the Commissioners, he was not in the least surprised at these manifestations on the part of the House. It was perfectly natural and very creditable that they should have occurred; but it greatly increased his difficulty in striving to make them take a dispassionate view of the circumstances which he had to submit. It would be worse than useless for him to attempt to deny the corruption which was proved to exist in the borough of Lancaster. He should at once admit it, though he might be able to offer some extenuation on behalf of a portion of the electors. The main features of the case were very briefly told. After the last election, in consequence of a Report made to the House by the Committee appointed to try the merits of that election, a Commission was very properly sent down to make a searching inquiry into all the transactions. That Commission was composed of three gentlemen who were members of the legal profession. He might say in passing that he had nothing to say against these three gentlemen, nor had the petitioners anything to complain of with respect to their conduct during the investigation, which was conducted throughout with great ability, astuteness, fairness, and impartiality. He wished to ask, however, what object was sought to be gained in confining the constitution of that Commission to members of the legal profession? There must have been some advantage contemplated by such procedure. A glance at the Report would show what that advantage was. No doubt legal gentlemen were selected because from their experience in matters of this kind, from their manner of examining witnesses, and from their general ability in eliciting the facts of a case, they were considered to be better qualified to conduct such an inquiry than gentlemen not belonging to such a profession. That being the case, he claimed for the inhabitants of Lancaster to be allowed the same privilege in conducting the defence as had been granted to those who conducted the prosecution. The inquiry was conducted by these legal gentlemen with the intelligence and assiduity which characterized their profession. It extended over thirty-four days. 1,400 witnesses were examined, about 39,000 questions were asked; and the Report and evidence formed a book of 750 folio pages. That inquiry, however, which extended over so long a period, was from first to last conducted without any of those advantages on the part of the electors of the borough of Lancaster which were allowed to the prosecutors, and which might have enabled the defenders to have elicited facts in their own favour in cross-examination. For this reason, he contended that the petitioners should be heard by counsel at the Bar of the House. There was an important point which he should himself like to hear argued at the Bar of the House, more particularly as it was one not confined to elections. The whole of the evidence was obtained by means of an indemnity which was given to the people of Lancaster. In consequence of that indemnity electors came forward willingly, offered their testimony, and with one or two exceptions gave every facility for getting at the truth. He thought the question as to what that indemnity involved should be argued at the Bar of the House. Did it merely involve freedom from personal punishment, or did it also include the loss of the privilege of voting which the parties had enjoyed? Many of the electors of Lancaster believed that the indemnity covered both, and that they would neither suffer in their persons nor privileges, and many of them gave their evidence on that understanding. A Commission had lately been appointed to inquire into the operation of Trades Unions, and in order to induce witnesses to come forward, an Act was passed indemnifying every person who should come forward and give evidence. Some atrocious acts had to be inquired into by that Commission, among others one connected with the town of Sheffield, which had raised general horror throughout the country. Supposing that the House—respecting the indemnity so far as personal punishment was concerned—was yet to enact that the residents in the city of Sheffield should not in future be allowed to form or enter into such trades unions, would it not be held to be a very hard case? The House might just as well do that as follow out their proposed policy with respect to Lancaster. The cases were similar, and the question might well be argued at the Bar of the House whether the indemnity granted to Lancaster did not protect the electors from forfeiting their electoral privileges. No doubt it might be said that this was a question which it would be competent for Members representing the district to discuss. But hon. Members must labour under great difficulties in undertaking the advocacy of such a case. For himself, he must say he should hesitate to appear as an advocate under such circumstances. He had been returned for an entirely different object. He had never taken part in a case of this kind, and this was the first time he had ever been engaged in the advocacy of such a case. He wished to ask the House whether the suggestion of these parties, to be heard against the proposal to disfranchise Lancaster, was anything new? He had endeavoured to make himself master of all the precedents on this subject, and he had not found an instance in which the House had refused the prayer of the petition. There were thirteen instances to the contrary. He would refer to one or two of them. There was the case of Weymouth, in which the question was whether the voters should be disfranchised. The petition against it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House and was supported by counsel. Then there was the case of Penryn, and also of East Retford, and in both of those cases the parties were allowed to be heard at the Bar of the House. There were also the cases of Liverpool and of Sudbury. The case of East Retford was strictly analogous to Lancaster. After debate on the petition, which stated that the electors had no representative to argue their case, the question put was whether counsel should be heard at the Bar. The House resolved in the affirmative, and Mr. Denman was called in. These petitioners on the part of the borough of Lancaster had no representative, and therefore the same opportunity of being heard should be given to them. He would not trouble the House further with precedents. If hon. Gentlemen would look into the journals of the House they would find ample reasons for granting the prayer of this petition. One other point which he might mention was the fact that one of the Members which the borough of Lancaster had been deprived of by the House was a learned gentleman, a distinguished member of the legal profession, and the people of Lancaster were now deprived of his assistance in defending the Parliamentary existence of their borough. He knew there was a strong feeling in the House against Lancaster; but notwithstanding that, he would lay some facts before them to show that the borough ought not to be disfranchised. Some extenuation might be offered for what had taken place at Lancaster when he stated the amount of temptation which existed. No less than £14,000 were spent in bribery and treating amongst about 800 of the less wealthy classes of the borough at the last election. Notwithstanding so much bribery a large portion of the electors were uncontaminated, and he asked that they should not be sacrificed. He would not defend the expenditure which had taken place; but if there were an excuse for it, it would be found in the fact that the greater part of the money was spent amongst labouring men, who earned their livelihood by daily wages. It would be worth while, in considering this question, to look at the position which the borough of Lancaster would occupy in the event of the passing of the Reform Bill, and in case the clause disfranchising the borough was struck out. The present constituency of Lancaster, including those who had been placed upon the register since the election of 1865, and who were therefore untainted, and excluding those who had been declared corrupt, was 600 and odd, a constituency superior to that of seventy existing boroughs. The population was 17,500, being a larger population than that of ninety-nine boroughs, while the number of male occupiers over £6 and under £10 rating value, and above £10 gross estimated rental, was greatly in excess of that of seventy boroughs. The wealth and importance of the borough were also rapidly increasing year by year. He believed, therefore, that the question of disfranchising a large portion of the constituency who were totally uncorrupted, and he might add, from the temptation to which they had been exposed, perfectly incorruptible, was one well worthy the cautious consideration of the House. It had been his lot to become intimately acquainted with members of both parties in the borough, and from his own knowledge he could testify to the fact that a large portion of the inhabitants of Lancaster had from the beginning deprecated the malpractices which had existed in the borough. He felt, indeed, convinced that if the House should think fit not to carry out the proposed disfranchisement, so strong was the feeling on the subject on the part of those who had no share in the practices complained of, and so sincere was the repentance of many of those who had been concerned in them, that there would be no fear of their recurring at any future time. He had hesitated before bringing this Motion forward, because he had feared that it might be regarded as a desire on his part to cause interruption to the Reform Bill now before the House; but he could assure the House that his intention was far otherwise. He was as anxious as the Government or any hon. Gentleman could be to see a good Reform Bill passed, and to secure that result he had resolved to compromise many of the opinions to which he had hitherto clung. He was therefore far from wishing to offer the slightest obstruction to the Reform Bill; he only desired, if possible, to secure justice for those who, having no other representative, had intrusted their case to his charge.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Mayor and Corporation of the Borough of Lancaster be heard, by Counsel, at the Bar of this House, in Committee on the Representation of the People Bill, upon their Petition, presented on the 14th March, against Clause 8 of the said Bill, which provides for the disfranchisement of that Borough."—(Colonel Wilson Patten.)

MR. WALPOLE said, that the question brought before the House relating to the disfranchisement of so large a borough as Lancaster was one which ought to be dealt with in a judicial, and not in a party spirit. Nobody who had read the Report of the Commissioners could doubt that there had existed a stupendous system of corruption in that borough. When he compared the number of voters with the number of voters bribed, he could not help feeling that disfranchisement was never more justifiable than it would be in this case. Out of 1,408 voters, 843 were bribed, while 89 acted as bribers, giving a total of 932. If the House dealt with Lancaster in a way other than that in which it had dealt with Sudbury and St. Albans, it would be holding out a premium to bribery and corrupt practices. The only thing that could be said was that it was a larger borough; but if that was to have any weight with the House it would be holding out a premium to bribery in large boroughs. Great Yarmouth was a larger borough than Lancaster, and the case of that borough would have to be dealt with in due time. For all boroughs, whether large or small, the same law ought in justice to be applied and administered. He certainly had entertained some doubt, and it was the only point on which he had entertained any, as to the advisability of hearing counsel at the Bar on the ground of the Members having been taken away. But that course had been adopted in only one case, that of Sudbury. There, however, the inquiry was held not by Commissioners, who, being appointed independently of party, might be regarded as judicial investigators, but by a Committee of the House—a difference which he regarded as very material. On the whole, he had arrived at the conclusion that no grounds being urged for impeaching the decision it would not be advisable to hear counsel at the Bar. He was of opinion that if any borough should be disfranchised it was that of Lancaster.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that no injustice would be done by disfranchising Lancaster. But that was scarcely the question. His hon. and gallant Friend and Colleague had only asked the House to allow the petitioners, who were in the position of criminals, to be heard at the Bar against disfranchisement. The right hon. Gentleman observed that the Commissioners were a judicial tribunal, and therefore fully qualified to give an opinion on the points submitted to them. He (the Marquess of Hartington) did not deny that, nor did his hon. Friend and Colleague, but the Commissioners' duty was merely to report the facts, and it was for the House to decide what should be done upon those facts. The disfranchisement of the borough was not one of the recommendations of the Report. They did not desire that counsel should be heard for the purpose of disputing the conclusions of the Commission, but simply for the purpose of urging reasons against the course which the Government proposed to found upon these conclusions. He would not at present, if at all, enter upon a defence of the borough of Lancaster; but there were circumstances which might be brought forward in extenuation. The Report of the Commissioners was severe, though just. There were 600 voters against whom there had been no proof of corruption. He did not say that punishment might not be necessary, but it should be discriminating. He doubted whether punishment of such severity was productive of much good. The punishment of disfranchisement had been applied already. Sudbury and St. Albans had been disfranchised; but the experience of subsequent Parliaments, particularly the last, had proved that the end desired had not been secured. It was an accident that a petition had been presented against the last return for Lancaster, and it was an accident that the petition was heard. But for such accidents the corruption of the borough would never have been brought to light, the fear of disfranchisement having an obvious tendency to prevent petitions. If the House should decide on the punishment of disfranchisement after mature deliberation the case would be very different. His hon. and gallant Friend had mentioned a point which might properly be argued by counsel, and there was another which might be named—namely, that though the Commissioners, finding the previous election to have been a pure one, were precluded from formally entering into that or former elections, they nevertheless reported that corrupt practices had prevailed on previous occasions. Now it was doubtful whether the Commissioners had a right, under those circumstances, to fix such a stigma on the borough. It had not been the practice to disfranchise a borough on account of the proceedings at one election only. Sudbury and St. Albans were disfranchised not only on the ground that gross corruption had prevailed at the last election, but at many previous elections. But in the case of Lancaster the Commissioners affixed a stigma without full and formal inquiry having taken place, though this ought to be granted before the borough was disfranchised. What he asked was that a borough like Lancaster should not be condemned unheard. The course now proposed to be taken was without precedent. In former times the custom had been to bring in an Act for disfranchisement and for that only. In no previous case had the matter been disposed of in the same Parliament, or within a considerable number of years. It was true that in 1852 the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proposed to dispose of the seats forfeited at Sudbury and St. Albans in the same Session of Parliament, but that proposal was defeated by a large majority. If hon. Members referred to the debates of the time they would see that it had been maintained by persons of great distinction on both sides of the House, that the question of the disfranchisement of a corrupt borough should be considered solely with respect to the borough. It was proposed to mix up a question so peculiarly important to the boroughs themselves in a Bill of the general importance of the Reform Bill. The course proposed would be unjust and inexpedient. The punishment proposed to be inflicted in the cases of Lancaster and Yarmouth, and other boroughs, would be very much nullified on account of its severity and injustice. It should be clearly seen by the country that Parliament acted solely from a sense of justice, and not with a view to the convenience of Government or the House of Commons, when it resolved upon so extreme a measure as disfranchisement. It should not appear to result from a desire to obtain seats to be allotted to new constituencies with as little trouble as possible. If the punishment were inflicted it should be carried out in the same manner as in former times. A Bill of disfranchisement alone ought to be brought in. It was not fair and just that the discussion of this question should be mixed up with the discussion of a Reform Bill. Parliament would, to a certain extent, expose itself to the imputation of insincerity if it assented to this proposal. What would be said if, upon the trial of a criminal, the Judge and jury proceeded to appropriate and dispose of the property of the condemned? Even though the punishment might be just, the justice of the proceeding would be very liable to observation. That was just such a course as the Government proposed. This mode of dealing would secure to them seven seats, and there was no doubt that they desired to get seats with as little trouble and alarm as possible. He asked the House to hear the electors by counsel at the Bar. He hoped the House would pause before they proceeded in the course pointed out by Government, and that they would deal with the question separately, and not as part of a Reform Bill. He asked this, not in the interest of the borough alone, but on the grounds of honour and justice.

MR. HENLEY: I think it would be difficult to read a document disclosing more general corruption than the Report of the Commissioners in the case of the borough of Lancaster. That being the case, and the House being asked to inflict the highest penalty they are capable of inflicting, I ask them to be careful not to omit the smallest portion of that justice which might be claimed by the humblest criminal. Let the House hear at least what these electors have to say in their defence. I hardly ever heard of a case where the parties were not heard. You may say the parties were before the Commission; but those were the guilty parties only. The parties not mixed up with this transaction have not been heard. The Commission had simply to report whether corruption existed; and, if so, who were the guilty parties. They had not to form any opinion as to the consequences of their finding; and this proposal did not emanate from them. This is entirely a new matter. I think the House has never proceeded to punish parties without a hearing. I know nothing in which this country stands so high as in this—that every man is entitled to offer what he has to say in his defence. It cannot be presumed that we should argue the case of Lancaster on the second reading of the Bill, or on going into Committee—still less on the third reading. But if a special Bill had been brought in, these parties and their friends, if they have friends, would have had the opportunity of raising the question at every stage; whereas now it will simply arise in Committee on the question whether the word Lancaster shall be retained in the clause. Disfranchisement being intended for an example, it ought not to be inflicted in an unusual manner nor the condemned parties refused a hearing. What has been heard at one time might be repelled at another. The case looks a strong one prima facie, but the stronger the case the greater the claim to be heard. But here it will be said that you have acted contrary to the usual custom; and it will be alleged that you have refused to hear what was to be said in defence. Having been always desirous to hear what can be said on both sides before I proceed to judge, and especially before consenting to inflict the highest penalty, I think my hon. and gallant Friend is justified in asking us to hear before we proceed to a decision.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: It is not without regret that I feel compelled to take a part different to that pursued by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), to whose spirit and motives I desire to do full justice. But we have to discharge a duty involving a principle not connected merely with a particular place. We have to consider not only the case of Lancaster, but the cases of the three other constituencies which are to be disfranchised; and we are also about to make a precedent for future cases which may arise. I differ from the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, whose statement is founded on the fallacy that there is something we are to hear and decide that has not already been heard and decided. What has been done? Cases of corruption have frequently come before the House; and Parliament enacted, by 14 & 15 Vict., that when it should have been reported by an Election Committee that extensive corruption had prevailed in any particular case there should be an inquiry by a Royal Commission, when all persons connected with the locality might be examined generally as to the proceedings at the last and previous elections. All persons concerned had notice therefore that their borough would be placed on its trial. Those who had an interest in showing that there was a large section of the community which had set its face against bribery had the opportunity of coming forward to prove it; and those interested in preserving the representation of the place had the opportunity of making out a case for that purpose. But let not the House suppose that because there are 600 electors not proved guilty of bribery that all these must be innocent persons to whom we should be doing wrong by disfranchisement. It is impossible that such gross corruption could have gone on without its being generally known. If all these electors had done their duty there might have been no necessity for the Commission. The Commission has heard the case and has reported. What, then, is the House to hear? This is not a question of private right. It is a question of public functions of which we are judges. No counsel could assist us in the duty of debate which will devolve upon us when it comes before us. We are the persons to argue this question on the ground of public right. It would be wrong to look at this as a matter of private right. When it is proved that a constituency has been guilty of gross and systematic corruption, it is for us to determine whether that constituency shall continue to return Members. That is not the duty of counsel; and if the House were to take the course proposed, it would, in fact, be calling upon counsel to participate in our debates. For this reason, I say such a course ought not to be followed. Enormous inconvenience would arise from such a precedent. If counsel were to come to your Bar, who could stop counsel? They might argue from the contents of these blue books to the very end of the Session—and they not improbably would, and bring business to a dead-lock. If it could be shown that sound principles of justice required this, then no difficulties ought to stand in the way. But no principles of justice do require it:—it is our business, when facts have been ascertained before a competent tribunal, to determine what ought to be done. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) gave forcible reasons why the cases of these boroughs should be dealt with singly rather than be mixed up with a Reform Bill; and it is only right to point out that the mode in which it is proposed to deal with these places is inconvenient on many accounts. Upon all former occasions of disfranchisement where there has been corruption established, the proceeding has been by Bill for that special purpose; and it has been shown, on the face of the Act, what were the grounds of disfranchisement. When we arrive at that part of the Reform Bill which deals with these boroughs, if it is not thought right to deal with them by special Act, I hope a special preamble will be introduced stating the grounds of the disfranchisement of these particular boroughs.

MR. YORKE said, he had understood from the hon. and learned Gentleman that in all cases where corrupt practices had prevailed extensively a Commission had been issued.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, that such a Report must have been made as to justify the issue of a Commission. It was for the House to address Her Majesty to issue a Commission.

MR. YORKE said, he wished to point out that last year, from the inquiry which took place, it was shown that corrupt practices had prevailed extensively at the election which took place in 1865 for the borough of Galway. He asked the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) whether it was his intention to move for a Commission to make inquiry into the circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was unwilling to move for a Commission to inquire into the corrupt practices, as the Chairman of the Committee did not think fit to do so; but that if any other person moved for it he would assent to it. No Member of the Committee did move for the issuing of a Commission. He wished to know whether it was the right course that the Government of the day should allow the question whether a Commission should issue to depend upon the opinion entertained by the Chairman of the Committee or the zeal of some Member of that body? It appeared to him that it was not right to allow a matter of this kind to depend on what the Chairman or the Members of the Committee might think fit to do.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would remind the House that there was another case last year besides that of Galway. He alluded to Bridgwater. He had made an ineffectual attempt to prevent the issue of a writ for that borough. But the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) supported the Motion for the writ. Probably the right hon. Baronet expected to win the seat. Both sides expected to win it. At all events, both sides of the House assented to it, and both had won it one after the other. The Ministerial side had been outbid in that borough. It was not an improper or extravagant assertion to say that in all probability the same means had been employed at Bridgwater as had previously been had recourse to at Yarmouth.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in the case of the borough of Galway the Chairman of the Committee objected to move for a Commission because he found that Commissions were not followed by the exercise of the penal powers of the House. He (Sir George Grey) endeavoured to dissuade him from acting on that opinion, but unsuccessfully, and when the hon. Member (Mr. Yorke) applied to him he told him that it was perfectly competent for any Member of the Committee to move for a Commission, and that if that course were acted upon he had no doubt that he should be able to support the Motion made. Such a Motion, however, had never been made by the Government. It was always made by a Member of the Committee, because the Members of the Committee were familiar with the evidence. The practice had been for the Chairman or a Member of the Committee in moving for a Commission to give a short summary of the evidence, to point out the parts that bore most materially upon the question, and upon that to ask the House to issue a Commission. No Member of the Committee had taken that course. Therefore, he ventured to presume that no Member of the Committee thought that a sufficient case had been made out for the issue of a Commission; and he had not felt himself called upon to read the evidence through in order to move for a Commission. The case of Bridgwater was very different. The matter in that case was brought before the House, and one Member of the Committee after another said that though they felt there had been corruption at Bridgwater, yet they were unanimously of opinion that the evidence would not warrant the issuing of a Commission. It was in that case just as competent for the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) as for him (Sir George Grey) to move for a Commission. It was not a matter which rested with the Government.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that in the case of Galway the attempt to move for a Commission was not carried out because it was felt that the evidence was not sufficient.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If the House wants really to put down bribery and corruption at elections there are two things that it is necessary to insist upon. The first is that the investigation of the Royal Commission shall be conclusive. The second is that the House may be induced—as I hope it will within a few days—to delegate part of their authority whenever there are these allegations of bribery and corruption to assessors, who shall proceed to investigate the matter on the spot. If the House shall adopt these two proposals and adhere to them, I do hope and believe that we shall, if not entirely terminate, at all events greatly limit bribery and corruption.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he thought that there was one point to which attention had not been directed, and that was, what was to become of the voters in these corrupt boroughs? Were they, when the boroughs were disfranchised, to enter into the county constituencies? If so, it would place the Members for the counties in rather an unenviable position. He would suggest to those Gentlemen who were so fond of grouping that all the corrupt boroughs should be grouped, and that they should return one Member that was, if there could be found any gentlemen bold enough to canvass them.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that he had seldom been more surprised than he had been by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Roundell Palmer) when he propounded the opinion that when a Commission went down to investigate the conduct of a borough it was the duty of the inhabitants to go before that Commission and to make their case clear. He (Colonel Wilson Patten) could only say that so far as the inhabitants of Lancaster were concerned they were totally ignorant of this being so. They were summoned before the Commissioners, and they went there like a flock of sheep. As to those 600 inhabitants defending themselves, or offering reasons why their borough should not be disfranchised, they were entirely ignorant that it was their duty or their privilege to do so. The hon. and learned Member warned the House against establishing a bad precedent by admitting counsel—the truth being, that he was establishing a precedent, and that former precedents were all the other way. In former times there was no exception to the rule as he (Colonel Wilson Patten) had stated it. In modern times there was only one precedent, that of St. Albans, for the course now proposed by the Government. Some of the precedents were most forcible the other way. In the case of East Retford the investigation, according to the custom of that day, took place at the Bar of the House, and the examination of witnesses was by Members of the House; therefore, there might then have been some reason for saying that they would not hear counsel. But even under those circumstances it was thought that the parties should not be condemned unheard. What was more, from some cause or other on that occasion East Reford was not disfranchised. The same course was adopted with regard to Penryn, and that place also was not disfranchised. Why, then, was Lancaster to be told that the place should be disfranchised without hearing the parties. He, however, felt that the opinion of the House was against him, and therefore he should not press his Motion; but on a future occasion he should take another opportunity to try to induce the House to review the question.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BUNHILL FIELDS BURIAL GROUND BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he rose for the purpose of asking leave to introduce a Bill for the preservation of Bunhill Fields Burial Ground as an open space, and for other purposes relating thereto. The introduction of the Bill would not be opposed on the part of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but he wished to state briefly the nature of its provisions. The Bill would leave the fee of the estate in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but the City of London had undertaken to repair the tombs and monumental memorials, and to maintain the burial-ground in proper order as a place of public resort. The Bill did not interfere with any of the matters in dispute between the Commissioners and the City of London respecting rents and other receipts. He was glad that the Bill would not be opposed at its present stage, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray) would be able to inform the House that he would not oppose it on the second reading.

MR. MOWBRAY said, on behalf of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that there was no intention to oppose the introduction of the measure. The Commissioners never contemplated devoting the ground to any other purpose than that proposed. At present, however, he had not had an opportunity of reading the Bill, and until he had done so, of course he could not pronounce an opinion upon it. He was glad to hear that his hon. Friend proposed to reserve the questions now pending between the corporation and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with respect to certain pecuniary claims which the Commissioners thought they had upon the corporation. He wished, however, that the hon. Gentleman was in a position to state that the corporation were willing to accept the proposal which had been made to them for submitting to arbitration all the matters in dispute.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the preservation of Bunhill Fields Burial Ground, in the County of Middlesex, as an open space; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. GOSCHEN, Sir MORTON Peto, and Mr. REMINGTON MILLS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 107.]

SUNDAY LECTURES BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of 21 Geo. III. c. 49, intituled "An Act for preventing certain abuses and profanations on the Lord's Day called Sunday." He said, that he would shortly state the objects of the Bill and the circumstances which, in his opinion, rendered some legislation upon the subject desirable. It would be within the knowledge of many Members of the House, that during the winters of 1865 and 1866 certain lectures, accompanied by sacred music, were delivered in St. Martin's Hall on Sunday evenings. The lectures were given by scientific and literary men; the first by Professor Huxley, followed by Sir John Bowring, Mr. Carpenter, and others. Before many of these lectures had been given, or, he should rather say, before many of these services had been held, notice was given by the chairman of the Lord's Day Observance Society that if these meetings were continued he would prosecute the proprietor of St. Martin's Hall as the keeper of a disorderly house under the Act of Geo. III. It was represented to those conducting these services that if such prosecution should deprive the proprietor of the hall of his licence, he would thus lose the income upon which he depended for his livelihood, and the services were therefore put a stop to. In the winter of 1866 they were again begun, and an association was formed, for the purpose of conducting them, but a similar course as on the previous occasion was resorted to by Mr. Baxter, the chairman of the Lord's Day Observance Society. He (Viscount Amberley) made no imputations upon that gentleman, and did not doubt the propriety of the motives by which he was actuated; but he gave notice that if these services were not discontinued he would not only oppose the renewal of the licence to the proprietor of the hall, but would also sue for certain penalties under the Act of Geo. III. The services which met with this opposition were of a perfectly decorous and innocuous character. There was a musical performance, and admission was by money; but there was nothing that was in the least degree hostile to existing religious communities, unless, indeed, instruction in the mere facts of science could be looked on as hostile. There was therefore nothing that need have been offensive or abhorrent to any one of these communities. In spite of this, however, under the influence of the notice that had been given by Mr. Baxter, it was found necessary again to discontinue the services, and the last of them was held on the 10th March in this year. In order to render clear how it was that the services were stopped, he would briefly explain the provisions of the Act of Geo. III. It was passed in 1781, to prevent places of amusement being opened on Sundays; and to prevent also the discussion of theological matters by incompetent persons. The Act provided that any place of public entertainment or discussion open on Sundays should be deemed disorderly if money were paid at the door, or tickets for admission were sold, and that the keeper of such house should forfeit £200 for every one of these Sunday evenings; the chairman, moderator, or president was to forfeit £100, and any person advertising such an assembly was to forfeit £50. In order to fix upon any person who might be the keeper of the place, it was enacted that any person who should act as such was to be deemed the keeper, and any person might within six months recover the penalties by bringing actions of debt. The circumstances under which the Act was passed were rather peculiar. It was intended mainly to put a stop to a place called Carlisle House, which seemed to have been not only a place of amusement, but a place of immoral character. It was opposed in the House of Commons by two Members, and they went to a division upon the second reading; they were appointed tellers, but they were left in the unfortunate position of having nobody to tell. The Bill went to the House of Lords, and in the House of Lords it was opposed no less strenuously, but equally ineffectually, by Lord Abingdon. It was supported by the Bishops, and, indeed, its real author was a Bishop, and it passed by a large majority. It might be said, in order to prevent the effect of this Act in putting a stop to these services at St. Martin's Hall, that the simplest course was to propose its entire repeal. But to this there were objections. The first object of the Act appeared by the Preamble, which said that—

"Whereas certain Houses, Rooms, or Places, within the Cities of London or Westminster, or in the Neighbourhood thereof, have of late frequently been opened for publick Entertainment or Amusement upon the Evening of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday; and at other Houses, Rooms, or Places, within the said Cities, or in the Neighbourhood thereof, under Pretence of inquiring into religious Doctrines, and explaining Texts of holy Scripture, Debates have frequently been held on the Evening of the Lord's Day, concerning divers Texts of holy Scripture, by Persons unlearned and incompetent to explain the same, to the Corruption of good Morals, and to the great Encouragement of Irreligion and Profaneness."

The next object contemplated by the Act was the suppression of places of amusement in addition to the suppression of such theological discussions as he had referred to. Now, those who opposed that Act laboured under the disadvantage of insisting on a general principle, resting their opposition upon the ground that the Bill was contrary to the principle of religious toleration, whereas the promoters of the measure argued that it was merely framed to meet a particular evil which required a remedy; that, in fact, it was meant to put an end to such practices as were carried on in Carlisle House. That appeared to have out-weighed what was advanced on the other side. In respect to what were called places of amusement, he did not propose to interfere with them. There was, however, a broad distinction between liberty of amusement and liberty of speech. Whether places of amusement should be altogether closed upon the Sunday he did not wish then to express any opinion upon. He believed, however, that the general feeling of the community was in favour of closing places of amusement on the Sunday, and he felt every desire to respect that feeling. There was nothing in this Bill which in the least proposed to alter the law in that respect. It would be a great injustice to those who had been conducting the services in St. Martin's Hall to mix them up in the slightest degree with those who had wished to open places of amusement on Sunday. They did not wish to re-open Carlisle House. They wished to hold meetings for what they considered religious worship, and they wished to conduct that service which most approved itself to their intellect and their conscience. With regard to the liberty of speech, as he had observed, it differed materially from the liberty of amusement. They could not impose any restraint upon the liberty of speech without in some degree trenching upon that toleration now so much enjoyed and so highly valued by Her Majesty's subjects. If they said that ignorant or incompetent persons should not be allowed to carry on theological discussions, there was no power to decide who was ignorant or who was incompetent. The practical effect of an Act so framed was this—that any person however ignorant or incompetent who was able to speak from a pulpit might say what he pleased, but no such toleration would be allowed to those who spoke on religious subjects from a platform. The first object, therefore, contemplated by the Bill was to repeal so much of the Act of 21 Geo. III. c. 49 as related to the delivering of lectures, and the holding of public debates or discussions at places where money was paid at the door, or where tickets were sold for admission. Under the provisions of the Bill such lectures and discussions would be permitted. There would exist on Sunday evenings the same guarantee for the maintenance of order and decorum as on any other day of the week. There were, he had been informed, places in London where discussions were carried on on Sunday evening. They were not discussions of an edifying character. They were held in defiance of the law, and the Act of Parliament was unable to reach them. But if a serious or valuable discussion was to take place, it immediately became an object with the Lord's Day Society, and those worthy persons who thought they were charged with the spiritual welfare of their neighbour, to put a stop to such discussion. Therefore, the Act of Geo. III. was powerless for good and powerful only for evil. In order that the provisions of this Bill might not be extended to places which Parliament would not be inclined to sanction on the Lord's Day, it was suggested by a legal gentleman whom he had consulted that a clause should be introduced imposing penalties on those who sold refreshments in the room where such lectures or debates were held. There was nothing, therefore, in the Bill which would lead to the opening of places merely for the purpose of entertainment or amusement. He had now explained the provisions of his Bill, and the circumstances which, in his opinion, rendered it important that some such measure should be introduced on the subject. Perhaps he owed some apology to the House for having undertaken at so early a period of his Parliamentary career the responsible task of introducing a measure of this importance. It would have been a source of sincere satisfaction to him if some hon. Gentleman more entitled to command the attention of the House had been willing to undertake this Bill. Especially he would have rejoiced if his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), who took much interest in the services to which he referred, had undertaken the conduct of the Bill, and had brought to the subject the weight of his authority, and the power of his eloquence. But his hon. Friend not being able to do so, he (Viscount Amberley) thought that he ought not to shrink from what appeared to him to be a public duty. He looked upon this subject as one in which the principle of religious liberty was deeply concerned, and he did not think that that liberty was perfectly secured so long as this vexatious and arbitrary Act was allowed to remain, without alteration or amendment, on the statute book of England.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion. The question was no doubt an important one, and no one could complain of the manner in which it had been treated by the noble Lord, who with great propriety and clearness had stated the case upon which he proposed to legislate. He (Mr. Beresford Hope), however, thought that this was too serious and too complex a case to be dealt with by the Bill of the noble Lord. He was willing to admit that from the noble Lord's statement there appeared nothing against those—he would not call them services, that would be begging the question, nor would he call them performances—but he would use a neutral term, and he would call them those gatherings in St. Martin's Hall. From what they saw in the newspapers those gatherings seemed to be regular, and there was nothing about them that could raise any objection to them, except the incident of their being held on Sunday. The two questions raised were whether the meetings were services in the sense in which we understood the word, and in any but a non-natural sense; and whether it was right to have meetings that were not services on the Sunday evening. The facts respecting them were at present only ex parte. They were brought in the shape of legal proceedings before the magistrate about a month ago. But, as well as he recollected the affair, the magistrate himself appeared to be exceedingly puzzled as to the course he ought to take, and it stood over at that moment without any solution. Under those circumstances, he put it to the noble Lord whether it was exactly fair to attempt to cut the Gordian knot by a measure of this kind. He suggested to the noble Lord the propriety of referring this question to a Select Committee when the whole matter could be gone into. He warranted that a blue book of the evidence taken before a Select Committee on this question would prove a most interesting addition to our social history. They would then be better able to understand the limits of this question, and to determine what the law ought to recognise as religious services on the one hand, and on the other the amount of toleration to be allowed to innocent amusements on the Sunday. Although he had no wish to oppose the first reading of the Bill, he must express his regret that the question should have taken this form rather than that of an inquiry as a preliminary step to its being considered by the House.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was in London at the time of those services to which reference had been made, and he took some pains to ascertain what they really were. They were not entitled to be called religious services or religious worship. There was a great crowd. Tickets were sold at the door. That was a species of trading. The only objection to them which the law could take hold of was that in reference to the sale of tickets at the doors. There was as the law now stood nothing to prevent a religious discussion being held on Sunday, provided that it was not made a matter of trade. The proceedings were admirable in their way, and conducted by able men. There were paid musical singers dressed as at concerts which gave the place the appearance of a concert. He concurred with the hon. Member for Stoke in thinking that this question ought to be inquired into by a Select Committee before they proceeded to legislate upon it.

Mr. Beresford Hop

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, that the Lord's Day Observance Society had threatened the St. Martin's Hall people to sue for penalties. The effect of their interference was that the services were stopped; but the legality of those services had not as yet been tried. He hoped it might be. He should be glad to hear that a decision had been taken upon it. He acknowledged that there might be some advantage in referring the question to a Select Committee, but could not then pledge himself to do so. In regard to the observations of his hon. Friend (Mr. Kinnaird) that the services in St. Martin's Hall could not have a religious character because money was paid at the door, and because there were paid singers, he (Viscount Amberley) need not remind him that there were several churches in the metropolis in which money was paid at the doors, and where there were paid singers. He admitted that the payment was of a voluntary character. But, as in these churches, there were also free seats in St. Martin's Hall. He had used the term worship in a somewhat broad sense; but those meetings were regarded by those who conducted them as religious services. He did not consider the fact of money being paid at the door sufficient to deprive those houses of the character of places of worship.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Act of the twenty-first year of George the Third, chapter forty-nine, intituled "An Act for preventing certain Abuses and Profanations on the Lord's Day called Sunday," ordered to be brought in by VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, MR. STUART MILL, and MR. COLERIDGE.

AGRICULTURAL WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—RESOLUTION.

MR. DENT said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the sixth Report of the Children's Employment Commission, and to move that, in the opinion of this House, the employment of Women and Children in Agriculture should be regulated, as far as may be, by the principles of the Factory Acts. The Report contained facts of so grave a nature as to the bad results attending the indiscriminate employment of women and children that it became the duty of the House, as it had already been the duty of the Press, to take cognizance of them. In 1843 the Assistant Commissioner appointed by the Poor Law Board touched upon the system of employing women and children in gangs in the agricultural districts. In 1862-3 the medical officers connected with the Privy Council, in their Report upon infant mortality, again alluded to this system. It prevailed in Lincolnshire, Huntingdonshire, Cambridge-shire, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Notts. A gangmaster contracted for the work of the farmer, and was a sort of middleman, often perfectly unfit to undertake such a charge. Under him worked the gang, which consisted of from ten or twelve to 100 women and children of both sexes. This system had been attributed to the existence of large properties and close parishes, on which the labourers were not allowed to live. But it was not entirely consequent upon this state of things, because in the Isle of Axholme, where the land was owned principally by small freeholders, women and children were employed "to a greater extent, perhaps, than in any district in the county." The Commissioners estimated that 6,400 persons were employed in public gangs; but there were also private gangs, superintended by one of the farmer's own labourers. An analysis of returns from a number of parishes showed that 1,636 children were employed under the age of thirteen, of whom 871 were males and 765 females; that of young persons between thirteen and eighteen quoted there were 386 males and 536 females; and over eighteen years there were seventy males and 388 women. Mr. White found twenty children employed under the age of seven, and they began work even as early as five or six. Boys and girls of this tender age went five or six miles to their work and the same distance back. In fact, a case was given in which two girls aged respectively eleven and thirteen years had to walk eight miles each day to their work, so that they walked sixteen miles each day, besides working from eight in the morning to five or half past five in the afternoon. In some districts the day's work averaged eight, in others eleven hours, and in some cases these did not include the time occupied in reaching and returning from work. Children were sometimes called up at half past five in the morning, and did not return home till seven or eight o'clock at night. Their wages were in Suffolk as low as 2d. or 3d. a day; and one woman stated that—

"Frank was six years old when he went out. He got 1½d. a day the first year, and was raised ½d. a day each year. Agnes, seven years old, got 2d."

Although the individual wages were small, the aggregate sum earned by women and children was very large. Mr. Hudson, of Castleacre, said that he paid in the year no less than from £700 to £800 to women and children alone. In one district the earnings of a family reached 37s. 6d.; in another, four or five children earned 14s. or 15s., and in others about 5s. each. As a rule, the evidence received by the Commissioners was that the children and young persons employed in agricultural operations exhibited the appearance of rude health. But this testimony must not be received without some hesitation. If they examined the Reports of the medical officer of the Privy Council, who was struck with the extraordinary death-rate of infants in these districts, they would be rather startled to find what was the result of the employment of women in public gangs in the field. The great cause assigned by the medical officer for the large infant mortality was the employment of adult women in the manner he had mentioned. In Wisbeach the death-rate of children under one year was the same as in Manchester. In Whittlesea the death-rate was 23, in Spalding 21, and almost an equal amount in Goole. Not only was the result of the system bad with regard to the children, but it produced the most horrible and frightful feelings in the women themselves. The recklessness of human life by these women was something terrible—nay, almost brutal. Young women were often seduced whilst at their employment, and after coming out of the workhouse they lost their children, and the brutality of elder mothers after losing one or two children was something shocking. It was a common remark of the neighbours, after a woman had had one or two children, for them to say amongst themselves when she had another, "Oh, that won't live long"—the prophecy being made the subject of laughter. He could not conceive a more fatal or hardening influence to come over the women of this country. The gang system was spoken of by the Royal Commission as a recent thing. It had only been in existence about twenty years, and arose mainly from the reclamation of large tracts of land from the sea, which now had become, through the ingenuity of our engineers and the energy of our farmers, from mere marsh, the most fertile part of the country. As yet the effects of the system had not been thoroughly felt by the people of this country ; but they might depend upon it that if this hardening and cruel influence was allowed to continue and increase it would be hardly possible to conceive the injurious effects it must have on the whole of our future agricultural population. Other medical men, besides the medical officer of the Privy Council, had had their attention directed to the present frightful state of things. A tradesman of Chatteris, in his evidence before the Royal Commissioners, said the death-rate in that district of children under two years was very great. He attributed this to the conduct of the mothers towards their infants, and to the drugging them with opium. He added that out of seventy-two burials in the year, thirty of them were children of one year old and under. However healthy and hardy and strong these women might be, and however admirable labourers the men might make, the system, if continued, must have a considerable effect on the diminution of the population in those districts. In a moral point of view, nothing could be worse than the description they found in the Report of the Royal Commission. He would not quote the evidence of the clergy, knowing the prejudice that existed against them in the minds of some persons. He believed their labours had been, and still were, most meritorious and painstaking in the agricultural districts ; but he would quote some of the evidence given by the women themselves and the employers of this description of labour. The first effect of the system on the women was to produce a hard, rude, bold manner, which perfectly unfitted them for all kinds of domestic service. They found that ganging was a more free and independent life. It enabled them to stay out at night, and to spend the Sunday as they pleased, which they frequently did immorally, wildly, and recklessly. The consequence was that it unfitted them hereafter to become good mothers of families or comfortable wives. What possibly could be more uncomfortable or wretched than for a labourer to marry a woman who had never been trained to anything like domestic habits ? Such a woman could never make him happy or bring up his children properly. The women themselves admitted that they did not like their daughters to work in the gangs, and that if they remained out too long they did not make good wives. One said it was not fit work for girls, and another that she would rather her girls had to go into the workhouse than join the gangs. The employers of labour themselves condemned the system for girls of tender years, and said they should be glad indeed to see women and girls excludcd from the fields. He was inclined to believe that the evil did not arise from the scarcity of male labour in those districts, but rather from the cheapness of female labour. In different parts of Norfolk agricultural wages were as low as 10s. or 12s. per week, and in other districts he found that the farmers were complaining that the labourers were emigrating because wages were so low, and this lowness of wages was attributed by many persons to the competition of these gangs of women and young children of both sexes. He did not believe there were so many advantages to be gained from female and children's labour in the place of labouring men as some persons supposed. If they put a check upon it the position of the labouring man would be greatly improved without any great expense to the employers of that labour. He was happy to say it appeared from the Report that several large farmers were giving up the public gangs. They also disapproved of large numbers of children working together in private gangs. The Royal Commission had suggested the adoption of several remedies. First, they suggested that no gangmaster or middleman should be allowed to take out gangs without a licence from a magistrate. When they considered that these middle-men were many of them convicted felons and thieves and men who had committed gross and indecent assaults on members of their gangs, all must acknowledge how desirable it was that there should be a check, some hold upon them, that some course should be adopted to ensure as far as possible their respectability. He could not imagine there could be the slightest opposition raised to having the gang-master licensed on the recommendation of one or more of the guardians. His opinion also was that no child should be employed for hire under ten years of age, though some wished to fix it at eight. Some decided restrictions also should be adopted to prevent the sexes from working together, for he left it to hon. Gentlemen who knew the Fen districts which were without hedges or places of shelter, to say, if they mixed the sexes in gangs, what decency or morality they could expect to prevail ? He doubted if they could restrict women from working in the fields, but he should like to see young females under seventeen years of age restricted from being employed in public gangs. He should rejoice could all women be prevented from doing so. He thought that eight hours a day, including the time occupied in going to and from work, sufficient for children of from eight to ten years of age. From ten to thirteen he thought ten hours would not be too much. At the age of twelve, from the work being scattered over large districts, the principle of the Factory Act, with regard to the attendance at school, must be left in a measure to the discretion of magistrates. In some places the half-day system, in others alternate days or weeks, might be devoted to labour and education. In others it would be impossible to do this. They might then have to require three or six months' continuous attendance at the school at one time of the year to make up for the continuous labour required of these children at another period of the year—such, for instance, as at harvest time, hop-picking, &c., which were special times, that could not be interfered with or interrupted. Much might be done towards checking the employment of women or children in gangs by improving the dwellings of the labouring classes, and by their being located near the farms on which labourers were required, instead of their having to reside a distance off. The blame in that respect did not wholly lie with the landlords. In some districts, such as the Fen district, where the land had been but recently reclaimed, there had been no opportunity of building the cottages required—a great portion of it not being fitted until lately for the habitation of man. In other districts the farmers were to be blamed as much as the landlords for not having cottages erected on their farms for the labourers, having been anxious to drive them away to save the poor rates; but he believed they were now beginning to appreciate the fact that a labourer who had to walk four or five miles daily to his labour had so much good work taken out of him. Another thing that would in a great measure tend towards removing the evil complained of was better schools and more attention paid to education. Mr. Long, the Assistant Commissioner, stated, in his Report, that children were less worked where there were good schools, and he had found that in almost every instance where there were no day schools these agricultural gangs existed. In the diocese of Norwich there were at the present time no less than 120 parishes in which no day schools existed. With regard to the attendance of children at day schools a portion of their wages might be set aside for their education, when they began to earn wages for themselves, and he suggested that the guardians of the poor should be empowered to pay the whole or a portion of the school fees of the children of an earlier age who attended where they thought it right to do so. That was allowed to be done at present by Mr. Denison's Act as relief to the parents; but as there were many who did not like the idea of receiving relief, even for the education of their children, he should like it to be put on a different footing, and not as relief. He regretted that many hon. Members who resided in the Fen districts and other places where these gangs were employed were not present to give them their opinions and their experience, because he had been told by some persons that they could scarcely believe the evil existed to the extent which had been stated. All he could say was, that the evidence, which had been carefully and fully taken by the Royal Commission, and detailed in the blue book, justified immediate legislation with reference to the public gangs; but whether they should go further as to the employment of children generally in agriculture was not for him to say. With regard to public gangs, there was sufficient evidence upon which to legislate about them and put them under proper and strict regulations. The horrors disclosed in the Report were greater than anything he could possibly have conceived, and worse than anything that had been brought before the notice of the House. He was not disposed to condemn the gang system altogether. There could be no doubt that boys could be worked in the fields with advantage to the employer and the employed; but they must take care that they were not treated as slaves, so as to enable the gang master to make the whole of his income out of the hard work of the boys. They must take care that he was a respectable man, over whom they could have some control. He hoped the House would see it was right and proper that this kind of labour should be confined to males. But if females must go out into the fields to work, they should go out with their fathers and mothers and sisters, and not indiscriminately with both sexes. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State (Mr. Walpole) must have had his attention called to this subject before, and he should be glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to legislate upon it this Session. If not, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to assure the House that he or his successor would be able to do so next Session.

MR. FAWCETT said, he was glad that this subject had been so ably brought before the House by an hon. Gentleman having such a thoroughly practical knowledge of agriculture. Any one who had read the Report which that Gentleman had referred to must have become convinced of the fact that a more pressing case for immediate legislation was never disclosed to that House. The most melancholy and startling facts had been disclosed; they must feel humbled until something was done. When they passed through the counties of Lincoln, Norfolk, Huntingdon, and Cambridge, and saw the beautiful fields of corn, they must remember that that admirable thing had been produced by sacrificing the minds and bodies of hundreds of children and bringing immense numbers of women to a state of perfect degradation. Were not those counties represented in that House? and how was it they had heard nothing of that before? The hon. Member for Lincolnshire came down to that House and made piteous appeals to the Government to save the country from the murrain which was raging amongst cattle. Why did he not tell them of that which was far more frightful—the sacrificing of the minds and energies of a large class of the people in the country? Could anything bring out more strongly the fact that the interests of those who were not directly represented were too often little regarded? How came it that the Church had told them nothing of that frightful calamity? The cathedral at Peterborough was in the centre of those districts. Often and often from the pulpit of that cathedral had appeals been made for funds to reclaim the heathen in foreign parts, and how did it come that under the very shadow of that beautiful cathedral there existed a degree of ignorance, of immorality, of depravity, which if they found in any foreign country would at once confirm them in saying, “this is indeed a country devoid of the blessings of civilization?” He had had many letters on the subject. One clergyman told him that as the archdeacon of the diocese and himself were riding along one day they saw several gangs of men, women, and children working together, and the women as these gentlemen were passing committed a gross act of immorality, which he could not mention in that House. How was it that they never heard of such a state of things before? What he wished to point out to the House, as showing the necessity for prompt legislation, was the primary cause of the evil—namely, the utter want of cottages in those districts. If they wanted to remedy the evil they must interpose every obstacle in the way of the gang system. The building of cottages would take some time, which was in itself an argument for immediate legislation, and there was another argument on which he would appeal to their generosity. The gang system was the natural but unfortunate offspring of unjust legislation in past years. The future historian of this country would have to write a melancholy page when it became his duty to describe the evils which had resulted from the Law of Settlement, which was one of the most obnoxious laws that had ever disgraced the statute book. The first effect of that law had been to throw the burden of supporting the poor upon the parishes in which they were born, and many landlords thought that if they built no cottages on their estates, but imported labourers from other parishes, they would escape their due and just share in supporting the poor. In the counties to which he had referred large tracts of land were reclaimed fifty or sixty years ago. There were of course no cottages on such estates when enclosed, and in order to escape the poor rates those who reclaimed and enclosed the land seemed to have agreed among themselves not to build cottages at all, which was really the cause of the gang system. There were in the district of the Deeping Fen farms of 300 acres and upwards on which there was not a single cottage to be found. He only wished that the names of the landowners of such farms had been published by the Commissioners, so that they might be held up to the scorn and contempt of the world. It might be said that if they placed any impediments upon this gang system they would destroy it altogether. That was exactly what he should like to see done—and by destroying it and building cottages it was his opinion that they would ultimately confer great advantages upon the landowners themselves. He agreed in many of the proposals which had been made to remedy the evil by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent); but he would go further than that hon. Member, and urge that no child under thirteen years of age should be employed in such gangs. As for the gang master, he should be compelled to take out a license, and one condition should be that no children or young persons should be employed, which would go far to put an end to the system, for a careful scrutiny of the Commissioners' Report would show that it was by exhausting the strength of the poor helpless children, who could not defend themselves, that the gang master made his profit. Who could say that by the abolition of such a dreadful system altogether they would not confer a benefit upon the landowner? Was he benefited by it? Suppose a farmer were forbidden the use of stables upon his farm, and his horses had to travel five or six miles before they reached the fields in which they were to work, would not the farmer complain that their strength was to some degree exhausted, and would it not form a great grievance as against the landlords? Yet these poor workers often had to walk six or seven miles to their labour, and was it not of greater importance that the strength of the labourers should be unexhausted than that of his cattle? What strength could these poor children have left to work after such a walk? There was every reason indeed to believe that the building of suitable cottages for farm labourers, so far from being a burden, would prove remunerative. Lord Leicester, in a remarkable speech, had detailed his experience of the result of building cottages. He told the tenant farmers that if they wished to farm with success they must have good cottages, and he expressed his belief that if the experiment were tried, farmers within ten years would care more about having good cottages on their farms than they would about good stables or a reduction of rent. The Legislature, therefore, in abolishing this system, and compelling the landowners to build cottages, would in effect confer an equal benefit upon landlords and tenant farmers. But this gang system was after all only a branch of a much wider question, that of the education of the agricultural labourers. The Commissioners had incidentally remarked that the ignorance manifested by those employed in gangs too often represented the general ignorance of the agricultural labourer, and that was true, because no skilled artisan or well-instructed labourer would allow his children to join such gangs, and they were made up of the sweeping and refuse of large towns and the rural districts. Since he first brought the subject before the House he had received communications from all parts of the country, which fully convinced him that the only way to remedy the evil was to endeavour as much as possible to dispel the ignorance which reigned among agricultural labourers, in consequence of which he had endeavoured to incorporate the educational clause of the Factory Act with the Bill so far as it could be made to apply. He did not think the difficulty of dealing with the question was so great as was anticipated, because they would have the sympathy of all the clergy and landed gentry enlisted in their favour. It might be said that if they employed children under thirteen years of age only on alternate days or weeks, they would have to employ adults. Making due allowance for that, he did not believe, from the calculations made, that on a farm of 1,000 acres the increased cost would be more than £20 per annum, which was a very trifling sum to be put in the balance compared with the benefits to be derived from the improved education of such children. That £20 would not be money lost, or unprofitably spent, but would rather be of the character of an investment of capital, the profit of which could not be over-estimated. He could hardly venture to predict the extent to which the wealth of the country would be increased, its prosperity augmented, or the greatness of the nation stimulated by the formation of an educated and skilled class of agricultural labourers. The other day the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) pointed with solemn warning to the Treasury Bench, and asked whether the Government were going to enfranchise the agricultural labourer. He did not share the right hon. Gentleman's alarm, but what a sarcasm was that upon past legislation. What a stimulus to future effort when such words could be addressed to the House with reference to a class spread over the length and breadth of the land, whose labour was the prime source of all its wealth, but who stood so low in the social scale, in consequence of their poverty and ignorance, that the right hon. Gentleman should express astonishment and dread at a proposal to enfranchise them, and give to a few thousands a direct voice in that Legislature by the action of which alone they could hope to improve their condition.

MR. A. PEELE said, that all who were interested in the condition of the labourer must feel grateful to the hon. Member for

Scarborough (Mr. Dent) for the manner in which he had brought this subject before the House on that occasion. In considering this question it must not be forgotten that the provisions for education in towns were more numerous than in the country where there was a sparse and scanty population of agricultural labourers spread over a large district. Therefore, it would be impossible to apply the provisions of the Factory Acts to the children of agricultural labourers unless they were considerably modified. Agricultural employment was of a very peremptory and yet of a very desultory character. It had, therefore, been suggested that the children should work during one half and be taught during the other half of the year. But if such a system were to be adopted, it would be found that the children would forget in one six months all that they had been taught during the previous six months, and therefore, in his opinion, the alternate-day or half-day system was the best compromise that could be come to. One touching argument that had been used on behalf of the agricultural children was that, whereas the adult labourer saved and economised his strength, and took care not to overwork himself, the child, in its innocence and unselfishness, tasked its feeble strength to the utmost. The House was therefore called upon to protect the child from the consequences of its own unselfishness. He wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) to a particular kind of labour, something akin to the agricultural gang system that had come under his especial observation—namely, what was called the coprolite gathering and manufacture, in which a large number of women and children were employed, in the counties of Bedford and Cambridge. He had made some notes of the state of things in two of those coprolite mills. In the first, which was a small mill, thirty-five men, women, and children were employed, among whom were three female children from five to seven, and three from eight to ten years of age. The education of all these labourers was on the whole fair. The second case was of a very different nature. In that mill, which was a large one, 196 men, women, and children were employed, of whom twenty were women, twenty-six were children of from five to seven, and twenty-three from eight to ten years of age. Of the 196 individuals ninety-one could read, but only forty-eight could read and write, and their education was of the very lowest and most imperfect character. The coprolites were first dug out of the earth by means of a pick, and then were gathered up and taken to the mill, where the women and children were employed in selecting the true from the false coprolites, in doing which it was necessary to use water. The coprolites when chymically treated, washed, and ground, furnished the best superphosphate of lime, was exported to Germany and used by our own agriculturists. To revert to the gang system. He had seen instances of tyranny on the part of the gang masters towards those under them which would make one's blood run cold. It was imperatively necessary that the gang masters should be required to have a certificate, and there should also be a proviso that they should not be publicans or innkeepers, otherwise all the evils of the truck system would be revived. He had seen men at the end of the week going for their wages, and instead of receiving money for their labour they were obliged to truck or barter, mostly for drink sold at a price fixed at the discretion of the gang master. He therefore hoped that that fact would be kept in view in any legislation which might take place on that question. The subject of education was intimately connected with that of the employment of women and children in agricultural gangs; but there was one kind of mis-named education by which the House ought not to suffer itself to be misled. At the town of Luton, in Bedfordshire, the great head-quarters of the straw-platting trade, there were so-called platting-schools, in which the worst tyranny was practised in regard to the exaction of youthful labour for the sake of trade, with the least possible reference to any educational training whatever. The inspector of that district mentioned thirty-three of these schools in which straw platting and reading were supposed to be combined. Of the 1,015 children attending those thirty-three schools he classed the whole of them in the category of children who were deprived of the benefits of education owing to the demands of labour. Those "schools" were nothing less than low, hideous, damp, and fetid factories; and it was to be hoped they would be brought within the scope of the proposed beneficent legislation. He trusted the House would endeavour to protect those who could not protect themselves from the double danger to which they were exposed—first, from the danger of missing all, or nearly all, the advantages of education; and secondly, from the tyrannical exaction of what little residue of health and strength they possessed.

MR. POWELL said, he much regretted that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) should have taken advantage of that occasion in order to make remarks hostile to a large class of English society—namely, the clergy and the owners of land. The hon. Gentleman had also thought fit to re-open the question of the cattle plague, which certainly had no relation to the present discussion, and the introduction of which could not possibly facilitate legislation in reference to organized gangs. All who had read the Report of the Commissioners must have observed the extreme anxiety evinced by the clergy to put an end at once to every evil connected with the gang system. The hon. Member also must have been unhappy in his acquaintance if he had not found that there now existed a widespread desire among the country gentlemen to ameliorate the condition of those who lived on their estates, and to provide better dwellings for the families of labouring men, who were unfortunately too often ill-housed. Very few were aware of what was recorded in the ghastly pages of the Report referred to. It was only by exacting severe labour from children that a profit about equal to that of ordinary day labour could be made by those who led these gangs. Human nature being what it was, great cruelty and hardship would frequently be inflicted by these men upon those under them. The Rev. Henry M'Kenzie, rector of Tydd St. Mary, in his evidence, described the evil effects of the employment of women in field work, enumerating among them—

“The loss of self-respect, dirty and degraded habits, slovenly and slatternly households, the alienation of husbands by the discomfort of their homes, the great neglect of the education of children, drunkenness among the men, and the consumption of opium among the women. The evil effects of employing girls in that manner comprised first, boldness, next ignorance, then unchastity, want of cleanliness, incompetency in sewing, mending, cooking, and other household work, indifference to parental control, and unwillingness to apply themselves to any regular employment to gain a livelihood.”

What were the causes? The state of the law previous to the passing of the Union Chargeability Act had a great deal to do with the matter; and all who had aided in carrying that measure must be delighted to find that it was already helping forward the improvement of the condition of the people. Another cause was that in textile manufactures the material being once procured, operations could be carried on at any time. But agriculture was dependent on the weather and the seasons of the year. Periodically, therefore, there was a great demand for labour all over the country, and at other times scarcely any such demand. Migratory labour was, consequently, necessary for agricultural operations. It was well known that bands of humble Irishmen came from their own country to gather in the harvests of our Northern counties. Still, though migratory labour could not be entirely done away with, attention ought to be directed to the best means of regulating it and preventing the mischiefs arising from it. Another cause of the evils which had been referred to was the low moral tone which undoubtedly existed in some parts of the country. The evidence contained in the sixth Report of the Children's Employment Commission disclosed that lowness of wages was not the cause, for that parents in the receipt of £4 per week sent their children to labour in these gangs. It was not therefore so much a question of necessity as of will and inclination. The remedy for these evils might be divided into two classes—the one self-acting, and the other dependent upon legislation. In the first class might be included the multiplication of houses, which would bring the children nearer to their work. Next, an improved cultivation of the land, whereby it would become better cleaned. One witness said that the quantity of weeds growing upon the Fen land was becoming less every year. Another remedy in this class was the introduction of machines to do the work now performed by children. Parliament must legislate on this subject, but should proceed with caution. It was stated in the Report that, in many districts, the condition of the labouring class was so good, that they declined to employ their children in the gangs. If Parliament were too severe in its legislation, and attempted wholly to suppress the system, he feared that it would re-appear in some shape which would evade legislation, and which it would be difficult to bring into order. The hours of labour must be restricted, and if so, it would be necessary in the same Act of Parliament to impose some educational provision for the hours gained from labour, or the young people would be exposed to dangers from which they were now exempt. He doubted the possibility of adopting the half-time system, or even the alternate day or week system, owing to the urgency arising from our fluctuating climate. Still, he thought it would not be very difficult to devise a scheme which would secure some education to the children. Legislation must be uniform; he did not think it could be left to the option of the different localities. If a licence were to be given to the masters of gangs, it must be given under stringent conditions, after due investigation into the character of the applicant, and taken away promptly in cases of misconduct. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) would remember that the whole question of agricultural labour should be gone into.

Mr. READ said, that all must acknowledge the moderation and fairness with which the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent) had introduced this subject. He went a long way with the hon. Member in condemning the evils of the gang system, and in many of the remedies he proposed. He did not, however, believe that public gangs were so numerous as they used to be, and bad as they were at the present time, they were much worse a few years since. He could endorse the truth of the statement made by the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel) that it was customary a few years ago for the head of the gang to keep a public-house or general shop, and to pay the wages in drink, &c. He agreed that mixed public gangs were an unmixed public evil. By all means let them license the master, separate the sexes, and limit the distance of walking to the place of work, but let the House be reasonable and moderate. Let them keep out boys under nine from the gangs, and girls under thirteen, but not go the length of some of the recommendations contained in the Report, one of which was that all the females under eighteen should be excluded, and another that no women should be allowed to work in these gangs. In this free country it would not be well to put this fetter upon free labour. There was a difficulty in providing employment for females of all classes, and there was a growing superabundance of women in agricultural districts, owing to the migration of the men into towns, and the numbers of those who left this country for foreign shores. Many young women, if not employed in this way, would grow up in idleness. It was all very well to say that they ought to be employed as domestic servants; but if they did not wish to be so employed, Parliament would not be justified in depriving them of one description of labour in order to force upon them another. Then it was said that field work was detrimental to the refinement and delicacy of women. It did not, however, follow that because they were coarse and rough that they were also immodest and immoral. He believed that female immorality was not unknown either in manufacturing towns, in farm kitchens, or the servants' halls of the "upper ten thousand." The mixture of boys and girls in field labour was not an evil so great as the crowded state of the cottages, for when young persons of both sexes herded together in the same bed-room, they grew up with no sense of decency or delicacy. It was singular that the arguments stated to be used by the mothers against allowing their daughters to work in the gangs were the same which were used to himself when he asked the reason why they did not send their children to school. A woman told him one of her daughters caught a fever at school and died, and on no account would she send another. A second said her daughter caught rheumatism from the cold and wet of the journey. A third said her girl got into bad company, which did her more harm than the school did her good. With regard to the causes of the ganging system, sixty years ago the land which in Norfolk was tenanted only by rabbits and bustards, and which in Lincolnshire produced only the wild duck, the bittern, and the snipe, was now covered with fleecy flocks and waving corn. There were neat farm buildings and good roads, but not many cottages. The question in those days was not how to get labour, but how to employ it, and he must bear his testimony to the way in which the landowners were building cottages. Every farmer would gladly pay 5 per cent for a judicious outlay of this kind. The employer of agricultural labour was treated, as a rule, in a very different manner from that in which the employer of manufacturing labour was treated. The manufacturer might shut up his mill or work half time without his conduct exposing him to remark; but a farmer could not cease growing corn, or be stingy about the employment of labour without being reproached with not being a good citizen. The farmer, indeed, was driven to the employment of these gangs, and did not employ them as a matter of choice. No labour, in his opinion, was so bad or so costly as this kind of labour, and he assured the hon. Member for Scarborough that the gang system did not supplant good manual labour, and that it in fact only existed where that real and good labour could not be obtained. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell) had suggested that improved machinery might supersede the necessity of employing these women and children. But there were some things that machinery could not do and never would be able to do which manual labour alone could perform, and this was especially the case in some departments of agriculture. In manufacture machinery was employed for working on material in a uniformly good and excellent condition; but in agriculture it was very different, and the farmer had to contend against different descriptions of land and weather as well as different descriptions of crops. He did not, however, believe that if properly managed, these gangs were altogether bad. It would too, he thought, be a mistake to keep the agricultural labourer too long at school. Boys kept at school until they were thirteen or fourteen years of age might make very good indoor servants, but they required the hardy training which could only be gained from an outdoor employment while young, to qualify them for the work of agricultural labourers. Strong muscles and sturdy health were necessary, and the rural clergy whose opinions were entitled to every respect, were of this opinion. The intermittent system of education might be very easy in the case of farmers living near the manufacturing towns, where relays of boys could easily be obtained, but in the purely rural parishes it would be found more difficult to adopt such a system. Inspection was indispensable in the case of gangs or any description of field work where boys were employed. They had a saying in Norfolk to the effect that one boy was equal to half a man, two boys to half a boy, and three boys to no boy at all.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the debate of that evening must convince the House of the progress that had of late years taken place in the minds of the public on this question. The exceedingly moderate and excellent tone of the hon. Member who had just sat down, and who, as they all knew, sat in that House as the representative of the farmers, was in itself a proof of that fact, for in all attempts to improve the condition of the juvenile or female labour, the opposition to the improvement had invariably come from the employers of that labour. The hon. Member, however, evidently felt that the case presented to the House was so strong that he did not pretend to oppose legislation on the subject, but simply to direct the manner in which that legislation should be applied. He rose—without any practical knowledge on the subject, and judging merely from the Report—to suggest that the matter should not be legislated upon without further information. The Report of the Commissioners proved that no sufficient reasons had been advanced for allowing bodies of girls to work in public gangs; but he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that premature legislation ought not to take place. The House ought to have some information with reference to private as well as to public gangs, otherwise the effect might be simply to lessen one evil by promoting another. In any case it would not, he believed, be possible, or, at all events, advisable, in respect to education, to apply the provisions of the Factory Acts to this kind of labour. Still, the public would not much longer remain quiet while the children of the agricultural labourers of this country were allowed to grow up untaught or certainly less educated than children engaged in other employments. Speaking from his experience of factory legislation, he trusted his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) would not legislate on this subject without providing for ample inspection, without which all enactments would be useless. Even delay was preferable to more speedy legislation if that delay resulted in a more complete and useful measure.

Mr. GREENE said, he tendered his thanks to the hon. Member for Scarborough for having introduced this question. As the farmer of a large estate, and one practically interested in agriculture, he could indorse much that had been said as to the state of the agricultural population; but he must remind the House that the question had its bright as well as its dark side. He could not subscribe to all that had been said that evening as to the condition of agricultural labourers. He believed that their progress, both morally and physically, would compare with that of those of many of the manufacturing districts. He cordially assented to the proposal that women should not be employed in the fields until they were at least seventeen years of age, because then he believed they would never be employed at all. Field labour unfitted girls for domestic service, and induced immorality, and on these accounts the question peremptorily demanded attention. The employment of boys also required regulating. There was no intermission of the labour of boys, so numerous were the jobs to which they were put. Although Englishmen were averse to compulsory measures, he thought it would be well to forbid the employment of a boy who could not read or write; indeed, without such a regulation he thought it would be impossible to get the poor properly educated. On making inquiry he found that scarcely any of the boys on his farm could read or write. He sent them to an evening school; but that had remedied the evil as far as his farm only was concerned. He thought it a mistake to suppose that field labour hurt young people physically. The evil was a moral one; and in gangs, of which he knew little, he presumed it was to be found in the indiscriminate mixture of boys and girls. He had found that female labourers might be dispensed with. With regard to cottages, it was clearly the interest of the landowner to build them. He always provided not less than three rooms where there were both sexes in a family. He thought the condition of the rural districts was not quite so black as it had been painted. As an instance he might mention that in his own neighbourhood a tenant farmer had presented a reading room, for the use of the labourers of the parish. He objected to agricultural employments being tacked on to the Factory Acts; but he believed a separate measure might be framed which, while no hardship to the farmers, would be of great advantage to the labourers.

MR. WALPOLE said, he agreed with the hon. Member, that they could not deal with field labour in the same way as with labour in factories. The Report which had been referred to related only to public or to organized gangs of labour. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent), who had brought the subject so ably and clearly before them, desired legislation for women and children employed in agriculture as if they were employed in factories. His opinion was that if they attempted to legislate in that manner they would not be able to follow it out. He cordially assented to the Resolution which the hon. Gentleman had moved, on the understanding that it did not imply that the employment of women and children should be placed under the same regulations as factories, but that the principles of the Factory Acts should be applied to it as far as practicable. Whether immediate legislation could be founded upon the Resolution was open to doubt, for only public or organized gangs had yet been reported on, although the evils attending private gangs were equally great. He had considered the subject a good deal since reading the sixth Report of the Royal Commissioners. The number of women and children employed in public gangs was much less than the number employed in private gangs. There were about 6,400 employed in public gangs, and—according to the best information he had—nearly 20,000 in private gangs. He wished to impress on the House and hon. Gentlemen opposite, that if they attempted to legislate for public gangs before they had information as to private gangs they would find themselves in a great difficulty; for if they legislated for the one and not the other, the gangs being frequently in close proximity, they would drive the women and children from the one to the other. The time, therefore, had hardly arrived for legislating on the subject. He had ascertained that Mr. Tremeneere was of opinion that the inquiry ought to be extended to private gangs. He thought, therefore, the best plan would be to re-appoint the Commission for that purpose. The inquiry could probably be completed by the end of the autumn or beginning of the winter, and the House would then be in a position to legislate with regard to the employment of women and children in gangs of any kind. Whether the employment of women and children in agriculture generally could be regulated was a larger and more difficult question, which must, he thought, be postponed to a later period. In the meantime, he heartily supported the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Scarborough.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he regretted that immediate legislation was not instituted, since he thought the Commissioners had already reported on private gangs, and on the general employment of women and children in agriculture, and that their Report presented ample materials for Parliamentary action. Some of the evidence which had been taken was in favour of compulsory education, and there might be some stipulation with respect to the age and acquirements of children allowed to labour. Parliament certainly ought not to permit another year to pass without ameliorating the disgraceful and indecent state of things which existed in some parts of the country.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he must remind the House, as to building cottages in the fens of Lincolnshire, that it was only in recent years that the fens had been rendered habitable. Formerly the miasma was so bad that farmers who resided in the districts died of ague. Recently drainage had been carried out to a great extent, and the water during the hot weather was forced up the drains, and in that way the miasma was dissipated, or sufficiently so to render the district habitable. The remarks of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) upon the landowners for not building houses were totally misapplied. At the same time, he was far from saying that some restraint should not be placed on the gang system. If it were to be allowed to prevail it would have to be regulated in the same way as labour was in mines and potteries. The evils were the result of the new system of farming. Under the old system of agriculture the farmer was identified with his labourers by ties of neighbourhood and of instruction in farming, but the modern system was based upon economical principles and looked chiefly, if not only, to profits. The gang system, therefore, was of recent growth, and though it might have advantages, it had many evils. He was glad that the question had been brought under discussion, and hoped some good would be the result.

MR. DENT said, he had felt much gratification at the recognition of the evil by practical agriculturalists on both sides of the House. He left it to the Government to determine whether or not they had sufficient information to justify legislation, only trusting that whenever a measure was introduced it would deal with the whole question of the employment of women and children in agriculture.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the employment of Women and Children in Agriculture should be regulated, as far as may be, by the principles of the Factory Acts.—(Mr. Dent.)

RAILWAY COMPANIES DEBENTURE DEBT.—RESOLUTION.

MR. CRAWFORD*: Sir, I rise to move the following Resolution:—

VOL. CLXXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

"That it is expedient in the interests of the public, that in cases where adequate security can be given, the State should assume the responsibility of the Debenture Debt of Railway Companies unable to meet their engagements, upon conditions providing for the eventual acquisition of such Railways by the State, upon terms of mutual advantage to the State and to the Railway Companies."

I am about to bring under the consideration of the House this evening one of the most important subjects that can engage its attention at the present time; and, in order to do so in a concise form, I have placed on the paper a notice, which I think raises the question, clearly and distinctly, as to the course which legislation should take, with reference to the general subject of railways under present circumstances. The magnitude of the question, and the multiplicity of the several interests involved, will be at once my plea and justification for seeking to engage the attention of the House on this occasion. I have myself no interest whatever in the question; for largely though I have been engaged for many years past in the prosecution of railway enterprise in other parts of the world, I do not happen at any time to have been concerned in the management of any railway lines in the United Kingdom; and further, I have no personal interest in any such railway company. I hold neither share nor debenture bond in any; in short, I have no interest of a personal character, immediate or remote, direct or indirect, in the question. But I have been led to investigate and consider the subject carefully, by the fact that I live, and move, and have my being, amongst a great community, whose political confidence I possess, and who, perhaps, beyond any other community in this country, has the deepest interest in our railway system. I wish, therefore, clearly to state beforehand, that the consideration which governs me in this matter is the public interest, and that alone. However much companies may have suffered, however much the individuals composing those companies may have suffered, however much the holders of debenture bonds or other railway securities generally may have suffered, I am not here to advocate their private interests. I wish to regard the question solely from a public point of view, in reference to the fact, that railways were constructed under the authority of the State for the service of the public, and therefore that it behoves Parliament to see that the advantages which railways were intended to confer on the community are not frittered away by mismanagement. Every other consideration should, in my humble opinion, be subordinate to that. Salus populi suprema lex.

Now, Sir, the proposition which I have to submit to the House involves two suggestions. The one is, that the State shall, under certain circumstances, assume the responsibility of the debenture debt of railway companies; the other is, that it shall do so upon conditions which provide for the eventual acquisition of such railways by the State; and to both of these propositions a subordinate condition is annexed; first, that in every case where assistance is given by the State, the company assisted shall furnish adequate security; and secondly, that the terms, under which the State may acquire in the course of years the ownership of the railway, shall be terms of mutual advantage to the public and to the railway companies. Both of these propositions I am prepared to maintain, and my object now will be to explain the manner in which I think Parliament may—not perhaps immediately, but at some future time—make arrangements for carrying them into effect. It may be asked why I have chosen to take the course of proceeding by way of Resolution, when it might be more convenient if I were to ask the House to give me leave to lay a Bill upon the table. But it is no easy matter to draw a Bill, even with a single clause in it, so as to meet the general concurrence of the House, as my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Leeman) no doubt has experienced. My Bill, if I were to produce one, must be a Bill of prodigious magnitude, and must have been drawn up with a thorough knowledge of the relations which exist between the different Departments of the Government and the subject of the proposed Bill. And even if I had possessed the requisite knowledge, I could hardly have gone to the expense of preparing such a Bill, for hon. Gentlemen know well that a Bill of this character is not to be drawn without a large number of Bills of another kind coming on the back of it. Then it may be asked why I have not waited for the Report of the Royal Commission on the subject of railways generally. My answer is that I do not know when that Report is likely to be presented, nor what its terms will be when presented; it would be deferring the subject to an unknown period if I were to wait until the Report of that Commission has been placed upon the table. I think it better, therefore, to submit at once to the House, clearly and distinctly, the proposal which I wish to bring under its notice. But perhaps it may be convenient first to inquire for a moment or two into the meaning of the term “railway system.” What does our railway system imply; what does it signify? What is this immense machine by means of which the whole intercourse of the country is carried on? Sir, I hold in my hand the last Annual Report from the Board of Trade on the subject of railways. It is for the year 1865. I have carefully examined that Report, not with a view to the present Motion only, but with reference to the general question and the public interest it involves; and perhaps the House may derive instructive information from some of the figures contained in it. I will read those figures to show the extent to which our national interests are at present bound up with our railway system. On the 31st December, 1865, the whole capital embarked in railway undertakings in the United Kingdom amounted to £455,478,143. Of that sum £357,657,046 was composed of share capital, and £97,821,097 of debenture and other loans. In England and Wales the share and stock capital amounted to £299,184,751, and the debenture loans to £80,420,076. In Scotland the share capital amounted to £38,569,767, the debenture loans to £11,636,265; and in Ireland there were £19,902,528 of share and stock capital, and £5,764,756 of debenture loans. The number of miles over which railway lines extended was 13,289. We now come to a fact which will perhaps astonish hon. Members. It is the extent to which railway locomotion is made use of by the people of these islands. In the year 1865 there were carried upon these lines no less than 252,000,000 of people—that is to say, about 700,000 persons were carried every day over some one or other of these lines—a circumstance which amounts to this, that every man, woman, and child in the country made on an average eight journeys of more or less extent by railway in the year 1865. From that we may derive some idea of the enormous extent to which railway communication has become a matter of daily necessity amongst us. I might also give the House figures as to the quantity of live stock, minerals, and general merchandize carried by railways, but hon. Members will be able to ascertain these things for themselves. I will merely state that 78,000,000 tons of minerals are annually carried by railways—a fact indicating the enormous extent to which the manufacturing interest and the consumers of coal for domestic purposes are dependent upon railways. The whole sum received for passengers and goods during the year 1865 was £35,890,113. With that information before the House it will be readily conceived what a vast effect upon the national interests would be produced by the cessation of working or stoppage of any one of the principal lines of the system. This may be a tempting opportunity for entering into a review of our railway legislation from the earliest period; but I will not take up the time of the House by doing so. It will be sufficient for my purpose to say that, in the opinion of many persons competent to judge, Parliament has legislated upon no fixed principles. There has been a sort of fortuitous legislation dependent on the composition of Committees, the intelligence of counsel, the activity of agents, and a variety of other circumstances, all of which, if we could have seen our way at an earlier period, ought to have been made subordinate to the carrying out of a general scheme upon principles applicable to the whole country. A system of that kind we have never yet arrived at; but, although we have not done so, I do believe that the time is coming when we may, to a certain extent, be able to take those steps in that direction which ought to have been taken at an earlier period. Dealing with legislation in an experimental form, we have benefited foreign nations and other people to a much greater extent than ourselves. We have been the pioneers of railway enterprise; other nations have seen our mistakes and adopted wiser courses. There is one point which I apprehend must be admitted on all hands. On the inception of railway legislation, five-and-thirty years ago, it was not a wise proceeding for Parliament to authorize a number of private persons, forming a company, to take the lands of A and B, and hold them in their possession to all eternity. The wiser course would have been to have allowed these persons to acquire a sort of Parliamentary lease for a long term of years. In point of fact, we ought to have adopted the system which our experience has suggested to the French and other nations of granting long but still limited leases to railway companies of the lands taken under compulsory powers from individuals for the construction of these public works. Another great error into which we fell in the course of our legislation was to leave so large an amount of capital, about to be sunk in a fixed undertaking, to be raised in the form of short debentures. What could be more unwise, or more unsafe as is now found by practical experience, than to permit about £100,000,000 to be invested in railway works, in a form which renders it necessary for those who borrow the money in that shape to be constantly, I may say almost hourly, coming before the public for a renewal of their loans? This was all very well when the horizon was clear, when there was an abundance of money in the market, and, above all, when confidence was undisturbed and people wished for such securities. But times would come—and we are now, I believe, in one of those times—when the same facilities for obtaining money do not exist, and when difficulties take their place, with which it is almost impossible to cope. There were some reasons, no doubt, why such a large amount of capital was allowed to be raised in so exceptional a form. One reason was that a debenture was a form of investment which trustees and other persons could take who were precluded from holding shares because of the risk. Another reason was the expectation that the profits upon railways would be so large that a limited amount of interest payable upon debentures would leave a proportionately larger sum to be divided upon the capital stock of the company. But, however that might be, that reason has now fallen to the ground, for, with very few and rare exceptions, debentures may be said to pay a better interest than the stock of the companies. Another mistake into which the Legislature has fallen is this—that there is nowhere to be found a clear definition of working expenses, that is to say, nothing to define the charges, which ought to go to make up the working expenses of a company, before you arrive at the profit upon which the debenture interest forms the first charge. The definition of what is proper working expenditure is a disputed point. Of course, there are the obvious charges for conducting the business of the company, about which there can be no dispute. But then there come other considerations such as the Queen's taxes and local taxes; then there are compensations and charges of a very debateable character in the form of the rent paid for leased lines. This last point is difficult to deal with, from the fact that leased lines may be held by the companies leasing them under circumstances differing in different companies. For instance, if a company leases a line, which is simply a branch line; then it may not be a very difficult thing to estimate the claim which is to be charged on the working expenses. But in the case of such a line as the "Mid-Kent," leased to the London, Chatham, and Dover Company, and which forms a link in the main chain of its communication, it is a very different thing. That line, in fact, forms an integral part of the main line, and if it were severed from or taken out of the main line the traffic could not be carried on. Upon the subject of debenture securities, I wish to quote a few words from the recent celebrated judgment delivered by Lord Cairns—

"Although I have arrived at the opinion which I have expressed without hesitation, I cannot avoid feeling regret that securities such as railway debentures, upon which so many millions of money have been invested, should have been left at their creation in a state to admit of so much argument as that which has taken place in this case, and that their legal operation and extent should come to be defined not at the time when they have been given as security, but after difficulties have arisen in their repayment."

I quote these words as illustrating the want of forethought and consideration for the future, which has characterized all the railway legislation of this country. There are a variety of ways in which short debentures operate unfavourably upon various interests; but I do not imagine that there is any interest which suffers more than that of the Government itself. Formerly the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no difficulty in floating £40,000,000 of Exchequer bills in the market, whereas now he can rarely float £10,000,000, because of the demand for money on the part of railway companies to renew their debentures constantly falling due. The Government suffer; the public suffer; and the shareholders suffer; and therefore it seems to me, that one of the objects which we ought to have in view is, if possible, to frame such a new system of legislation, with reference to railway capital, as shall remove, as far as possible, the future probability of difficulty arising from this constantly-recurring necessity. Now, the present position of our railway companies is becoming exceedingly serious. There is no disguising the fact; it is in everybody's mouth. Many of our railway companies are experiencing at the present moment the utmost difficulty in renewing their debentures. I need not allude to particular companies. But I dare say there are some Gentlemen in this House—probably more than one or two—who hold railway debentures, and, if they have bonds which fall due this month, they will feel in their own persons a practical exemplification of the difficulties which I have named. I have said that the difficulty has arisen, in a great degree, out of the judgment of Lord Cairns. Upon that judgment I am not going to indulge in one word of criticism. I feel that I am not competent to do so, because I should not be able to state it in proper phraseology, or in terms such as legal gentlemen may not fairly take exception to. I have, however, an idea of my own upon the subject; and this I may be allowed to say, that, looking at the position of those companies, which, in consequence of that judgment, may be unable to renew their debentures falling due, I conceive it to be not impossible, or even improbable, that the Court of Chancery may be called upon to interfere. I should like to know what is the position of a company which once finds itself within the domain of the Court of Chancery. Now, I will read one or two words from the judgment I have referred to. Lord Cairns said—

"When the Court appoints a manager of a business or undertaking, it in effect assumes the management into its own hands; for the manager is the servant or officer of the Court, and, upon any question arising as to the character or details of the management, it is the Court that must direct and decide. The circumstance that, in this particular case, the persons appointed were previously the managers employed by the company, is immaterial. When appointed by the Court, they are responsible to the Court, and no orders of the company or of the Directors can interfere with this responsibility. Now, I apprehend that nothing is better settled than that this Court does not assume the management of a business or undertaking except with a view to the winding-up and sale of the business or undertaking. The management is an interim management; its necessity and its justification spring out of the jurisdiction to liquidate and to sell; the business or undertaking is managed and continued in order that it may be sold as a going concern, and with the sale the management ends."

Now, the point I wish to insist upon is this—that when a railway company finds itself under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in the sense to which I have alluded, the Court of Chancery becomes as it were the manager of the company for the purpose of keeping it a going concern, for the purpose of sale. But who will buy a railway placed in such a position? Any number of persons possessing the requisite capital may constitute themselves a company; but I apprehend that no individuals forming a company could proceed to buy up a defunct railway concern without special legislative authority. To obtain such powers would necessitate a long delay. Nor could any existing company purchase such a defunct concern, because no existing company has any powers which would enable them to do so. To acquire such powers it would have to make application to Parliament. And there are many other difficulties attending such a course, difficulties which have been well described in a letter bearing the signature of "Inquirer," which appeared on the 23rd of February last in The Economist newspaper. In that letter the whole question was discussed at length of a railway company being offered for sale, and the difficulties are so great, that in the event of any company being brought to sale in that way, it would be impossible for the Court of Chancery to act as managers of the concern without enormous public inconvenience, and even without a cessation to a great extent of the advantages which the public derive from the continuance of traffic in the district. See, for instance, what effect has been produced within the last few days by the comparative cessation of traffic on only one line, the inconvenience to which persons living to the South of London were exposed owing to the strike of the engine-drivers on the London and Brighton Railway. From that circumstance we can form some idea of the effect which would be produced by the stoppage of the traffic on some great line such as the Great Western Railway; and I select this company as an example merely on account of the fact that it lies in the centre of a great traffic system. If such a stoppage were to occur on this line, even for one day only, the inconvenience that would result to the public in consequence it would be impossible to estimate. Now, Sir, for this state of things a great many remedies have been proposed. The newspapers have, indeed, teemed with letters on the subject. I have the greater part of them with me at the present moment, but I do not certainly intend to read them now, because I take it for granted that they have already been seen by hon. Gentlemen who feel interested in this subject. A letter from an instructive pen, the authorship of which I think I can trace, appeared in The Times under the signature of "Civis." We have also suggestions innumerable for the creation of debenture stock; another for a mutual guarantee on the part of good lines of the debenture debt of other and weaker enterprizes; for an association of railway enterprizes by which the weaker brethren would receive assistance at the hands of the stronger. There is something novel in this proposal, but it is not the one I should ask the House to adopt. The creation of debenture stock is a question well deserving, in my humble opinion, the consideration of this House; but the real remedy is to be found, I think, in the proposal which, with the permission of the House, I will suggest. I would ask the House to consider the outlines of a plan by which the Government shall be empowered to assist with the credit of the State railway companies which are unable to meet their engagements. I would limit that plan to railway companies unable to meet their engagements, for two reasons. The one is, that I do not wish to excite opposition, on the part of those railways whose affairs are so well conducted as to place them beyond suspicion, and the necessity of applying for assistance to the Government or to any one else; and in the second place, I do not wish to arouse jealousy on the part of that body of the public who naturally view with jealousy any guarantee on the part of Government, or any participation of the Government in any national enterprize. I should like to see the plan I am suggesting tried tentatively, to see how it worked; because if it did succeed, as I apprehend it would, the advantage which it would confer upon the railway company receiving assistance would be so great it would, in point of fact, so raise it from the mire of despondency into so happy a frame of mind that many other well-to-do companies would view its condition with envy, and seek to share in the benefits of the plan, if Parliament should consent to the enlargement of the scheme. I would suggest that any company unable to meet its engagements, and against which a judgment at law may have been obtained, may apply to the Government under the provisions of an Act to be passed for the purpose, and then that the Government, if satisfied with the security offered, and the general condition of the railway company requiring assistance, may grant it the assistance it needs. In the majority of cases the Government would, I apprehend, run very little risk, because all the main lines of railway in the country are at this time well constructed lines, upon which no great amount of expenditure is required; lines which are earning large gross incomes, and on which the working expenses do not on the average exceed 48 per cent of their gross traffic receipts. If that be the case, it is clear that any assistance which the Government might be empowered to render to the railway company would be the subject of the first charge upon the remaining 52 per cent of the traffic receipts. I would suggest that the Government be empowered to guarantee the principal and interest of the debenture debt of the company, and that they should issue in place of that debt, as the debentures fell due and came in, obligations of the Government, in a form to be prescribed, to run for a term of fifty years. These obligations should be the first charge upon the receipts of the company after payment of working expenses, and these working expenses, if they are not sufficiently defined by the recommendation of the Committee now sitting upstairs, ought to be defined in the Bill to be submitted to the House. But as the Government would have rendered considerable assistance to the railway company, the railway company should not have the power by a lavish expenditure, and an improper use of the assistance rendered by the Government, in any way to damage the security which its profits would afford; and I would therefore enact that the Government should thenceforward possess a power of veto over the proceedings of the company in all matters affecting its capital expenditure. That power should, however, be strictly limited to matters of capital expenditure, because it is exceedingly undesirable that the Government should have anything to do with the working arrangements. A railway company might be permitted to expend money from its capital for enlarging its stations, or for purposes of an analogous character; but a controlling power should be very strictly exercised by the State to prevent companies from coming to Parliament, as they do now, at the instigation of agents, or of engineers, or of lawyers, or of any members of that class who spy their prey in the distance, for the purpose of expending capital in waging war on other companies. The public, as well as the Government, should be protected from any improper attempt to enlarge the capital expenditure. It will not be at all difficult to do this. In India millions upon millions of our money have been expended upon the construction of railways, and the system adopted there has been found to work remarkably well. It would not be difficult to lay down rules by which the Government would be enabled to exercise that power of veto. Though permitted to expend money upon the enlargement of stations and matters of an analogous character, railway companies should not be permitted to wage war upon their neighbours by invading the territory of other companies, or to offer them any molestation. The public would, I think, be pleased at seeing a power interposed between themselves and the scheming portion of the population engaged in the speculative manipulation of railway affairs. I have stated that, in my opinion, Parliament made a great mistake in not securing the reversion of the freehold interest in the lands taken from private individuals for the purposes of railway construction. I think that it is even now not too late to remedy that mistake, and that, if a railway company find it to its advantage to apply to the Government for the purpose of obtaining relief, the Government should, upon assuming the liability upon the debenture debt, call upon the company to make a surrender to the State of the freehold interest in its property, and should then grant a Parliamentary lease to the railway company of the lands and the undertaking for a long term of years—say for ninety-nine years—subject to a power on the part of the State to re-enter, at an earlier period, upon conditions which I will shortly mention. But, before doing so, I wish to say, with reference to the charge for which the Government would be liable—that is to say, for the interest upon the amount of the obligations which it assumed on the part of the company—I would compel every company to render to the Government weekly 1-52nd part, or monthly 1-12th part, of the sum estimated to be necessary to cover the liability of the Government in respect of the interest on its obligations. Now, inasmuch as the Government would have a claim upon the 52 per cent of the gross receipts of the company, it is clear that the Government would take upon itself no great amount of risk, if the money with which it was to pay the interest on these obligations were sent in at once, immediately upon its receipt, by the railway company. But inasmuch as the credit of the Government is a very different thing from the credit of a public company—being perhaps fairly estimated as the difference between  $3\frac{1}{2}$  and  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—I would call upon the railway company to pay to the Government a further sum of 1 per cent, making in the whole, say  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; the credit of the Government enabling it to issue money to the companies at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. This 1 per cent, which would be paid upon the amount of the outstanding obligations of the company, should be invested every half-year in Government stock, or in redemption of the railway obligations; and as £1 invested in a Government Three per Cent Stock will produce at the end of fifty years £114 8s., so at the end of the fifty years the whole of the liability of the State will have been extinguished. It is true that it will have been extinguished by the payments on the part of the railway companies; but the railway companies would have paid no more than if they had borrowed the money on their own credit, whilst they will have at the same time the benefit of the extinguishment of their debt. At the end of the fifty years, when the obligations of the Government shall have been discharged, and the other liabilities with reference to the bonded debt shall have ceased, the Government should have the power of purchasing the undertaking at the average price which it had borne in the market for a certain number of years previously, say for two, three, four, or five years, making payment in Government securities, issued at such a price, as would enable the persons who received them in exchange for their stock, to reproduce in their pockets the value of the stock according to the computation agreed upon. If the Government did not see fit on the part of the State so to purchase the railway, the lease would then continue to run to the end of the ninety-nine years. I apprehend that it may appear to be a formidable proposition to require a railway company to relinquish and give up its property to the State even at so distant a period as ninety-nine years. Ninety-nine years is a term on which any person, when taking a lease for that time, bestows very little thought; and it is not until some forty or fifty years of the term have passed away that the possibility of the expiration of the lease suggests itself to the mind of the holder. Indeed, so small is the sum required to re-produce capital at the end of ninety-nine years, that 20d. taken out of every £100 of its net profits, and invested by a railway company every half-year in a Three per Cent Government Stock, will reproduce the capital of the company at the end of ninety-nine years. By means of this proposition the Government would, I conceive, be enabled to render to the railway interest at large very great and very valuable assistance. It would, I think, have the effect of relieving railway companies, and the railway world in general, from the pressure which is now placed upon them. It would enable them at once to carry on their transactions without the fear, or apprehension, or cost, attendant on the constant renewal of their debenture debt, while they would be subjected to no higher charge than they at present have to meet. For the charge of 1 per cent, which I have already mentioned, would place them in no worse position with respect to the rate of interest payable upon their bonds than that which they now occupy, and they would besides have the benefit of being enabled to extinguish the whole of their debt in the manner I have indicated. If, on the other hand, they were called upon to surrender their property at the end of the long term I have stated, they might by a very moderate provision secure themselves against loss. I think, therefore, upon the whole, that however startling such a proposition as this may appear to those who look upon it from a Government or shareholder's point of view, there is nothing in it, at all events, which should not entitle it to receive the attentive consideration of this House and of the public. I may add, although it may appear a somewhat visionary view, that, supposing all the railway companies to have in the course of time thus surrendered their property to the State, and the State to be at the end of ninety-nine years in possession of that property, it would then have an estate of the value of something like £500,000,000, which it might, if it pleased, re-let to railway companies for the purpose of being worked. If let at a sum equal to 5 per cent, an income of about £25,000,000 per annum would be secured by the State from this property; or, in other words, a sum amounting to about the annual charge for the National Debt. It is, of course, quite true that ninety-nine years are a long time to look forward to; and it may be said, as was once observed by a distinguished person on the other side of Temple Bar, that there is no good reason why we should trouble ourselves about posterity, inasmuch as posterity has never done anything for us. There are, however, some persons in this House who do think it worth while to have an eye to the interests of posterity; and there is, I think, nothing in my proposition which does not recommend it to the consideration of those who entertain that view. I may remark, that in the year 1768, the Finsbury Estate was let under the authority of an Act of Parliament for ninety-nine years, and that the end of that term was at the time, no doubt, looked upon as being very remote. The ninety-nine years have, however, all but passed away, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are now about to step into an annual income of £70,000 from that property. I am therefore of opinion that the country may very fairly be content to have some regard for posterity, and to assist in relieving it from a heavy charge in the way I have suggested.

There is one other point to which I wish to refer before I sit down, and that is the application of this suggestion to the case of Ireland. I find from the Parliamentary accounts relating to that country, that, on the 31st of December, 1865, the whole of the capital authorized to be raised for the construction of Irish railways amounted to £34,035,491, of which sum £19,902,528 were paid up, while the debenture loans outstanding were £5,764,284. I further find that the gross receipts from Irish railways amounted to £1,737,061, and the net receipts to £900,592. Now, if from that sum of £900,592 interest at the rate of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the debenture debt be deducted, you will find that 3 per cent would represent the profit on the capital invested in those railways. But when it is considered that the Irish railways, which are upwards of fifty in number, are conducted and carried on at a great expense in the aggregate, and that that expense might be very considerably reduced by the amalgamation of the various companies under one, two, or say three or four systems of management, I think it will scarcely be thought that I am taking too sanguine a view, when I state that the receipts would, in all probability, be so enlarged by the application of my proposition to the case of those railways, that the shareholders would obtain a net profit of something like 4 or 5 per cent. I mention this by way of illustration, to show how the project might be made to work. I do not think I have anything more to say in submitting this Resolution to the notice of the House. My object is to obtain a general expression of opinion upon it. I am very thankful to the House for having allowed me to make this statement, and I leave my proposition in its hands to be dealt with as it may deem fit.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient in the interests of the Public, that in cases where adequate security can be given, the State should assume the responsibility of the Debenture Debt of Railway Companies unable to meet their engagements, upon conditions providing for the eventual acquisition of such Railways by the State, upon terms of mutual advantage to the State and to the Railway Companies."—(Mr. Crawford.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, there was no man in the House more entitled to be heard on such a question as that now submitted as his hon. Friend the Member for the City (Mr. Crawford). His high position in the mercantile world, and his great experience on this subject, and especially in regard to Indian railways, entitled him to speak with authority, and no one could consider this Motion ill-timed. We were now passing through a great crisis in our railway history—a crisis of deep gravity and severity, involving the interests of thousands—from which he trusted we might emerge with less loss and difficulty than we were sometimes disposed to fear. His hon. Friend had drawn a distinction—a very proper distinction—between private and public interests; but when it was considered how enormous was the number of those beneficially interested in railways, the term "public" might with great truth and force be applied to these; also, considering how many calls for immediate legislation in various directions were made upon the Government, and what confusion existed in men's minds as to the kind of legislation which was required to give them what was wanted, and even what was necessary to relieve railways from their present difficulties, he thought his hon. Friend had done good service in raising a discussion like this. He thought, at any rate, that such a discussion might clear away many difficulties, and might possibly indicate the best course to be pursued. He would endeavour to follow the points of his hon. Friend's able and interesting speech, and make such observations as his less experience might enable him, with all humility, to offer. His hon. Friend began by proposing that the State should assume the debenture debt of those companies only which are in difficulty, provided their security is good, and for the purpose of eventually acquiring the lines; and having given a very interesting and no doubt very accurate description of the vastness of railway property, and the way the public were dependent upon it for most of the comforts and conveniences, and even the daily necessities of life, he went on to ascribe the position in which that property was now placed to the action of Parliament—to railway legislation, which he said had been experimental, guided by no fixed principles, and had operated as a warning to other countries which had profited by our example and avoided our errors. And he said we should have followed the same policy as the French Government had done in respect to their railways, by leasing the lines to companies for a term. The late Sir Robert Peel, no doubt, had that opportunity, and after much deliberation, as we are told, decided not to avail himself of it. There was much to be said in favour of such a plan; but, on the other hand, there were many objections to it. One of the objections to it was that the lessor, something like the consignee of a West Indian estate, was sometimes tempted to make advances for the purpose of obtaining his rent, and, in fact, ended frequently by throwing good money after bad. We had heard, whether truly or not, that the example of France had not been so encouraging, and that the French Government had advanced considerable sums to the railway companies for the formation of branch lines which were not likely to be commercially successful. We heard, too, that the Russian Government was on the point of selling its Imperial Railway from Petersburg to Moscow to a private company. We must bear in mind, moreover, that these Governments were the original owners of a whole system, and not the purchasers of fragments. His hon. Friend found fault with the law respecting debentures, saying they were too short in date; and he quite agreed with this. The primary idea was, no doubt, that debentures would be merely temporary loans paid off when the railway came into full work. On the Continent they ran for much longer dates, and consequently the "obligations" were brought and sold on every Bourse; whereas the sale of debentures here was a matter of negotiation, which of course affected their value, thus making them less desirable as investments for capital. Moreover, on the Continental railways a reserve was kept as a sinking fund to pay off these obligations. We were compelled to trust to renewals, and therefore were at the mercy of every wind that blew. His hon. Friend mentioned debenture stock, and it seemed to him that the best way out of this part of the difficulty was the issue of debenture stock, at long dates and at any rate of interest. But here we required fresh legislation, because a limit had been placed on the rate at which this stock could be issued. This was done, no doubt, with the very laudible object of protecting those who came after us; but like most attempts in that direction, it had been productive of much mischief; and he was in favour of legalizing the issue of debenture stock at such a rate of interest as would float it, taking care that it should be registered, and that the public should know what the company already owed. He believed, with his hon. Friend, that our legislation had been very mischievous. We began by looking upon joint-stock companies and railway companies as things to be put down. As a schoolmaster sometimes regards his pupils whom he ought to foster, so we regarded such companies as our natural enemies, and instead of confining ourselves to watching jealously their compulsory powers over other people's prosperity, and leaving their finance to take care of itself, we hemmed them in with restrictions, which they had generally found some way to evade, and thus while professing to protect the creditor, we had simply lulled him into false security, from which, sooner or later, he was sure to awake—like people who are frightened during sleep—in an unreasoning panic. Hence the judgment of Lord Cairns, which simply stated what people who had thought about the matter knew before, and which did not practically make the situation or remedies of debenture-holders one iota worse, was called the immediate cause of the panic—just as the failure of Overend, Gurney, and Co. immediately preceded and possibly precipitated the panic of last year; but it was a case of post hoc, ergo propter hoc, and the real cause was general distrust of the finance of railways. People began to hear of over issues, open debts, Lloyd's bonds, fictitious payments; and a general alarm was the consequence. His hon. Friend said this had attained such magnitude that no smaller remedy than Government interference would have any avail—just as in the panic of last year it was said that the only panacea for the panic was a Government bank. His hon. Friend proposed that the Government should guarantee the principal and interest of the debenture-debt, and that they should take the railways and place a Government Director upon the Boards.

MR. CRAWFORD: I said that the Government should exercise a veto, not that there should be a Government Director upon the Board.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE understood the hon. Member to allude to the practice with respect to Indian railways, where a Government Director was placed upon the Board. He said that by his plan they would prevent a speculative increase of capital; the transaction would be quite safe and the Government would obtain in the end a property the value of which it was impossible to estimate. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend that it was impossible to estimate the value; but the Government might get a worse bargain than that which appeared on paper. And if there were no net profits how could capital be replaced? But the hon. Gentleman said it was only a guarantee that was required. They had had similar proposals at different times, from several quarters and for various purposes. Some proposed that assistance should be given to sound railways only; but his hon. Friend wished them to assist only those which were in difficulties. The proposal of a guarantee was no doubt a very fascinating one. It was a mere form. They might not be called upon to give anything. It was only to satisfy the public, and there was no sort of difficulty or insecurity. He remembered the year before last being persuaded to give his guarantee—and, if he was not mistaken, his hon. Friend was also persuaded to give his—to an International Exhibition which was quite certain to have a very considerable surplus; but somehow or other in the end they found that the guarantee was not a mere matter of form. This proposal must to a certain extent tend to centralization. Now, if ever centralization was inexpedient it was in a country like this where the Executive was so liable to pressure. His hon. Friend talked about the Government veto, and mentioned India as an instance of what he meant. But in India the local interests were much weaker and more divided, and the central Government was almost a despotism. He could not fancy anything more difficult or more invidious than the position of a Government

Director or officer trying to prevent a branch line much desired through a district of considerable Parliamentary influence. All who had acted as trustees knew what pressure was sometimes put upon them to consent to some investment at a higher rate of interest; but where, in his opinion, there was not sufficient security. Any one who wanted to ascertain what the position of such a Government officer would be had only to read the correspondence between Mr. Howell, who was the Government officer in New Zealand, and the Colonial Office, between 1848 and 1849, and they would there see how the Government threw over at last a man who really tried hard to do his duty—or, as they put it, had “an overstrained sense of his own responsibility.” A proposition had been made to the Government that they should buy up all the Irish railways. That was a proposal clear in itself—totus torus atque rotundus. His hon. Friend proposed only that they should guarantee the railways which were in difficulty. The effect of that would be that the Government would be plunged into all sorts of railway disagreements. Supposing they took the London, Chatham, and Dover, the South Western, or the Great Western, the Government must either immediately, or in some short period, which, as his hon. Friend said, was nothing in the life of a State, be committed to partisanship or hostility to the different railways around them. He (Mr. Stephen Cave) must confess he had a most profound distrust of sinking funds. A sinking fund had a tendency from time to time to assist the surplus of an ambitious, or to palliate the deficiency of an unfortunate, Budget. He believed that in this country, as a general rule, the Government ought to do nothing that could be done by individuals. It would be a very dangerous thing for a Government to do what his hon. Friend proposed—to stand between the public in general and railway proprietors. It was not the duty of a Ministry to supply a programme to public companies or to private firms. It was impossible that it could do so; because the interest of the public would always be at direct variance with that of the shareholders. The interest of the Government would be simply to secure its debt, while the interest of the shareholders might be to run some risk for the purpose of getting profit. Government appointments were sometimes found fault with now; but how much would that dissatisfaction be increased if the Government were to turn attention to trade and finance, and obtain a patronage extending all over the country? The Government, resting as ours did upon public opinion, could not in seasons of misfortune stand against the general discontent. When panics prevailed it was a great advantage that public feeling should be able to expend itself against Boards of Directors, who were much less amenable than Members of the Government. If he might venture to make a suggestion, he would say that the best course to be pursued was to set railways free from financial trammels, and put them as to finance on the same footing as joint-stock companies. Perfect freedom and perfect publicity were the maxims that ought to prevail with regard to railway finance. Let railway companies issue debenture stock for any length of time at any rate of interest. If they became embarrassed, and could not come to arrangement among themselves, let them be wound up voluntarily by consent, or compulsorily, under the Bankruptcy laws, by the action of the Court, so as to prevent the ruinous operation of separate suits; and let the insolvent railway be sold either to a joint-stock company, which would take all the duties and be vested with all the powers, either with or without Parliamentary sanction, as might appear safe, or to another railway company which would have to come to Parliament for power to purchase. His hon. Friend said, who would buy a defunct railway? He presumed that would depend upon the price. He remembered in a once popular play, Used Up, some one saying, "We have nothing like St. Peter's in London;" the answer to which was, "If we wanted one, we should get up a company, issue shares, and run one up in no time." So, he believed, there would be no difficulty in getting up a company to buy an insolvent railway at a favourable price—just as had been done more than once in the case of the Great Eastern steamship. This cry for Government interference was no new one. Before last year companies were to do everything; now their prestige was temporarily departed—"none so small to do them reverence." His hon. Friend had drawn a vivid picture of the stoppage of a railway for a single day. He (Mr. Cave) was not much afraid of the stoppage of a great public highway from any cause except that of a strike. If the London, Chatham, and Dover could go on performing its services so admirably, there was little to fear. He did not hear complaints of the state of the permanent way over England from the Inspectors. Perhaps they might, as had been proposed, guard against any seizure of the working appliances of a railway; but, after what had been said elsewhere, they must all be alive to the danger of destroying the credit of a company for its daily expenses by imposing too much difficulty on the recovery of open debts. He thought that the general and increasing dependence of railways upon each other was the great protection against any one being brought to a standstill. He had ventured to make these remarks in the most friendly and respectful spirit upon the proposal of his hon. Friend. He admitted his great experience, and should be followed no doubt by others whose opinions were entitled to far greater weight than his own. Many plans had been proposed to get rid of these difficulties. The air, in fact, teemed with plans. That morning he had received several proposals from men of known ability and experience. One of these, which had the merit of not asking anything from the Government, was for the formation of finance companies to deal in debentures, increasing their security by the guarantee of capital of the finance company, and making them in various ways more readily negotiable. Another was for the Government to place the companies in immediate funds, by paying down at once the estimated cost of carriage of letters and troops in perpetuity. Another was satisfied with simply extending the lien of a debenture to the chattels of the company, and to the profits as well as the tolls. Another advocated the suspension of all suits, reference of all questions to one tribunal, and the raising of a preferential stock taking priority before debentures, for the purpose of clearing away incumbrances and completing works. The House would pass its time profitably and gain much by discussing such schemes in company with that of his hon. Friend. He would ask leave to conclude with one remark. Most people were feeling their way gradually, hardly appreciating the difficulties before they set themselves to grapple with them. Public opinion was forming itself, changing and ripening from day to day. This discussion would assist it. They were now waiting anxiously for the Report of the Royal Commission. He asked the House not to act, in order, as it might fancy, to gain time, with a precipitancy of which they might hereafter repent. They should not be tempted by the natural and laudable desire of terminating present inconvenience, however pressing, of alarm, however widespread and injurious, into hasty resolutions or inconsiderate fragmentary legislation on a matter of such importance.

Mr. THOMSON HANKEY said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Crawford) had not overstated the case when he spoke of this question as one of very great magnitude. The proposal submitted appeared of so startling a character that he could hardly imagine it receiving the sanction of the House. A few days ago there was a proposal for guaranteeing £3,000,000 for Canadian railways, and they were assured that there would be no possible risk, danger, or chance of their having to pay anything. The statement that was made gave every hope that that might be done without this country incurring any liability. But the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) pointed out that they must consider it as a loan of £3,000,000, and that it would diminish to that extent the facilities of this country for borrowing money. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Crawford) was that they should lend £95,000,000 or guarantee to that amount. That was a very startling proposal in order to relieve certain interests from an embarrassment which he believed to be of an entirely temporary character. He believed that if the Government were to interfere they would only aggravate the difficulties of the railways. He had no confidence in the Government management of any such enterprise. The hon. Gentleman, of course, did not propose a Government management; but he admitted that the companies would have to be under Governmental protection in such a case, and proposed that a Government Director or inspector should be appointed. What, then, would be done in the case of the disputes and altercations which were of daily occurrence between railways? The hon. Gentleman said it was impossible for a railway to be sold, but they were bought and sold every day. The amalgamations and changes of railway property which were constantly coming before Parliamentary Committees were neither more nor less than sales by one party and purchases by the other. There would always be found parties willing to buy railways, if facilities were given for selling them. The great difficulty which attached to all these questions was owing to the mistake in our Acts of Parliament, of giving facilities for borrowing. Those facilities were given originally for temporary purposes, it being intended that when a railway became established it should pay off its debts, and the railway supply its own capital. Railway companies were never intended to be made permanent borrowers and competitors in the money-market. One-third, or at least one-quarter of the railway work in the country was executed upon borrowed capital, and it was impossible for the companies to pay off their debt in the limited period of three, four, or five years. If the railway companies had no debt at the present moment Parliament would not be called on to interfere in the matter. He thought the difficulty might be got over by Parliament being more careful in granting of borrowing powers in the future, and with regard to the past, what must be done was that the railway creditors must become railway debtors. The debt must be amalgamated into the railway company—it must become part of the railway stock. It would be impossible if the Government became guarantors for railway companies, for them to borrow the money which they might afterwards require for the purposes of the State. Government stock would be depreciated as a matter of course, for if people could buy railway stock, guaranteed by the Government at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, they would naturally prefer that to the ordinary Government stock at 3 per cent which would go down as in France to 75 instead of being at 90.

Mr. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, the House was indebted to the hon. Member for London for bringing the question forward. The question could not be snuffed out as the hon. Member (Mr. T. Hankey) seemed to imagine. He (Mr. Alderman Salomons) was not a railway man, and was not a large holder of railway stock, and therefore he might be fairly supposed to take a thoroughly dispassionate view of the subject. Whatever the railway Boards had done, and into whatever difficulties they had got themselves, it should be borne in mind that in all cases where they had not exceeded their powers they had Parliamentary sanction for all their operations. The railways of this country involved as large an outlay as from £450,000,000 to £500,000,000, and therefore he thought the House could not be engaged in a more important duty than that of considering, when they found that great interest in a distressed condition, by what means it could be relieved from its difficulty. The Vice President of the Board of Trade had quoted the example of the Great Eastern steam ship, which had been sold two or three times over. But the Great Eastern ship was not the creation of Parliament like the Great Eastern Railway. All the railways had been the creation of Parliament. It had been suggested that insolvent railways only should be dealt with and assisted by Parliament; but for his part, he would not touch the insolvent railways at all. They could give no security to anyone, and the only course in their case was to sell them. Even in the case of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, extensive as it was, it would not be difficult to find a purchaser at a high value, if it were put up for sale in the railway market. The House would be surprised if he mentioned the number of millions it was said it would fetch in the railway market. If in good hands, it might be relieved from many of the extraordinary difficulties which now affected that company. If it were necessary to legislate for railways, it would be desirable to see whether something might not be done by which the interests of railways might be made compatible with the interests of the State. It might be possible by some system of guarantees, or by raising money for solvent railways, taking them as security upon the condition that Parliament should lease them for ninety-nine years, similar to what is done in France, holding them as security until the debt should be paid off.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, railway companies had got into difficulties through mismanagement and providence, and he suggested that they should take a lesson from the course pursued by such companies in the United States. There were 40,000 miles of railway there—nearly three times the length of the railway system of this country—and of course there had been from time to time great difficulties among the railway companies; but they had surmounted those difficulties, not by applying to the Government, but by depending on themselves. Our railway companies had very imprudently borrowed money on debenture bonds at short dates, and so long as there was an abundant money-market there was no difficulty in renewing those bonds, but when money became scarce they had to give any price to renew them. These bonds ought all to be converted into debenture 4 per cent stock; and instead of paying dividends in money every year, they might apply the sums which should be payable on dividends to the purchase of railway debenture bonds, and pay this railway debenture stock, instead of cash dividends, to their shareholders. They would then, in fact, be borrowing money of their own shareholders. That was the course adopted in the United States. If a railway company found they wanted money to develop the traffic of their railway, or to pay off their bonds, they applied the traffic receipts to the payments required. Instead of borrowing fresh capital at a great disadvantage they borrowed money from their own shareholders, and paid dividends in stock instead of cash. It was said that the amount of debenture stock was about £100,000,000, of this, £90,000,000 was a perfectly good security, because it held the first claim on the traffic receipts, after the payment of expenses. There was scarcely a railway in the kingdom which had not a large surplus after the payment of these, so that there could hardly be a better security. If a man were paid in debenture stock and wanted cash he could easily raise it, because debenture bonds would pass in the market, and he could get cash at a small sacrifice, while the advantage gained by his railway would more than compensate for any loss. There would not indeed be a loss, as this stock, if its value were properly understood, would be as good as consols. What could be a better investment for trustees or ladies than a stock of this kind? The railway interests, therefore, need not implore the Government for assistance; let them help themselves. The course pursued in the United States met all requirements.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that the payment of dividends in debenture bonds was about equal to not paying them at all. It seemed like paying a debt by a promise to pay. He knew many persons who were much inconvenienced by the non-payment of their dividends, and they would not be much consoled by the suggestion that they should accept a debenture, whether it could be converted into money or not. A great deal of the difficulty that had arisen in connection with these debenture bonds had been long foreseen. He thought nothing else could have been expected from the way in which Railway Bills had been passed in that House, and for which Parliament was, to a great extent, responsible. Parliament did lay down some rules by which Committees were directed to inspect the financial condition of these undertakings. This was difficult; but he thought there were means of ascertaining whether companies applying for powers had the means of carrying out their undertakings. He believed there was a sort of instinctive apprehension where it might be known that the parties applying to Parliament for Bills had the right amount of capital for carrying them out. There had been a flood of enterprise at one time, followed by stagnation at another; there had been too much confidence at one time, and too much distrust at another. The Duke of Wellington, with his usual sagacity, stated the real case when he said that all railways were, in their real nature, monopolies. They should therefore have been recognised as such, and the best possible bargain made with them. However bad monopoly might be, a ruined monopoly was the worst of all. He thought it would be well that they should come to a definite conclusion by which the embarrassment should be lessened. If Members were not willing to adopt the remedy of the hon. Member (Mr. Crawford), then he thought they had better say what remedy should be applied, or come to the conclusion that nothing should be done to meet the requirements of the railway interest.

MR. LAING said, he wished to point out to the House what was the real and most important issue raised by the hon. Member (Mr. Crawford). The hon. Member had taken too narrow a view of the subject in looking at it as one simply relating to the existing state of railway embarrassment. If the position of railways in this country had been like that of the lines in the United States—if an uniform and consistent system of absolute free trade had been adopted, and if, afterwards, the railways had fallen into embarrassment, he would then have entirely concurred with the Vice President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Stephen Cave), that all that could be done was to remove all legal restrictions, and leave them to work themselves out of the difficulty as well as they could. In dealing with the proposal of the hon. Member, the House might, at the present stage, set aside all question of details. If the House could see its way to the principle involved in the proposal the working of details might be easily adjusted. The idea of Government interfering to give a guarantee did not, he thought, involve Government interference in the working of railways. No loss on a guarantee was likely to occur, as the debenture capital had been limited to one-fourth, with the exception of a few railways in a state of hopeless insolvency. Except in such instances he thought there was an ample margin of security in all cases. It might be assumed, then, at present that no practical risk of loss would be incurred on the guarantee. Another assumption which he would make was that assistance of the kind mentioned would be a very great and essential relief to the railway companies, and be the means of enabling them to convert the short-dated debentures into perpetual or long annuities. He then came to the question as to how this proposal was to be considered as a broad one of principle, and with respect to that he must say that weighty arguments had been adduced on both sides. On the one hand, there was no denying that if the House were prepared to guarantee railway debenture stock it must be prepared to do it largely, and must look the £120,000,000 of capital in the face. It was not exactly like going into the market for a loan of consols to that amount; but, no doubt, by such a proceeding the Government securities in the market would be greatly increased. The supply would be beyond the demand, so that the prices of Government securities would fall, and in time of peace the great national reserve for a time of war or any other emergency would be used up. He thought the question not ripe for practical decision, but it was desirable that the arguments pro and con should be fairly put before the House and the public. On the one hand, weighty and solid advantages might result from the suggested measure. There existed a mass of railway property, amounting to nearly half the amount of the National Debt, which was in a position of great distress and difficulty, that distress and that difficulty having been occasioned to a great extent by the action of Parliament. The question then arose whether by a measure which would not cost the country anything—the proposed guarantee being covered by the railway receipts—Parliament could restore that large amount of property to a condition of comparative prosperity. It was impossible to deny that the distressed condition of the railway companies was owing to the inconsistent policy pursued by Parliament. If this country had gone on the United States plan of total free trade in railways, the railway system might have been much less costly. If they had adopted the French system, or that sketched out by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) many years ago, things might have been in a very different position. We should have had large companies in several districts whose interests were identified with that of the public, either by terminal concessions or enforcing a reduction of fares. But, by halting between the two systems, we had arrived at a state of things which placed us at a disadvantage with foreign countries as regarded railways, our cost of railway transport being on an average something like three times as much as that in Belgium. Looking at the extent to which trade and commerce was identified with railway travelling, and the conveyance of raw material and manufactures, it was a great drawback as regarded the future of this country. Then, again, while France at the end of a limited term of years would come into possession practically of a sinking fund, equal to half its National Debt, we had nothing of that kind in this country. Last year there was much discussion about the reduction of the National Debt. If anything on a large scale was to be done, this was, perhaps, the only opportunity of doing it. By giving a guarantee which cost nothing, we should bring into operation a sinking fund equal to the whole capital invested in railways, say £400,000,000. This in ninety years would become the property of the State, and so available as a set-off to the National Debt—and eventually our railway fares might be reduced to the Continental standard. Such seemed to be the balance of the weighty arguments on both sides. On the one hand we had the disadvantage, practically, of increasing the amount of the National Debt in time of peace. On the other the advantage resulting from providing a sinking fund of magnitude for the redemption of the National Debt, while at the end of a period of years the control of the Government would enable them to reduce the scale of fares of railways to a level with those of the Continent. He did not think as yet they were ripe for balancing these comparative advantages and arriving at any positive conclusion on the subject. It was one of those subjects on which they could hardly expect the Government to take the lead till public opinion ripened into definite conclusions. He thought this discussion, however, very useful as a means of calling attention to it, and in the meantime railway property could afford to wait the solution of the question. He was therefore very glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stephen Cave) an indication of his opinion as to the more immediate remedies necessary to meet the exigencies of the position. He did look forward to the time when they would relieve railways from all those absurd restrictions by which they were bound, when they would allow them to issue debenture capital to any amount and at any price the public chose to take it. That would be an immediate and practical measure; but he felt greatly indebted to the hon. Member for having raised the discussion of the far larger question of principle involved in the case.

MR. WATKIN said, that in dealing with the general question, they ought not to forget the legislation of 1844. The idea of the mode by which the country might become the owners of these train roads was not therefore formed to-night. It had been in the minds of statesmen since 1844. At that time a Committee was appointed at the instance of Sir Robert Peel, which devoted a great deal of time to the consideration of the question, and the minority were in favour of altering the constitution of railway companies to this extent that, instead of being freeholders, the railways should after a certain period become the property of the State. At this particular moment the State might make conditions which in the time of their prosperity railways would have refused. If he were a financier charged with any department, he should consider whether an opportunity was not now offered to effect a good, permanent and useful transaction for the country. Were they to do anything for the reduction or final extinction of the National Debt? It might be thought by some that it was better to have the steadying weight of £800,000,000 around our necks. But all must admit that both the credit and interests of the country were bound up in the reduction of the National Debt. How, then, were they to reduce it? Not by taxing industry. Was it, then, to be reduced by cash payments or by applying the credit of the country to the operation? A great financier would endeavour to use credit rather than a hard, dry payment of cash. Was there any other operation available but one analogous to that proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Crawford) to bring about that admittedly desirable result? It seemed to be a matter on which there was very little difference of opinion—after all it came to a question of terms. In France they would have the means in fifty-seven years of paying off the whole of their National Debt. If we did not initiate some measure of policy with regard to our Debt, we should still have £800,000,000 around our necks. An opportunity now existed of taking advantage of the necessities of railway companies to lay down some scheme by which that great property would become the property of the State in a limited number of years. This was not purely a question of finance. Thirty-five years ago railway property in this country would have been covered by £1,000,000; it was now £450,000,000. What, if it increased in the same ratio, would it be twenty-five years hence? It would be the most powerful industrial and the most powerful single political element in the whole country. Were they, then, indifferent to the consequences of committing such an enormous political power into the hands of railway companies as they were now gradually and silently, but certainly, accumulating? This was, in his opinion, a favourable opportunity for a great financial scheme. There were precedents for its success. This was the only way in which the National Debt could be dealt with, and there was great danger in allowing these great political corporations to grow up uncontrolled.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Crawford) is one of such great importance, that whilst we are obliged to him for having called the attention of the House to it, I would appeal to him whether it is desirable that he should ask the House to come to a vote on a question of such magnitude, which is hardly ripe for decision. What strikes me in the discussion is this—that there are two considerations, one of which throws doubt on the other. On the one hand, it is said that the position of a certain number of railway companies is such that it is difficult for them to raise the money they require to meet their debentures—that to a certain extent the embarrassments of these companies is due to the action of Parliament and to legislation—and therefore that they have certain claims on Parliament and on the Executive for some assistance. On the other hand, we are told now that we have an excellent opportunity of effecting large transactions for the reduction of the National Debt. When we have two such arguments as these two such fine birds to be killed by one stone, it is necessary that we should consider carefully the ground for such arguments, that appear too good to be compatible one with the other. What is the case as it lies upon the claim of the railway companies? The railway companies say, "We are in a position in which we cannot raise the money we want, and therefore we come to you to help us to raise the money." Now, why were they not in a position to raise it for themselves? They say that they cannot raise at less than 4 or 5 per cent the money that they think the Government can raise at 3 or 3½ per cent. Is it because the security of the railways is not good enough to induce people to invest their money, or because there are some legal difficulties or artificial impediments to their obtaining the money that people would be glad to lend? If it is meant that there are artificial impediments in the way, then the question arises whether we cannot clear them away. But if the security is not good enough to induce the public to lend the money, then what you are asking the Government to do is to take upon themselves a certain amount of risk for the sake of the railway companies. I do not say that, under certain circumstances, the Government should not take upon themselves some risk for the sake of the railway companies. But then, you set aside the other part of the argument, that it involves no risk to the Government to secure such a large privilege as would enable us even to pay off the National Debt. I confess that the second argument makes me look with very great suspicion upon this proposal, and it appears to me a very sufficient reason not for setting aside the proposal, but for asking in detail for the data upon which the proposal is made. We think that hon. Gentlemen ought to tell us whether they are of opinion that the railway companies, whose debts we are to assume, have or have not sufficient security. If they have, I want to know what is the inducement that the railway companies should give 1 per cent to the Government to finance their railways for them; give 1 per cent more than the Government could borrow the money for. Some definite statement should be made upon these points before the House is asked to deal with the question. Under present circumstances, it would be unfortunate if the House were compelled to pass a hasty vote, either in favour of or against the proposal. I therefore hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am very much inclined to join my voice to that of my right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) in expressing the hope that the hon. Member for the City will not ask the judgment of the House upon the Resolution which he has proposed. It is quite plain that whatever the opinions many of us entertain, or whatever the leaning of our minds, this is certainly one of the most vast and intricate subjects that was ever introduced into the House of Commons. If the assumptions of the railway companies be correct, or the protest against all interference be just and sound, yet neither party ought to desire, in the present immature and crude state of our information and views, that the House should be committed to any judgment. I can quite appreciate the anxiety of my hon. Friend (Mr. Crawford), connected as he is with the money-market and all the transactions in the City, to avail himself of this particular moment for effecting what he feels to be a great public object. I quite grant that there are specialities at the present moment which, if we were in a condition to entertain the question, would make it desirable that at this very moment we should come to a decision in the affirmative or negative. But in matters of this kind we have not always an unembarrassed choice, and certainly at this time it would be premature to give a decision upon a question of so vast a range, which so deeply affects the public interest, and reaches so far into futurity. I think, after the very intelligent statement of my hon. Friend (Mr. Laing), and with the example of France before our eyes, it is difficult to deny that there is considerable weight, and also that there is great attraction, in the views which have been pointed out as to this proposal being calculated to relieve the railway companies of their difficulties without any great increase of the public burdens of this country. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that by causing a very great extension of the aggregate amount of public securities in the market, without any means of procuring an extension of the number of those who are bidders and buyers of those securities, you would have to account for a fall in those securities. I am far from inclined to think that it would go so far as to affect seriously our credit. I believe that its action would be restrained within much narrower limits. I would venture to say that the amount of that action would be very much restrained, or extended and enhanced by the general policy of Parliament in dealing with the ordinary amount of balance and expenditure from year to year. Many Members take a special interest in the application of this question in the sister country, and it appears to me there are many considerations that must recommend a separate inquiry and a separate dealing with Irish railways. The total amount of railway property in Ireland is much more limited. Therefore the inconvenient consequences that are apprehended must be very much restrained, and it is possible that an experiment in Ireland might tend to prove the possibility or the impossibility of any such experiment in England. There are some difficulties connected with the matter which could only be disposed of after a most careful and minute examination. As to Government management and centralization, it appears to me that these are topics which might be easily disposed of. Government management ought not to be under any circumstances entertained; and as to centralization, this is a matter to be disposed of from time to time as the leases of the lines fall in and shall be renewed. As far as we can see at present, there would be great difficulties in the practical working connected with new works for which the demand is so instant and various in form. It appears to me that we are not in a condition to arrive at a decision at the present moment, and therefore the best practical course is to wait and see what encouragement or discouragement we shall receive from the labours of a body of very competent persons, who have undertaken an investigation into railways under a Royal Commission appointed some two years ago. The publication of the Report of that Commission cannot fail to be an epoch and a stage in the discussion of the question, and I trust that my hon. Friend will be contented to wait till the Report of that Commission is printed, to consider what is the nature of the step which he should take. I trust that for the present he will be content with the acknowledgment, that is universal, of the public service which he has performed in drawing attention to a subject of such great magnitude.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he was sure the House would be of opinion that the last two hours had not been thrown away. He should, for his own part, be willing to take the advice given him by Gentlemen on both sides, not to ask the House to express an opinion upon the Motion. He was not without a hope that the discussion which had taken place would be of great use in the House, as well as outside of it, and in that hope he was willing to withdraw his Resolution.

MASTER AND SERVANT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD ELCHO moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law of Master and Servant. He said, that a few weeks ago he had asked his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) to take up the subject and bring in a Bill, thinking that the subject was of too great importance to be intrusted to the care of a private Member. But as his right hon. Friend's arrangements rendered it impossible for him to attempt legislation during the present Session, and as there was a strong impression that some should take place without unnecessary delay, he hoped the House would grant him leave to introduce the Bill. A Select Committee had sat last year upon that question, and, after going very fully into all its bearings, came to the conclusion that the present state of the law was objectionable and ought to be amended. As the law now stood a breach of contract, which ought to be viewed and which the Committee viewed as a civil offence, was treated criminally. That was the great grievance of which the employed class complained. The measure which he sought permission to introduce was mainly found on the principle laid down in the Report of the Committee—namely, that the breach of contract should be dealt with in future civilly and not criminally—that a servant should no longer be liable for a simple breach of contract to be seized, handcuffed, put in prison, and even subjected to hard labour. It was therefore proposed by the Bill that there should be equality between the employed and their employers—that breaches of contract, as a rule, should be treated as civil offences; but that there should be a distinction between two different classes of breaches of contract, that in ordinary cases they should be dealt with civilly, but that where there was any aggravation attending them, such as wilful injury to person or property, a criminal character should attach to them, and the persons committing them should be liable to imprisonment. It was proposed that ordinary breaches of contract should be tried before two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate in England, and before the Sheriff in Scotland; but that aggravated cases, where there had been wilful injury to persons or property, should be remitted to the sheriff in Scotland, and to the sessions in England. It was also proposed that in ordinary breaches of contract the parties brought up for trial should be competent witnesses in their own cases; but that they should not give evidence in respect of aggravated or violent breaches of contract. The Bill likewise proposed to do away with arrestment of wages in Scotland. He had been in communication both with men and masters on that subject, and a Bill had been drawn up first by the men, and afterwards submitted to the masters. The present measure, as he had intimated, was mainly based on the Resolutions of the Committee of last year; and both masters and men were agreed in the main on its provisions. He trusted, therefore, that there was a prospect of satisfactory legislation on the question this Session, and all he asked was, that the House might extend to him, as a private Member, that kind consideration and ready help which he was sure it would extend, and without which he could not hope to carry his measure.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law of Master and Servant, ordered to be brought in by Lord Elcho, Mr. GEORGE CLIVE, and Mr. ALGERNON ESKRISTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 105.]

ATTORNEYS, &c., CERTIFICATE DUTY BILL—[BILL 53.]

(Mr. Denman, Mr. Vance, Sir John Ogilvy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DENMAN moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that the question raised had been often before the House, and it had been considered just and expedient to abolish the certificate duty. The tax was first imposed in 1785 to meet the expenses of a war, but it had since been considerably increased in amount. The attorneys and solicitors were members of a learned profession, depending for their incomes on their brains, and their profits were limited by Act of Parliament. They were required to be educated to a high degree, and had to pay a triple or quadruple taxation. They were obliged to pay £80 for stamp duty before entering upon their profession, and £20 when they were admitted. They were also obliged to pay £9 annually if they practised in London, and £6 if in the country. They were besides subject to the same income tax as others. The tax was an exceptional one, attorneys being the only professional men who were so taxed. The present Lord Chief Justice of England, when he was a Member of that House, said it was one of the most unjust and oppressive taxes which existed. Barristers, physicians, and others were not taxed. He would not state more because he believed that hon. Members had had placed in their hands a statement regarding this tax which showed that it ought to be abolished or reduced to a nominal amount. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that he approved the mode of raising taxes by licences; but he (Mr. Denman) believed the country disapproved of it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not always been in office. When in Opposition he had voted against the tax, so had Lord Cairns, the present Lord Chief Baron, the present Lord Chief Justice, and the Lord Chancellor. The tax weighed heavily upon the profession. It was no argument to say that the proposal was made at the wrong time, for the same argument would be used at all times, whether before the Budget or after it. The total amount of the tax in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, was something under £90,000, and it would be hopeless for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to argue that it could not be dispensed with if he had a desire to repeal or reduce it. His hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) opposed the repeal of the tax; but he did so because he would be sorry to lose the attorneys as allies in endeavouring to obtain a reduction of the brewers' tax. If the licences paid by the brewers were unjust let them be abolished. There was nothing in this proposal to prevent the brewers from being relieved next week, if they could show as strong a case; but, at all events, let this tax be repealed if it were just and right to repeal it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Denman.)

MR. M. T. BASS said, that if this licence was to be repealed all the other licences, which yielded £2,500,000, must follow the same fate. This of all others was a tax that should not be repealed, because the attorneys having great interest with the constituencies and the profession of which the hon. and learned Gentleman was so distinguished an ornament had the power of making themselves heard in that House, whilst others, and particularly the brewers, had not. Auctioneers and appraisers paid a much higher tax, and why should they not be relieved as well as attorneys? The brewers' tax was one of the most unjust taxes that was ever imposed, and he regretted it as the nearest approximation to confiscation ever proposed by any Chancellor of the Exchequer, here or elsewhere. It was an additional tax of 1s. 2d. a quarter on malt, and amounted to 3 per cent on the value of the article on which it was levied.

MR. AYRTON moved the adjournment of the debate. He said he did so on the ground that it would be the best answer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby's statement as to the power of attorneys in that House, and also on the ground that it was better to wait and hear the Financial Statement, which would be made on Thursday, before they proceeded further with the Bill. They would then hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there was a surplus, and what he proposed to do with it.

MR. BRADY said, that the tax for the next year had already been paid, and the revenue could not therefore be affected. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would go on with his Motion.

MR. DENMAN said, he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. It was exceedingly difficult for a private Member to advance Bills a stage, and when five weeks ago he fixed the second reading for that night he had no idea the Financial Statement would be made two days afterwards. He trusted his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The proposal of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) is a very reasonable one. The position laid down by the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) is quite erroneous as to the usual habit of the House as to financial questions. When an hon. Member is proposing a remission of taxation he does so after the Financial Statement, because if it is not included in the Financial Statement the hon. Member has, when after that is made, an opportunity of introducing the subject. I do not want to go into the merits of this tax. If the question of licences is brought under our consideration we must go into the whole of that question, which is one of considerable importance. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer is on the eve of making his Financial Statement, I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will do well to comply with the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and if he is not satisfied with the statement I make on Thursday it will then be open to him to make objections to it. The House, I have no doubt, will give him a fair hearing and his case due consideration. I should have proposed that the debate be adjourned for a fortnight had not the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets made this Motion ["In the holidays."] Well, say this day month. I trust the hon. and learned Gentleman will consent to the adjournment.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that this was only an attempt to shelve the Bill by a side-wind.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

SALE AND PURCHASE OF SHARES BILL.

[BILL 38.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Contracts for Sale, &c., of Shares to be void unless the Numbers by which such Shares are distinguished are set forth in Contract).

MR. FILDES moved to leave out all the words after "company" in line 9. He said, the first part of the clause provided that the contract should be null and void unless it was in writing, and he thought that afforded sufficient protection without the criminal consequence provided in the latter part.

MR. LEEMAN said, that to strike out these words would remove the backbone of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in line 9, to leave out from the word "Company" to the end of the Clause.

MR. BARNETT said, there had been an aggregate depreciation of £566,000 on the Stock Exchange with regard to some banks since the 21st of February, when this Bill was introduced, and this he attributed to the distrust which it had produced respecting the carrying on of transactions in future.

Question put, "That the words 'and every person' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 112 ; Noes 15 : Majority 97.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 103.]

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Dodson, Bill for the regulation of Her Majesty's Royal Marine Forces while on shore, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dodson, Mr. CORRY, and Lord HENRY LENNOX.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

FORTIFICATIONS (PROVISION FOR EXPENSES) BILL.

Bill "to amend an Act of the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth years of Her present Majesty, chapter sixty-one, for providing a further sum towards defraying the expenses of constructing Fortifications for the protection of the Royal Arsenal and Dockyards, and the Ports of Dover and Portland ; and of creating a Central Arsenal," presented, and read the first time. #### JOINT STOCK COMPANIES (VOTING PAPERS) BILL—[BILL 3.]

(Mr. Darby Griffith, Mr. Robert Torrens, Mr. Vance.)

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble.

On question that the Preamble be postponed,

MR. SERJEANT GASELER said, he wished to know whether the Government were prepared to allow the passing of that measure. It appeared to him to be one of a very absurd character.

MR. WALPOLE said, he entertained no objection to their proceeding with the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that the Companies' Act provided that proxies should be sent in in proper time before a meeting, whereby an opportunity was given to ascertain the genuineness of the proxies. But as he understood the Bill, it would enable shareholders to use those voting papers without affording the directors an opportunity of knowing that they were to meet with any opposition; and that would, in his opinion, be an unreasonable arrangement.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he wished to know whether the clause would not authorize the use of voting papers without a stamp, as it enabled persons to give voting papers in person, or by proxy. Did not that imply that a voting paper was not a proxy—and would not a voting paper, in consequence, be exempted from the stamp? It was his intention to move the insertion of a clause exempting public companies and associations, in whose Acts or Articles it was provided that there should be no voting by proxy, from the operation of the Bill.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the objection of the hon. Member for Reading did not apply, inasmuch as the case of those voting papers to which he referred was provided for in the last Act that had been passed with regard to stamps. A Bill with similar provisions to the present one had already passed through Committee in the Sessions of 1864 and of 1866, and he was now re-introducing that measure without any alteration. As he had already fully explained on former occasions, the measure was framed for the purpose of obviating the imperfections and inconvenience of the existing law, by which shareholders anxious to record their votes should either appear in person, which would in many cases be wholly impossible, or else should commit their proxies to the hands either of the directors or of their opponents, without having had any opportunity of ascertaining the value of the explanations which might be offered at any particular meeting. Many companies were so large that it was impossible to accommodate the number of shareholders within any reasonable space, while ladies, who sometimes formed fully one-fourth of the shareholders, were practically precluded from personal attendance at their meetings. He did not in the slightest degree seek to prejudice the position of the directors; but his sole object was to give shareholders facilities for voting with greater freedom and security. By the adoption of voting papers, as he proposed, the evils of the existing system would, he hoped, to a great extent be obviated; for while personal attendance at a meeting would be dispensed with, there would be no necessity for handing in those papers, as in the case of proxies, forty-eight hours before the meeting was held. It was the habit of directors of railways to send out with any report, without disclosing the real position of the company, applications for proxies, and he might explain his object by referring to a case that occurred the other day. The directors of the Great Western Railway called a meeting for the 8th of March, and issued a report giving generally a favourable view of the company's affairs. Before that meeting took place, however, it transpired that the railway was in difficulties, and a private meeting was called, at which it was intimated that there was no resource for the payment of dividend except a loan. After some negotiations the directors at last came to the conclusion of laying the whole case frankly before their shareholders. This policy was adopted, and it was proposed that the shareholders should receive certain securities in lieu of their dividend. The directors should have taken this course at first. They should have trusted to the good sense and confidence of their shareholders; and this was what he wished to enable them more effectually to do by means of voting papers. The only objection urged against the proposal was that it would cause delay; but this might in many cases be favourable rather than otherwise. The present mode of voting was too exclusive, and placed temptations in the way of directors to adopt an extravagant policy; and he hoped the House would therefore agree to his proposition, which was designed to remedy the evils now existing.

MR. LAWSON said, he did not think the clause would carry out the object which the hon. Member had in view; and it would, moreover, be calculated to introduce confusion into the management of affairs. At present there were two modes of voting, one in person, and another by proxy. The hon. Member objected to the system of voting by proxy; but the Bill did not at all interfere with that system. It merely gave shareholders permission to vote in a third manner by means of voting papers under a machinery of an extraordinary character. A shareholder might execute a voting paper, and give it to another shareholder to be used at an adjourned meeting, or at a poll, and if a proxy had been previously executed for use at the first meeting, it would be impossible to say which of the two documents ought to prevail. The voting paper, besides, might be produced without sufficient time being allowed for its proper examination. He submitted that the clause ought not to be passed.

MR. VANCE said, the clause was intended to remedy a great inconvenience at present existing. As matters at present stood, directors were almost invariably successful in carrying out their views, owing to their superior organization, resulting from the facilities which the law gave them, and all that was sought by the Bill of his hon. Friend was to enable shareholders to act independently of the directors, or of one or two proprietors who might have organized an opposition to their policy. It was objected that there would be some difficulty in identifying the voting papers; but this difficulty, in his opinion, would not be greater than in the case of University voting papers. He saw no difficulty in using the voting papers at an adjourned meeting, and he was persuaded that if such a system were adopted the extravagant schemes of directors would be checked and many misfortunes obviated.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that however good the objects of the Bill might be, they were not carried out by its provisions. The only effect of the clause would be to throw the present state of the law as to proxies, which was now clear, into hopeless confusion; for it would enable any factious shareholder in a company to subject the whole body of his fellow shareholders to a great expense, and to postpone for a week a dividend about which there was no substantial difference of opinion.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, it was rather late in the day to object to the principle of voting papers, since it had last year received the approval of the President of the Board of Trade, and as they all knew the last Oxford University Election had been decided by the use of voting papers.

Mr. Lawson

MR. WALPOLE said, he did not think that the clause would be of any great practical good or of any great practical harm; but, if the House should think fit to pass it, he would suggest that the words "or at the poll," should be omitted, or otherwise great inconvenience would be occasioned by the poll being necessarily delayed for the purpose of examining and testing the validity of the voting papers. Those words were struck out upon the Report last year, and it was as so amended that the Bill received the sanction of the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he thought the Bill was a very clumsy one, and that the hon. Member for Devizes must be connected with a very small company or he would not have drawn up such a measure. He would recommend the hon. Gentleman boldly to raise the question of the abolition of the forty-eight hours notice, which was required with regard to proxies. He could not see why a period of forty-eight hours should not be allowed for the examination of the voting papers before they were used. He thought that the wisest course for the hon. Member for Devizes to pursue was to withdraw his Bill.

MR. LEEMAN said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Serjeant, as the abolition of the forty-eight hours notice would occasion the greatest possible inconvenience. He was vice-chairman of a company (the North Eastern Railway Company) connected with which there were 17,000 shareholders, and if this clause respecting voting papers were passed, and those papers could be sent in up to the very time of the holding of the meeting, it would be perfectly impossible to get through their business for several days.

MR. LAWSON said, that it was most objectionable that the House should be called upon to give its sanction to legislation on the ground that it could do no harm if it effected no good.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH declined to make the suggested alteration in the clause.

Clause 2 (Penalty against Fraud).

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, this clause would, after the decision of the Committee on the first, be nugatory, and moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. AYRTON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he wished to explain to the House the position which this question had assumed. At the commencement of this Session he had introduced a Bill for the specific appropriation of certain funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the relief of the excessive spiritual destitution existing in the metropolis. He was met on that occasion with the objection that he was proposing to break into the common fund of the Commissioners, that he was legislating for a comparatively small part of the community. He had now thrown the interests of his constituents into those of the country at large, and in accordance with the suggestion of the former opponents of his Bill, the present Bill proposed that the common fund in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be applied, so far as it was available, in the first place to relieve the greatest cases of spiritual destitution in England and Wales, and that this should be accomplished before minor cases were relieved. This common fund was constituted out of the surplus of the episcopal and caputular endowments of the Church in England and Wales, after providing for the necessities of the Bishops, clerical dignitaries, and cathedrals; and its increase arose from a variety of causes—from the increased value of land of an agricultural character, from the opening of mines, under properties, belonging to the Church; and the third great source was the erection of houses and buildings on land originally belonging to ecclesiastical bodies. The circumstances attending the increase of value under each of these heads were entirely different, and demanded separate and distinct consideration. The increase of value of land might be considered as what he might term natural increase, arising from the improvements in agriculture, or similar causes. Again, in some cases the increased value arose from the gathering of a considerable population in a particular spot, which, of course, had to be provided with houses, and this, therefore, led to an increase in the value of land. This enhancement in value arose from the fact that a capital of perhaps £20,000 or £40,000 had been brought upon the land and spent in houses, and the increased revenue was occasioned by the rent derived from these. It was clear that these causes of increase were separate and distinct. This was peculiarly the case with reference to ecclesiastical property in the metropolis, and so great was the increase of revenue, that after meeting the claims of the Bishop and the dignified clergy, there was a surplus in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners arising from property in the metropolis of £55,000 a year, now placed in the hands of the common fund. These revenues were about to receive a very large increase. The amount had been calculated at £48,000 a year; that sum was now being received by the corporation of London, and would be up to the end of the year. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners already received one-fifth of the whole, and the total revenue of the Finsbury prebendal estate at the present time might be reckoned as £50,000 a year, or a little more. He believed there had been some error in stating the value of the property. He believed that a considerable part of it had been underlet, and that the revenue of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would ultimately become possessed in respect of this property was £70,000; so that the Commissioners would have in their hands £125,000 surplus derived entirely from the increase of population and the erection of buildings within the limits of the metropolis. At present the actual sum which the Ecclesiastical Commission were spending in the augmentation of livings throughout the country amounted to £201,000 a year, of which only £25,000 a year was spent upon the metropolis. The Commissioners, in administering the common fund, had imposed on them by Parliament special duties, and had been required to make special appropriations. The first of these related to property derived from tithes, because it was thought that where property was derived from this source, the Commissioners were bound to make a return to the parish from which they were derived, and that there were special claims on the part of the districts in which the property was situate; therefore, Parliament had directed a special appropriation in such places before the money was paid over. Then they were called upon to consider the state of populations gathered in mining districts, and it was required that special appropriations should be made to populations employed in such avocations. But the Commissioners had never been called upon to deal with the special case which he had introduced to the consideration of the House. The Commissioners had of their own accord, under their general powers, made a scheme for the appropriation of their common fund, and the effect of that scheme would be that in every parish where there might be a population of 5,000 persons and upwards there was to be the appropriation of such an amount as would secure to the incumbent £300 a year. That would be a very just scheme if the population in each of the large parishes were only 5,000 persons; but, unfortunately, it was impossible to divide the most populous parishes into districts of 5,000 persons, and the consequence would be that parishes of 25,000 inhabitants would receive no more consideration at the hands of the Commissioners than they gave to parishes of only 5,000. Parishes of 20,000 inhabitants would only receive £300, and, having thus disposed of these large parishes, the Commissioners would proceed to make endowments in parishes where there was a population of 4,500 or 4,000 and under. He could not help thinking such a scheme rigidly unjust, because cases of greatest destitution—such as those of a large parish with a single clergyman—would not be met. These cases the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had passed by, and in referring to these cases he would remind the House that there was a great difference between providing for the spiritual destitution of large parishes and the question of providing an increased income for the clergyman; the latter was a case of parson's destitution. The one was a religious question, affecting a population it might be of 15,000, the other was a matter affecting the comforts of the parson of the parish. To meet this state of things he called upon the Legislature to intervene and declare that it should be the duty of the Commissioners to provide adequately for the spiritual destitution of the population in large parishes before they applied these public funds to the personal destitution of the clergymen in small parishes, if that could be called personal destitution which had to subsist on an income of less than £300 a year. The only answer he had heard to his complaint was that if a change in the application of the funds were determined upon the Commissioners would have to disappoint certain hopes which some people had been led to build up for themselves. He would answer this allegation by quoting the fact that a Committee of the House of Lords had inquired into this matter, upon which nearly all the Archbishops and Bishops sat, and they came to the conclusion that the time for dealing with this question would be when the Finsbury Estate fell into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He therefore altogether denied the right of the Commissioners to set up any expectations of that kind against so solemn an act as that which had been practically accepted as a proposal by that and the other House of Parliament. He denied the right of the Commissioners to anticipate their revenues; they had a right to make appropriations from year to year, but they were not entitled to say that Parliament was bound because the Commissioners had come to an arrangement by which their income was anticipated. One or two cases would illustrate these remarks. According to their own return, the parish of Bermondsey, with a population of 23,000, had got from the Commissioners £74 a year; Southwark, with 17,000, had received £183 a year; Walworth, with 32,000, had got £105 a year. If the income of the chief clergyman of a parish of 5,000 inhabitants ought to be £300 a year, surely some larger provision ought to be made in the case of a parish of 20,000 or 30,000 inhabitants. What he desired was that a general principle should be laid down for the guidance of the Commissioners. He did not ask the House to legislate in detail, for it was the duty of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to examine into all the circumstances relative to these matters. He asked the House to require that the Commissioners should make adequate provision for the destitution in large parishes, and that they should not proceed to distribute all their funds among parishes which were small in proportion to some of those which were overlooked, and he desired that the case of these large parishes should be considered before the claims of parishes in the hands of private patrons were decided upon. It would be a great misfortune if the present opportunity for meeting so crying an evil were suffered to pass. He hoped that, after these explanations, the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, and if any suggestions could be offered, he should be ready to give them consideration.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. HOWES said, he had given notice of his Amendment with great reluctance, for no one could for a moment deny the spiritual destitution which existed in large populous towns, and everybody would desire to see the evil diminished as far as possible. He regretted that the hon. and learned gentleman, after directing his attention to this subject, did not confer at once with some member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and put himself in the way of learning the facts of the case, of discovering the purposes and course of action of the Commission, and then of seeing whether any remedial measure might be introduced. But, instead of this, the hon. Gentleman brought in a Bill which in its effect was hostile to the action of the Commissioners. If this Bill were to pass in anything like its present shape, the discretion of the Commission, in the application of their funds, would be very much interfered with for many years to come. What was the object of this Bill? Its object was to compel the Commissioners to appropriate a portion of their revenue to other purposes than those to which they had designed to apply them. The compulsory nature of the Bill was evident, and formed a very remarkable feature. The Commissioners had adopted certain modes of providing for cases of spiritual destitution, and had in the first place directed their attention to raising the incomes of the clergy in districts containing a population of 5,000, or thereabouts; but if this measure were to pass, the consequence would be that the claims of certain large populations, where much spiritual destitution existed, would have to be deferred. He wished to refer for a moment to the position of the Ecclesiastical Commission. The evil was the inadequacy of the funds, but as the funds increased these cases of destitution would be met as far as possible. The principle which the Commissioners had adopted was to re-distribute the surplus revenue of the Church in the way of permanent endowment with a view to reducing the great amount of spiritual destitution that existed. The Commissioners had prosecuted their work so successfully that they had now got down to populations of 5,000 and 4,500. But he begged it might not be understood that the Commissioners had confined themselves to the permanent endowment of benefices with that population. They had subdivided parishes to a very large extent, and though there might exist parishes containing populations of 17,000 or even 30,000 which had not yet been dealt with, yet a great number of populous parishes had been subdivided, and they had gone on in this direction as far as their resources would allow. A clause had been inserted having reference to the mode in which the Commissioners should deal with the mining population, the object of introducing that clause being to simplify the action of the Commission. If necessary, the spirit of that clause might be extended, and it might be placed within the discretion of the Commission to afford assistance out of their funds in particular cases of spiritual destitution. There was a great misconception throughout the country with regard to the amount of funds at the disposal of the Commissioners. It was said there was a surplus income of several hundred thousand pounds at the command of the Commissioners. But the surplus funds, including the income from the Finsbury Prebend, were pledged by the system adopted since 1864 up to 1868. On that calculation the present scheme had been framed. The action of the Commissioners had been very cautious, but to a considerable extent they had anticipated the reversionary income of the Church. They had to a certain extent anticipated their returns, but not to any material degree, and he believed the result would be that not more than £12,000 a year clear surplus would be left at the end of 1868. But this surplus, if certain propositions were carried out, would be further reduced to £3,500. It must also be recollected that the Commissioners had already been compelled to reject offers of private benevolences to the amount of £100,000, for want of funds, and that they were unable to carry out many most desirable objects for the same reason. Parliament had expressed a desire that local claims should be first met in the cases of parishes with a population of 5,000 and upwards, and the Commissioners had therefore proceeded to meet public benefactions by a corresponding grant, and to this purpose a sum of £300,000 had been apportioned. He was sure it was the wish of every Member of the House that such benefactions should be met; but they had become so numerous that many of the offers could not be complied with, owing to the competition among the applicants. He believed that the progress which had been made in the endowment of livings had given general satisfaction. He thought that he had shown that it was absolutely essential that the Commissioners should have a discretion, and that to a great extent they had met the want which had been pointed out. The measure now before them was in terms a compulsory measure, and deprived the Commissioners of all discretionary power; and, moreover, if passed, it would absorb the whole of their surplus income for many years to come. If it was believed that the Commission had committed any errors in the discharge of their important functions which would render it necessary to take from them their discretionary power in administering the funds, he thought that the Government should take the matter up, and that it should not be left to a private Member to introduce such a measure as that now before the House, which, if carried, would prevent the endowment of all populous parishes, the division of parishes, and grants being applied to meet private benevolences. Under these circumstances, he did not believe that the House would consent to such a measure as this being carried, and therefore he begged to move that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Howes.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he could not admit the correctness of the reading of the Bill on which his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk founded his opposition. He was sure that the Member for the Tower Hamlets had no desire to force the Bill at the point of the bayonet through Committee precisely in its present terms. The Bill enforced a great principle, and any reasonable objection to its provisions could easily be removed in Committee; otherwise he should not have put his name upon the back of it. The Member for Norfolk said that for some years to come the only surplus the Commissioners would have would be £12,000 a year. If, then, this be so, what better epoch can there be than this for the Commission and the House to take a little breathing time to consider what plans should be carried out in the future when the revenue again rises? The Bill is not a compulsory, but merely an enabling measure, and if it fails to express fully its own meaning, let it be so moulded that it may meet the justifiable requirements of the Commissioners in that respect. He appealed to the House not to deal with this proposal as a matter of the internal management of the Commission, but for a short time to rise above the petty and miserable questions of Commissions and Administrations, and look at the question as one involving the spiritual well-being of the people of England, and the capability of the Established Church to meet the horrible famine of spiritual privileges prevailing in every corner of the land. Rightly or wrongly, the Ecclesiastical Commission had, for many objects, grown into the character of being the Church of England by representation, and must be treated accordingly. The Member for Norfolk said that the only objection to the Bill was that it was compulsory—that it forced the Commissioners to adopt a certain line, and prevented them from carrying out their other schemes for the spiritual benefit of the population. But though one of the clauses of the Bill said that where there was a population exceeding 5,000, composed principally of poor persons, the Commissioners "shall" pay the salary of a curate, the marginal title attached to that clause said the Commissioners "may" do that; which showed the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was willing to treat the clause as merely an enabling one, although the draughtsman had framed it otherwise. In saying this he was well aware that these titles formed no portion of the Bill, and had no legal value. But they had a moral value as evidence of intention, and it is quite fair to quote them at that stage of any measure. In fact, the clause itself gave a discretion to the Commissioners, because while it said that they "shall" pay the salaries of curates, to an extent not exceeding £200 a year to each curate, and only where they might deem a curate's assistance necessary; all this was to be, under the proviso that they had met the existing demands upon them. He dwelt on that proviso, which had been overlooked by the previous speaker, as a reply to his objection. Anyhow, let the Bill be read a second time, and let the "shall" be turned into "may" in Committee. The Bill called upon the House formally to affirm the principle that the method by which the Church of England should meet the spiritual necessities of her teeming population in crowded places should not be exclusively that somewhat expensive and cumbersome machinery by which old parishes were parcelled out into dia-tricts, and the whole spiritual responsibility of each district thrown upon a single incumbent. The old and simple parochial system of self-acting parishes and districts, for each of which one clergyman was alone responsible, was cumbersome, antiquated, and inadequate to meet the wants of the age, at this epoch, of large towns, and well would it be for the Church of England to face the fact. Why should the great doctrine of co-operation, which is considered one of the greatest triumphs of civilization, which has been so successfully carried out in all secular matters, which has developed the coach into the train, and turned the inn into the hotel, alone break down at spiritual organization? The curate system had been worked very usefully; but there was no public recognition or aid held out to the curate, and something should be done now for the endowment of curates upon a systematic plan, and in view of the law of co-operation. No fear of doctrinal differences or ceremonial change need enter into this question. The Church, with its endowed staff of curates, might represent any phase of the Church of England; its worship might be of the simplest character. It behoved the Ecclesiastical Commission especially to turn its attention to these considerations, because the general sympathy of Churchmen had lately been awakened in behalf of curates. Within a year or so a fresh society, the Curates' Augmentation Fund, arising out of a conviction of the inadequate stipends too often paid to that class, has sprung into vigorous life. He did not think that that society had taken the best plan to meet it—namely, that of doles to special curates—still it was evidence of the need. He wished for something more—namely, the endowment of special curacies. This was no innovation. In certain old churches—he would quote as an instance St. James', Piccadilly—was to be found an endowed clerk in orders—that is, a curate with a fixed stipend. The system had fallen into abeyance, and now he would revive it. That it had formed no part of the original system of the Ecclesiastical Commission was no objection, but rather the contrary. When the Commission was first constituted, thirty-two years ago, it was much wanted may be. But the reason why it was so wanted was the spiritual deadness which had crept over the Church of England, and which, within the intervening years, had been changed to such vigorous life. No one would for one instant contend that, supposing the Ecclesiastical Commission were to have been constituted now, it would have had the form in which it was cast in 1835. It would have had a more representative character—including, he meant, representatives alike of clergy and of devout laity; it would have been less official and bureaucratic. No doubt it has marched with the times; no doubt it has notably improved its system in many respects; things he cheerfully acknowledged, and therefore he called for still further amendment. In fact, his position was that, as the Ecclesiastical Commission depended so much on official nomination, there was the more reason, now that there was so great an increase of spiritual life among the people, for compelling the Commissioners, at least theoretically, to accept the new means of improvement, although through a want of funds they might not at present be able to carry it out. At the same time, he wished in all reason and moderation to consider the condition of their actual exchequer and the liabilities they had incurred. If, however, the Bill were thrown out on the second reading, the impression conveyed to the public would be, that the Commission, which practically represents the Church of England, was either unwilling to adopt a new state of things, or incapable of understanding that the population had outgrown the old and simple parochial system, and that it was unwilling to apply the great principle of co-operation to spiritual needs. He would endeavour briefly to show by an example the difference between the old system and the one which he would desire to see introduced. He took a parish or district in some large town of 8,000 inhabitants. In it the incumbent might have with great self-denial and difficulty, helped by the Commission and the Church societies, have scraped together money to build his church, parsonage, and schools, and set up parish charities, and might be working the district, of which no part was very rich and one end was miserably poor; doing what he could, but being single-handed, only able to give from physical weakness the smallest modicum of Church services—two, perhaps, every Sunday at the regular hours. The case of this parish would come before the Commission, and by their regulation system, they would have nothing better to do than cut it in two, and separate the very poor end of it from the hardy well-off one. Then some other clergyman would be sent into the very poor district to repeat the same experiment as his elder brother, under much greater disadvantages, from the more abject destitution of his flock, of scraping together money for church, and school, and parsonage. When this was done the result of the handiwork would be, two isolated over-tasked clergymen, two sets of schools without staff or revenue to make either of them effective, and two churches which really did only the work of one, because each of them—dependent on a single minister—could only offer the same minimum of regulation services at the same regulation hours. What would he, on the contrary, suggest? He would advise the Commission to help and cheer the original clergyman and the original parish, not by reducing its area, not by the creation of a new incumbency involving useless building as well as monetary burdens, but by the endowment of one or two curates whose presence and co-operation would double or treble the use of church, and school, and charities. Then the richer end of the parish would not be released from its responsibility towards the poorer quarter, and that poorer quarter would not have to look for its means of spiritual existence to the repulsive system of spiritual mendicancy on the part of its incumbent, which is a disgrace of our age. The suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk which had struck him the most was the appeal not to change the system of the Commissioners, because their grants being contingent on contributions from elsewhere, stimulated vast efforts of private munificence which might by this proposal be checked. He was perfectly ready to meet and provide against that danger by enacting that the grants towards curates, whether as endowment or stipend, should be contingent on and in correspondence with private efforts. With these explanations, and on the understanding that the Bill might be moulded in Committee, he hoped the House would give it a second reading.

MR. WALPOLE said, the hon. Member for East Norfolk had expressed a wish to know what course the Government proposed to take in reference to this Bill. For himself, he might say that he was very strongly in favour of the principle that had been so well advocated, of providing for spiritual destitution in populous places, by giving curates to those places in addition to the endowments that now existed. If therefore this Bill had been simply a measure to enable the Commissioners to examine properly into all the wants of different places, and of then providing curates where they were required, he should have given it his cordial support. He must, however, say that by adopting the Bill as it stood at present, he was convinced that the House would be taking a backward and detrimental step. It was impossible that they could adopt the principles laid down in the Bill, unless the Commissioners were secured in the possession of adequate funds to meet the requirements which the Bill would create. The Bill assumed there was a large surplus in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but the statement made on the authority of the Commissioners in that House was, that by the end of 1868 they would not have £12,000 a year absolute surplus. The present Bill would therefore, if adopted, exhaust the whole of that surplus, by substituting a new mode altogether of providing for the spiritual destitution of places requiring assistance. Surely no one could doubt—considering the small amount in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the numerous claims, present and prospective—that this surplus of £12,000 a year would be very inadequate to answer the many claims which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were bound to satisfy. Under the Act of Parliament the Commissioners were bound to satisfy certain claims—first of all, the claims arising in places where the tithes belonged to the Church, and in which the property of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was situate; and secondly, the claims of populous parishes in mining districts. Now, the claims made upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for those two purposes would absorb a large portion of their funds, and those claims would have to be provided for for many years to come, until every part of the kingdom where they arose was satisfied. In addition to all this they had still in existence the arrangement come to some four years ago—an arrangement which was to last for a period of five years from that time. By that arrangement an obligation rested upon the shoulders of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, from which they could not relieve themselves until the expiration of the five years. The Commissioners were morally and equitably bound to meet the claims comprehended under it. There was nothing unreasonable in that arrangement, as was evident from the fact that it had met with universal acceptance, and that it was well calculated to answer all the purposes for which it was proposed. At that time there existed populations of 10,000 and upwards, in which the clergyman was paid a miserable pittance to attend to the spiritual wants of a vast district. The three modes by which it was proposed under the arrangement entered into four years ago to meet the spiritual wants of certain parishes or districts were—first, to provide that in cases of very populous parishes or districts the income of the clergyman should be raised to £300; secondly, to supply the wants of all local claims; thirdly, to contribute an equal amount to that of benefactions subscribed for by parishioners in order to satisfy the spiritual wants of the particular parish or district. Now the effect of the plan proposed would be to upset this whole arrangement, and to set at nought the advantage arising from the benefactions subscribed for year by year to justify the grant of an equal amount, so as to form a fund to meet the spiritual wants of particular places. The great arguments used in favour of this Bill, especially those relied on by the hon. Member for Stoke, went, not only for the sub-division of parishes, but the endowment of rectories and the providing of additional pastors and clergymen. He (Mr. Walpole) would go along with his hon. Friend in advocating the attainment of those admirable and desirable objects. He had intimated, he thought, to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets that that object could not be obtained by a compulsory Bill of this kind; but it might be effected by an enabling Bill, which would give the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a discretion in the matter, and an opportunity of judging whether the arrangement in question could be carried out, and also leaving it to them to decide upon the time and mode by which the desired object could be best carried out. Had the present proposal been one of such a character as that to which he referred he would have had no difficulty in giving it his support. A few years ago the subject of the Ecclesiastical Commission came before the House of Lords. Some of the arrangements proposed were approved of, so far as he knew, without a dissentient voice. A claim, however, was made on behalf of those mining districts in which there were large populations but without any minister to look after them. Accordingly a clause was inserted in the Bill at that time—it was, he thought, the 16th clause—which enabled the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to provide curates for places where there were large masses of people collected together who were without spiritual assistance, and empowered the Commissioners from time to time to make grants of money to meet an equal amount of benefactions, with the view of affording temporary provision for the cure of souls. Every one would admit the good which that clause had done in the mining districts of Wales and the other districts in which it was allowed to operate. That was the principle for which he was contending as being applicable to all populous places suffering from spiritual destitution. If in any of those places where the population was 5,000 and upwards, the inhabitants were willing to subscribe amongst themselves a sufficient sum to give them a claim upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for a grant to an equal amount for the purpose of providing curates for such places as were in want of the same, he should be willing to give his best support to any measure that would give effect to such an arrangement. But to affirm the principle of this Bill would be to act directly contrary to the moral engagements into which they had entered under the arrangement of four years ago. According to this Bill it was compulsory on the Commissioners, in cases of spiritual destitution, where the population of any parish in England or Wales exceeded 5,000, to provide out of the common fund a salary for the curate appointed to any such place or parish, not exceeding £200 a year. [Mr. ARNOLD here expressed dissent.] Well, it appeared to him (Mr. Walpole) that so far as the clause could be framed in a compulsory form, the one to which he referred was a compulsory clause. If the hon. Gentleman shrunk from his own proposition, it was no doubt because he saw the injurious consequences of his measure. He submitted that the Bill should be put in a proper shape, so as to obtain the general approval of the House before it was suffered to go into Committee. He fully agreed with the hon. Members for the Tower Hamlets and Stoke that it was advisable to supplement the arrangements made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for meeting the spiritual destitution of populous places by providing curacies as well as by subdividing parishes. But while concurring in such an arrangement he would leave a discretion to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to carry out such an arrangement according to the funds under their control.

Any measure introduced with that object would, he thought, receive the sanction of the House. But as the measure which was brought into the House by the hon. Gentleman opposite would, according to the authentic statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, exhaust all the funds of the Commissioners and deprive them of those valuable means of doing good which the Commissioners at present possessed—as, instead of being an advantage, it was a measure that was likely to do harm to the working of the Commission, and to exhaust the funds in their possession—he should feel it his duty to offer it every opposition. He would, however, suggest to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets that instead of the present Bill he should introduce one of a permissive character. Under all the circumstances of the case, and for the reasons he had stated, he could not with his eyes open assent to the second reading of the Bill in its present form.

MR. POWELL said, he would not venture to oppose this Bill from any narrow view, or from a mere Commissioners' aspect of the question, but he should oppose it on other considerations altogether. There was some degree of inconsistency in the opening remarks of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The hon. Gentleman said his only object was to cast in the lot of his constituents with that of the rest of the people; but throughout his speech it was evidently the desire of the hon. Gentleman to place his constituents in a position superior to that of any other class of the people. Now he (Mr. Powell) believed that the hon. Gentleman's constituents had received fair and even justice from the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It was asserted that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners declined to give any more income to ministers of large parishes—parishes with populations numbering 20,000 or 30,000—than what they gave to ministers placed over parishes of only 5,000 and upwards. He denied that that was the policy or the practice of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They had given in some cases £200 a year to district churches for parishes largely populated, and in which there was a want of church accommodation. And the effect of such a course was to afford a most valuable stimulant to the erection of new churches or the enlargement of old ones. It was not the case that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners evinced any desire that the clergyman attached to one of those churches should receive no assistance, or co-operation, however extensive his duties. On the contrary, they showed an extreme desire and willingness that the ministers of those churches should not be single-handed, nor forced to pursue their labours without co-operation. One of his arguments against this Bill arose from the fact of the enormous subscriptions given year by year towards the relief of spiritual destitution. It was almost impossible to establish endowments in connection with new churches that were being built. There was, on the other hand, little difficulty, comparatively speaking, of maintaining curates by annual gifts. He therefore strongly objected to diverting funds, from the creation of endowments to which voluntary action was unequal, to the payment of curates, which subscriptions successfully accomplished. Neither was he desirous of a minute subdivision of parishes, thus creating, as the Dean of Ely remarked, a series of little independent ministers, each at the head of a little independent congregation. Such, however, was not now the practice, the new districts and new parishes containing as they did very considerable populations. He did not at all sympathize with the hon. and learned Gentleman in the 2nd clause of the Bill, wherein he seemed to exhibit a feeling, if not of antagonism and hostility, at least of extreme jealousy, with reference to lay patrons. Those persons did not exercise their patronage with less benefit to the Church than public patrons. There might be some solitary instances of nepotism, and where relations were presented to the family living, but in large towns the lay patronage was exercised in a beneficial manner for the Church, the best clergyman being selected. He had carefully watched the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and though not predisposed to view them with favour, he was convinced that their conduct had conferred great benefit upon the Church, and that the continual interference of Parliament would only serve to cripple their freedom of action and greatly impede their usefulness. Instead of their waiting for the judgment and legislation of Parliament he considered it was their duty to exercise providence and forethought, and take a comprehensive view of their duties, and consider what in the long run would best promote the interests of the Church. The action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it should be borne in mind, greatly influenced those who were engaged in church extension, and the friends of the Church framed and propagated their schemes, and appealed to the public and received donations, upon the faith of what the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would do. If Parliament interfered in this fragmentary and casual way with the working of the Commission he was certain it would thwart its own original intention with reference to the extension of the Church in poor districts, and the appointment of qualified and cultivated clergymen.

MR. BRUCE said, that he must concur in the Amendment which had been proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Norfolk—namely, that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months. If the Bill passed in its present form it would entirely destroy the discretion which at present existed in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and reduce them to nothing more than an Additional Curates' Aid Society. It would entirely prevent the Commissioners from continuing the system which had hitherto proved so beneficial to the Church, of making small annual grants for church extension, whereby large benefactions were obtained from the public bounty for the same purpose. The grant of £3,500 a year by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was the means of drawing £100,000 per annum from the bounty of the public; and there was ample ground for believing that if they could increase the grant to £8,000 per annum the donations of the public would increase in proportion, and would reach a sum of not less than £250,000. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets had said that the scheme of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which had been before the House for the last three years, was not a scheme for supplying spiritual destitution, but for supplying parsons' destitution. Nothing could be more miserable than the position of a poor clergyman appointed to preside over the spiritual interests of a large population. It was necessary that he should be a man of great ability, but it was impossible to get such a man in the Church any more than it was in other professions, unless he was adequately remunerated. That fact, alone, he thought, formed a sufficient justification for the course which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had pursued for so many years, and which, until the introduction of the hon. and learned Member's

Bill with reference to the Finsbury Estate Bill, had never been impugned, but had been unanimously approved of by the Church and the public. They were in this position with regard to the present Bill. The hon. Member for Stoke, whose name was on the back of the Bill, had disclaimed in the fullest manner its compulsory character, though the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets had not done so, and had the Bill been framed on the suggestions which he (Mr. Bruce) made when the Finsbury Estate Bill was before the House, he and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and his right hon. Friend the Judge Advocate, would not have opposed it. [MR. WALPOLE: Hear, hear!] He believed that the local claims were great, and that it was for the general interest of the Church that they should be encouraged; but whether the claim for curates in the mining districts was a local claim or not, there had been a partial treatment of the mining districts which could not be altogether justified. It had been said that the population in those districts was of a migratory character, and that it was necessary some provision of a temporary character should be made to meet that difficulty, because it was urged there was no reason why provision should not be made in the manufacturing districts, or wherever great populations arose. He was prepared to remedy that and to put the country generally in the same position. If therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets would withdraw the Bill and introduce another based upon that principle, he should be ready to support it, and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had intimated his readiness to do the same. Or he would suggest to his hon. and learned Friend that he might commit this Bill pro forma, and then introduce the clauses to which he and his right hon. Friend and others could assent. He should expect that everything like compulsion or an interference with the discretion of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be withdrawn, and it should also be clearly understood that they should have the power of making such grants as they considered best for the interests of the Church, and of the balance which remained at their disposal at the end of 1866. They were informed that the surplus for the three years following 1868 was not likely to exceed £12,000 per annum. On it there was a lien on behalf of local claims likely to amount to £5,000 per annum. The House and the country would not wish that the £3,500 per annum, which had been hitherto given to meet the local benefactions, should be decreased, and there would then be £3,500 per annum left at the disposal of the Commissioners. At the end of the three years there might be a larger sum to dispose of, and then it would be the duty of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to consider whether or not it would not be for the interests of the Church that additional curates should be occasionally employed in populous districts. He did not consider it was expedient that there should always be a subdivision of large parishes, but rather that recourse should be had to lay assistance. At the same time, it was only just to state that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had the power to do much of what was required without special legislation; and the House might rest assured that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would pay attention to any suggestions that were made in that House, and, if it were possible, carry them out.

MR. SELWYN said, he should vote against the second reading of this Bill for the same reason which compelled him with reluctance to vote against the former Bill for the relief of the spiritual destitution of the metropolis, and also because he was not without hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets would be able to devise a more effectual plan for the relief of that spiritual destitution which they all so much deplored. The question was, what was the most effectual means of reducing that destitution, which all admitted was so universal and so appalling? Two opposite views had been presented of this Bill. One, the view taken by the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Amendment, that this was a compulsory measure, which appeared to him (Mr. Selwyn) was the correct one, and the other that taken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke, who said that that was not the real intention of the framer of the Bill. Assuming that the Bill did not intend to interfere with the discretion of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, could the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, consistently with his speech on that and on a former occasion, advocate the present Bill? On a former occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman commented on the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with great force, and also with great harshness, but not more so, he thought, than was justified by the evidence which had been laid before the House. He truly and plainly pointed out many errors into which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had fallen, and that day he had told them that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had laid down a certain rigid scheme which he said was rigidly unjust; that the Ecclesiastical Commission had failed in its duty, and he pointed out particular instances on the other side of the water of spiritual destitution which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had failed in remedying. He agreed with all that the hon. and learned Gentleman had said in that respect, and when he conceded that he was only repeating what had been proved over and over again before Commissions of that House. He was not imputing blame to any one connected with the Ecclesiastical Commission. There never had been a body who had been more happy in the selection of the persons they had put at the head of their affairs; but the faults did not arise from that Commission, but from the centralizing system which they had adopted. It was that that had made them so rigidly unjust. Some thirty years ago, finding the Church in a position of considerable difficulty, Parliament endeavoured to remedy some of the temporary evils, and they erected a high scaffold around the Church, but it was never intended to be permanent and to swallow up all the property of the Church as it had done; and it was from the establishment of the central office in Whitehall that all the evils had arisen. In the year 1855, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended in a Report what should be done with reference to the property and powers of our cathedral institutions. They pointed out how inadequate they had become to meet spiritual destitution, and they suggested that the Crown and Parliament should step in and make the necessary changes to remedy spiritual destitution; but from that time to the present nothing had been done beyond attempts to transfer the property to the centralized office. In 1862 and 1863, a Committee of that House inquired into the constitution and proceeding of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were largely and ably represented on that Select Committee by four Members of the body; but notwithstanding that circumstance, the Committee, in their Report, condemned the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Commis-

ation, and pointed out the great expense which the centralized action of that body entailed on the funds. His object was to assist his hon. and learned Friend in bringing in a Bill to carry out the recommendations of that Committee—namely, to restore to the different local bodies their former powers by making them act in a manner harmoniously with the feelings and necessities of the present time, because it was considered that many of the duties of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners could be more satisfactorily discharged by diocesan or county associations, comprising the Bishop of the diocese, the dean and chapter, the archdeacon, representatives of the parochial clergy, and the laity—the presence of the lay element being, in his opinion, an essential point. Such a body would undoubtedly possess a knowledge of the spiritual wants of the locality, and it would afford ample scope for the united action of the clergy and laity. They might, if necessary, be subject to the control of a central authority, which should lay down principles, but should not interfere with details. The local knowledge of these bodies would enable them to distribute the funds of which they had the management in the best manner, avoiding the expenses of survey and valuation attendant upon the present system, and he believed the result would be to show how inadequate the Church property of the country was to meet the spiritual destitution which existed. The Committee recommended that those changes should be accomplished by the power of the Crown in certain cases, and in others by the intervention of Parliament, but although the cathedral bodies had repeatedly petitioned in favour of the scheme being carried out, nothing had yet been done. It would lead to a great saving of expense, for there existed three societies for providing additional curates, and the machinery of these, added to the enormous expenses of the Commissioners, swallowed up funds which would have relieved the spiritual destitution of thousands, while the errors into which the Commissioners had fallen from their want of local knowledge had absorbed sums which would have ministered to the wants of tens of thousands. The plan proposed was in successful operation in many colonial dioceses, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman, instead of proceeding with this Bill, would bring that plan forward or would assist in urging its adoption upon the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, the hon. Member had raised a very important question, in favour of which there was, no doubt, much to be said, but he thought the House had better confine its attention to the present Bill, which affected the administration of the funds now administered by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The measure had been described by the hon. Member for Stoke as permissive, but it certainly appeared to him to be compulsory in its present form, and if it was to remain so he should feel it his duty to vote against it, as it would do away with the whole efficiency of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He might say that he did not think it desirable to make the House a place where the details of administration should be settled; this should be left to administrative bodies under its control. If the Bill were permissive he should go great lengths in saying it might be useful. He quite agreed in the suggestion that the Commissioners should not be kept in the groove of subdividing parishes to which grants were made, for in some cases it would be much better to appoint curates, under the direction of one energetic incumbent, and he also concurred in the suggestion that private benefactions should be stipulated for. If these points were embodied in the Bill, and if it was made clearly permissive, it would be a useful measure, and he was willing to assent to the second reading on the understanding that it should be committed pro forma and should be re-constructed, but unless such an assurance were given he should feel bound to vote against it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped that the Bill would not be rejected upon the second reading, because there could be no doubt that a most valuable mode of providing for spiritual destitution was to appoint additional curates in populous places, instead of always insisting upon further endowments. It had been said that the Commissioners had this power already; but he could not help thinking that, except in the case of mines, the Commissioners had never felt that to be the case. At all events, it was desirable that any doubt upon the subject should be removed, and that the hands of the Commissioners should be completely liberated. He thought it desirable that Parliament should express an opinion that this was a proper mode of expending any funds that might be at the disposal of the Commissioners, and that the Commissioners should have full powers to act, not with the view of diverting their funds altogether from other purposes to which they were now usefully applied, but of considering, concurrently with the existing modes of providing for spiritual destitution, the expediency of appointing curates in aid of the incumbents in populous places. He urged that the Bill should be read a second time upon the condition that it should be committed pro forma, and so amended as to operate permissively only. If they rejected the Bill at the present stage it might be implied that they differed from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets as to the expediency of applying the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the provision of additional curates.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the general feeling of the House was clearly in favour of an enabling Bill to empower the Commissioners to appoint additional curates where it was necessary. The difficulty they were in was that one hon. Member said the Bill was permissive and another said it was compulsory, and that view was expressed by the hon. Member in moving the Bill. He admitted it was very inconvenient to vote for the second reading of a Bill in which, in its present shape, they did not concur, with a view of amending it in Committee, but he did not wish to negative the principle of appointing additional curates. They had heard lately of the awkward state of ignorance of the agricultural labourers, who, it had been said, could not understand what they read; and that seemed just the position of hon. Members with regard to this Bill. They had the Bill, they read it, and they could not understand what they read. He concurred in the proposal that the Commissioners should be empowered to make grants for additional curates in cases where it was unadvisable to divide parishes, but not in the suggestion that local commissions should be established, for he feared the effect would be that instead of one nuisance they would have fifty. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would undertake to make the Bill permissive.

MR. AYRTON said, that the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge could hardly expect him to carry out the suggestion which he had made. With reference to the other suggestion that had been made, he wished to explain that the Bill was compulsory so far as it compelled the Commissioners to consider the claims of these parishes; but it was permissive in not compelling them to appropriate their funds to any specific object. The Bill was thus partly permissive and partly compulsory, the simple object being that gentlemen living in comfort and luxury on incomes, perhaps, of £15,000 a year, should be obliged to consider the necessities of poor people, almost destitute of clothing, without education, with no means of subsistence, and hardly better off than heathens. This they had not hitherto done, having paid more regard to the interests of the parsons than of the people. He was prepared in Committee to carry out his view of compelling the Commissioners to consider these cases, and of allowing them to apply part of their funds to these claims concurrently with other claims. The hon. Member for East Norfolk had stated there were 800 parishes with 5,000 inhabitants, and that the Commissioners were unable to grant £200 a year to all these; but the number of such parishes where working people congregated, and where spiritual destitution existed, was not more numerous than they could provide for, and his proposal was not that £200 per annum should be given, but that that should be the maximum. The Bill did not specifically appropriate any of the Commissioners' funds, and if the hon. Gentleman opposite was ready to acquiesce in the second reading in order that it might be amended, he would be satisfied; otherwise he must ask the House to decide whether money coming from the pockets of the residents of the metropolis should be distributed among those who had raised the fund, or whether it should be squandered on parsons and patrons scattered over the country.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE begged to be allowed to explain. When he gave his name to the Bill it was on the understanding that it might be altered in Committee, and in the belief that the present scheme of the Commission, whether or not abstractedly the best, was a debt of honour, and was to be respected. Since, however, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets did not take this view, and after the reply they had just heard, he declined to be made the instrument of an attack on "patrons and parsons," and he would not vote at all.

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Tottenham, Mr. Brady.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BLAKE, in moving that the Bill be read a second time, regretted the lateness of the hour precluded him, in justice to the hon. Members who wished to speak also on the subject, from entering into it as fully as he wished. He would curtail his remarks to the narrowest limits, more especially as he had extensively circulated in a printed form reasons in support of the measure. Twenty-one years ago competent authorities declared that the coasts around Ireland ought to give employment to four times the number of people engaged in the fisheries, and that the capture ought to be in the same proportion. There were at that time nearly 20,000 vessels and boats and upwards of 100,000 men and boys employed in the fisheries. The modes of capture had in the meantime improved, prices had increased, though fish was quite as abundant, increased facilities of transit had enabled markets to be more easily reached, and yet to-day there were not above 10,000 vessels and boats, and 40,000 hands engaged, showing a diminution of more than one-half of the latter, and fully half the former. The cause of this was in part told in the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed in 1864 to examine into the fisheries of the kingdom—

“The fishermen suffered to the full extent in the misfortunes of the famine, and as most of them became physically incapable of going to sea, it was frequently found that men were starving whilst fish was in abundance. In many parts of Ireland the fishing population has not yet recovered from the depression and ruin caused by the famine, and the subsequent emigration, by taking off the youngest and ablest of the fishermen, and leaving behind the old and incompetent, operated most injuriously.”

Thousands of poor fishermen had to sell their boats and gear for anything they could get, and thousands of craft were suffered to go to decay, the owners in both instances never being able to replace them. This accounted in a great measure for the decline in numbers; but the causes which operated before the famine in preventing the fisheries from being as flourishing as they ought to be still existed, the want of good fishing harbours, want of capital to procure a better class of boats by the coast fishermen, unwise restrictions on the modes of fishing, the want of a constant supervision, and of a vigorous central authority. The Bill then before the House was intended to provide for those requirements. It removed the control from the Board of Works, and placed it directly under the Lord Lieutenant. He wished to speak of the Board as it deserved with every respect, but it had such multifarious and onerous duties to perform that the fisheries could not be properly attended to: and in justice it should be said the Board was vested with very insufficient powers. In conformity with the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners all restrictions on in-shore fishing was removed. This was a subject involving some difference of opinion, and the Board of Works had expressed an opinion contrary to the Royal Commission, as regarded trawling within bays and estuaries. It seems, however, that whilst in many places they prevented vessels which could not trawl in less than four fathoms of water from fishing in bays, they allowed small craft which could trawl in half a fathom to do so freely, so that if their theory was correct about destroying spawn in shallow places, they suffered the mischief to be done in the most effectual manner. Persons of capital were deterred in many instances from investing in large boats, as during hard weather they should keep their crews idle, from not being able to follow fish up estuaries, which could not be caught by small boats, and which after a time dashed back to sea again, and might never be captured. The provisions regarding loans were the most important in the Bill. They would in the first place enable owners of property on its security to obtain loans to plant oyster beds on the shore adjacent to their lands, and in the next empower the Board of Works to advance small sums on approved security for procuring boats and gear. This would very much encourage the purchase of craft more suited to deep-sea fishing than those generally used by the humbler fishermen. The Royal Commission of 1836 strongly recommended the encouragement of loan funds. A society, of which Mr. Andrews, the eminent authority on fisheries, was a trustee, had in a few years advanced several thousand pounds to poor fishermen, which, he stated, had all been repaid, after conferring great advantages on the recipients. Some, perhaps, would urge that to make advances to fishermen was contrary to the principles of political economy. On that day he had put the question to the first political economist of the age, who considered that the Irish fishermen ought to be fostered and encouraged by such means. A gentleman, who from his experience and official position ought to be competent to pronounce, had been quoted in a recent pamphlet as having stated that the Irish fisheries were capable of supporting twenty times the present fleet. Now, suppose that half that figure were adopted, and that ten times the present crews obtained a living, and contributed only £25 per man to the stock of fish, there would, in round numbers, be 500,000 of additional people employed, and £5,000,000 extra circulated among the Irish people, and fully £15,000,000 of additional food contributed to the stock of provisions of the kingdom. How £5,000,000 worth of fish represented £15,000,000 worth of food could be easily explained. A farmer easily obtained £60 per ton for his beef, the fisherman only got £7 per ton for his fish, prime and offal together. Now, even admitting that 1 lb of beef was worth 3 lb of fish in point of nutriment (and which it certainly was not), still those who bought it at £7 per ton had it at one-ninth the price of meat. With such a number of additional people employed, and so much money circulating, how far it would go to allay discontent and disaffection, and what a splendid nursery would be formed for the Mercantile and Royal Marine. Sensible of the latter advantage, the Emperor of the French was giving bounties and doing all he could to advance the fisheries of his kingdom. Their attention to fisheries enabled the Dutch once as a maritime Power to cope with England, and Dutchman boasted that their noble city of Amsterdam had its foundation laid on herring bones. He (Mr. Blake) admitted that there were some points in the Bill opened to controversy, and therefore did not seek it should become law until fully considered. The best way of doing this would be to refer it to a Select Committee of the House. In fact, the subject, together with the inland fisheries, had been so referred in 1862; but the latter, at his (Mr. Blake's) instance, was only then considered and reported on. The present Government on accession to office had through the Leader in the House expressed a desire to promote the material interests of Ireland. As yet, however, Ireland had been obliged to take the promise for the deed. A good opportunity now offered, without risk of loss to the State, of rendering a service to Ireland by aiding to place in a flourishing position the important industrial resource which he had brought under their notice. The Irish Members on both sides seemed most anxious that the matter should be taken into consideration, and the leading Irish metropolitan journals, Conservative and Liberal, had with great public spirit and ability urged the subject on the attention of Government, and advocated an inquiry which he hoped the House would not refuse.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Blake.)

LORD NAAS said, it was impossible for him that day to enter very largely into the question which the hon. Gentleman had brought forward. The matter, however, was one of very great importance, and the Bill before the House would have the effect of repealing nearly the whole of their existing legislation upon it. He was disinclined to resist the appeal made to him by his hon. Friend; but he must guard himself and the Government from being supposed to be favourable to some portions of the Bill. Two Reports on that subject from very able Royal Commissions lay on the table of the House, and those two high authorities differed most essentially on some points connected with that question. Therefore, the House ought to be careful before it took any very decided line on the matter. Moreover, he understood that Parliament would probably be invited at no very distant day to consider the whole question of deep-sea fisheries as regarded the United Kingdom; and, if that were the case, it would, he thought, be premature for the House to legislate absolutely for one part of the United Kingdom. Still, the subject was not one which ought to be delayed unnecessarily, and he was not indisposed, therefore, to assent to the second reading of the Bill on the understanding that no further step should be taken in the matter until after Easter, when they would probably be better able to judge of the effect of recent legislation on certain parts of the question, and particularly with reference to the formation of oyster beds. The 12th clause of the Bill made a very serious alteration, because it provided that no boats should trawl within a distance of three miles from boats fishing with drift nets. [Mr. BLAKE: That is the existing law.] No, he thought not; and he mentioned that merely to show how difficult and complicated the subject was, and how cautious they ought to be before committing themselves to any opinion upon it. He hoped it would be understood that the question as to referring the Bill to a Select Committee should be allowed to stand over for the present. After Easter the House would be in a better position to decide whether it was desirable to take that course.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, he wished to give notice that, after the second reading of the Bill, he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee; for he was convinced that only in this way could all the differences of opinion that existed on this subject be fairly considered.

MR. HUNT said, it was his duty to call the attention of the House to certain provisions of the Bill with regard to the lending of public money. The Bill proposed that money should be advanced by the Public Works Commissioners in Ireland to enable persons to form oyster beds, build piers and harbours, erect houses or sheds for the curing or drying of fish, and also to mend or repair boats and vessels, to purchase fishing gear, or for such other purposes as the inspectors might certify under their hands were expedient. The money was to be advanced on the certificate of an inspector that the security was satisfactory. He apprehended that in most cases the security would be personal security. He was exceedingly anxious to see the Irish fisheries flourishing; but in assenting to the second reading of the Bill, he wished it distinctly to be understood that he did not consent to many of the clauses as they now stood, because he thought it was impossible to lend public money upon perishable articles such as boats and nets, upon what he supposed was merely personal security.

MR. MONSELL said, that in the present state of the matter what was wanted was a general Bill for the three kingdoms, instead of one applying to Ireland only; for as soon as the Convention with France was concluded some general legislative measure would be absolutely indispensable. It was not true that the decline of the Irish fisheries had been caused by the unwise interference of the Legislature or of Parliament, but by the decline of the population—a fact that was very clearly established by the Royal Commission that sat on the subject—and mainly through the continual fighting that went on between those parties who wished to carry them on in one way and those who wished to carry them on in another. He sincerely trusted that in any fresh legislation on that subject they would adopt the same system in the three countries. As soon, therefore, as the Convention with France was signed he hoped they would have a general Bill brought in for the three kingdoms. That would be better than any Government grant or exceptional legislation.

MR. BRADY said, he thought that no sufficient reason had been shown for not proceeding with the Bill; he believed that the Bill would greatly assist in the development of the Irish fisheries, and he therefore trusted it would be referred to a Select Committee. The approaching Convention with France had no special reference to Ireland and ought not to be made the ground for obstruction to the progress of the present measure.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that having been a member of the Commission referred to, he could state that what was most needed for the development of Irish fisheries was that some means should be adopted to preserve peace between the different fishermen. That Report had led to the appointment of an International Commission between France and England, of which he was also a member; they had agreed upon the abolition of all restrictions beyond the three mile limit, and to establish a few simple police regulations for the preservation of order among the fishermen. He hoped, therefore, that this Bill would be simply read a second time, but that further progress should be stayed till after the production of the Report of the International Committee, which might render it unnecessary to send the Bill to a Select Committee. He approved of the abolition of restrictions in this Bill, but not of loans to fishermen, and pointed out that it would be impossible to take anything like adequate security, seeing the very perishable nature of the commodity which formed the chief security that could be offered for the repayment of the loans. He approved, however, of advances being made for piers and harbours at fishing stations, because something like a valid security could be given.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he should support the second reading, with a view to send the Bill before a Select Committee, because the Convention between France and England would by no means settle the many questions which it was the object of this Bill to settle. Moreover, there was a decided difference of opinion between the English and Irish Fishery Commissions as to the desirability of permitting trawling, the Irish Commission being totally opposed to it, while the Report of the Deep Sea Fisheries Commissioners was in favour of removing all restrictions upon trawling. With reference to what had been said against the proposal to assist the Irish fisheries with loans, he maintained that the Government were still retaining to their own use £5,000 every year to which Ireland was entitled, and which was given her for the very purpose of promoting her fisheries.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would strongly support the proposition for the second reading with a view of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, where it might be examined by Members who were acquainted with the subject and with the country. He thought that a further consideration of the measure would show that there was nothing to justify the assertion that it proposed the lending of the public money upon perishable articles. What was proposed was that the money should be lent upon such security as the Commissioners should approve of, and this need not be either of a personal or perishable character.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY thought that little disposition was shown to encourage the improvement and progress of Ireland, when a proposal such as this met with such an unfavourable reception; but when he saw one Secretary of the Treasury nodding over the way to the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, he felt sure that the scheme, whatever it might be, was doomed. Everything which had been said in the course of the debate showed that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee; but, at the same time, he would say that he advocated that course, not only on the ground advanced by other hon. Members, but because he did not agree that it would be expedient to do away with all restrictions on fishing, because it would let in the employment of very destructive engines. So far as the loan question was concerned, he understood private loans were now advanced to fishermen on the security of the boats, nets, and gear, and that the results had been very successful.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) hoped that any hesitation which the Government might have shown to refer the Bill at present to a Select Committee, would not be imputed to any desire on their part to throw obstacles in the way of the development of the important branch of national industry to which it related. He could assure the House that the Government were very anxious to deal with a subject of this importance in a way that would be satisfactory to Ireland, and there was no objection whatever to refer it to a Select Committee; but they thought the best plan would be to wait until the Report of the International Commissioners, and the particulars of the Convention were before Parliament, when they would be able to say at once whether it was advisable to send the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE expressed his gratification at hearing that there would be no opposition to the second reading of the Bill, and would have agreed readily to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, but he thought the facts stated by the hon. Member for Reading and the Attorney General ought to be sufficient to induce his hon. Friend to abstain from pressing for a Select Committee till after Easter.

MR. M'LAREN said, that any Bill of the character of that now before the House ought to extend to the whole of the United Kingdom. He must condemn the principle of the loans referred to in the Bill as contrary to sound political economy.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he did not think that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee. It altered materially the Act passed only last Session, and it was rather early to legislate again on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

WATERFORD COUNTY ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That Edmund de la Poer, esquire, was duly elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Waterford.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolutions :—

That no case of general riot at the last Election was proved as would make the said Election altogether null and void.

That no evidence was adduced before the Committee in regard to corrupt practices at the last Election.

Report to lie upon the Table.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL—(No. 55.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the House go into Committee on this Bill, said, he had been asked by a noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) whether a certain provision of the 5th clause did not interfere with the prerogative of the Crown. In reply, he begged to state that this prerogative was not questioned in any way by the Bill. Her Majesty ordered the confinement of criminal lunatics during pleasure under the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, before which time such lunatics were confined by order of the Court before which they appeared.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped that the clauses of this Bill would be brought under the consideration of the Irish Government, with a view to the introduction of a similar measure applicable to Ireland.

House in Committee; Bill reported, without Amendment, and to be read 3<sup>d</sup> To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

SCHOOLS INQUIRY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is probable that the Schools Inquiry Commissioners will make their Report in the course of the present year?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that the Commissioners had their Report now under consideration, and they hoped to be able to complete it before the end of the Session. If, however, that hope were disappointed, the Report would certainly be presented before another Session commenced.

NAVY—ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY AND LIGHT INFANTRY.

QUESTION.

MR. STONE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Order in Council of the 21st March 1862, forming distinct lists of officers for the Royal Marine Artillery and Royal Marine Light Infantry respectively, and providing that after those lists shall have been formed no more interchanges by promotion from one corps to the other should be allowed is still in force; whether, in the opinion of the Board of Admiralty, such Orders in Council are to be construed as strictly as other Laws, or may be set aside at the discretion of the Board for any reason whatever; and, whether in his opinion the recent promotions of a Colonel from the Royal Marine Artillery to be General in the Royal Marine Light Infantry, and of an officer in the Royal Marine Light Infantry to be General in the Royal Marine Artillery, were in accordance with the Order of March 21st 1862; and, if not, whether it is the intention of the Board of Admiralty to return those officers to the branches of the Service to which they were assigned under that Order in Council?

MR. CORRY, in reply, said, that the Order in Council of the 21st March, 1862, forming distinct lists of officers for the Royal Marine Artillery and the Royal Marine Light Infantry, and providing that after those lists should have been formed no more interchanges by promotion from one corps to the other should be allowed, was still in force, and that in the opinion of the Admiralty such Order was to be construed as strictly as other laws. He would add that the recent promotions of a Colonel from the Royal Marine Artillery to be General in the Royal Marine Light Infantry, and the transfer of a General Officer in the Royal Marine Light Infantry to be General in the Royal Marine Artillery, were not at variance with the Order in Council of 1862.

IRELAND—MANAGEMENT OF CITY PRISONS.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNER said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any Bill this Session to alter and amend the management of City Prisons in Ireland by Boards of Superintendence?

LORD NAAS, in reply, said, it was not the intention of Government to introduce any special Bill, but that they would introduce one on the general subject of Prisons in Ireland.

REWARDS TO INVENTORS—ORDNANCE AND PROJECTILES.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE STUCLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, previous to the disposal of any portion of the £22,800 proposed to be given to inventors, he is willing to appoint a Committee to inquire into the claims of Messrs. Whitworth, Jeffery, Padwick, Lynall Thomas, Lancaster, and Captain Scott, all of whom have devoted much time, labour, and money in the improvement of rifled ordnance and projectiles, and have hitherto not been rewarded?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, Government had no intention to appoint any such Committee. There was already a department in the War Office which inquired very fully and thoroughly into these matters, but apart from that there was really nothing for a Committee to inquire into. He was not aware that Mr. Whitworth had made a claim; Mr. Jeffery had received a reward, Mr. Padwick had been offered a sum of money which he had refused, Mr. Lynall Thomas had become bankrupt, Mr. Lancaster had received a handsome sum, with which he was satisfied, and Captain Scott had made no claim.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—DISFRANCHISED BOROUGHES.

QUESTION.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, if the Boroughs of Lancaster, Great Yarmouth, Reigate, and Totnes are disfranchised, it is proposed to give votes for the respective Counties in which they are situated to those persons whom the Commissioners, after full inquiry, have found to have been guilty of corrupt practices by either giving, promising, or receiving bribes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think that the individuals referred to should have votes for the respective counties in which the boroughs mentioned were situated. Their names were all scheduled, and he did not see that there would be any difficulty in providing against their exercise of the vote.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. MORRISON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is his intention to propose that the House should proceed with the Debate on the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill to amend the Representation of the People, or the Amendments thereto, on Tuesday next, and to proceed thereafter with the Bill de die in diem, on the nights reserved to private Members as well as on Government nights, in the event of hon. Members who have Motions on the Paper consenting to waive their right to precedence on those nights?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Government would take every step in their power to advance the progress of the Bill, for the improvement of the Representation of the People; but of course it would be the utmost presumption in him to interfere with the privileges of Private Members on the nights devoted to them. He would leave the exercise of the enjoyment of that privilege to their discretion.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he for one would not waive his claim.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—THE PROPOSED ALTERATIONS.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HUTT said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, previous to Monday next, he will lay before the House, in a printed form, all the alterations which Her Majesty's Government have determined to introduce in Committee into the Bill for amending the Representation of the People?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be clearly impossible to comply with the request of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not know of any Government that ever existed which could tell all the alterations that might be introduced into such a Bill. At present the modifications introduced by the Government were not so much alterations as additions, and they had reference chiefly to a series of clauses as to the modes by which the right of compound-householders to claim the franchise should be established. He was in hopes that he should have been able to lay these clauses upon the table that evening; but he had not been able to do so on account of the difficulty of the subject, and the great consideration which it required. He hoped, however, to be able to lay them before the House to-morrow, and in the hands of hon. Members by Saturday.

SIERRA LEONE—TRIAL BY JURY.

QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to an Ordinance issued by the Governor and Council of Sierra Leone, removing the right of trial by jury in all civil actions in that Colony; and, whether a Petition against such Ordinance, signed by native merchants and other inhabitants of the Colony, has been received at the Colonial Office?

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Buxton) had already called the attention of the House to this subject, and had moved for Papers which had only that day been laid upon the table of the House.

IRELAND—INSPECTORS OF COUNTY AND CONVICT PRISONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he proposes, during the present Session, to introduce a Bill for the amalgamation of the offices of Inspectors General of County Prisons and Inspectors of Convict Prisons in Ireland; and, if so, whether such Bill will also contain a provision for transferring prisoners for the future, sentenced to periods over six months, to Convict Prisons to undergo their term of punishment?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that the subject was under the consideration of Government. A Bill was already in preparation which would have the effect of consolidating the present Prison Acts, and would provide more uniform treatment of prisoners. It would, however, depend upon the state of public business whether it could be introduced at an early period.

CATTLE PLAGUE—IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill to regulate the importation of foreign cattle into this country?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that a Bill had been prepared on the subject of the cattle plague, which would shortly be laid on the table. Its object was to continue the Acts of last Session, which would expire in August next, and to remedy some defects which experience had shown to exist in those Acts ; and also to embody Orders in Council, in order that they might at any time be put locally in force.

JAPAN—EUROPEAN TROOPS AT YOKUHAMA.—QUESTION.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What arrangements have been made with the Government of Japan relative to the European garrison at Yokuhama ; at what strength it is proposed that such garrison should be maintained ; whether it is intended to be permanent ; and whether there would be any objection to laying the Correspondence upon the subject upon the table of the House ?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the arrangements which had been made with the Government of Japan relative to the European forces stationed there, extended over a considerable period. It was, he thought, in January, 1864, that two companies of infantry were first landed there, and in May of the same year further reinforcements were applied for. Under the management of Sir Rutherford Alcock, our Minister there, the arrangements had been carried out with great good will, the Japanese Government undertaking to provide barrack accommodation. In March of last year the War Office informed Lord Clarendon that under existing circumstances it would not be prudent to leave less than a full regiment in Japan. Since that time the force had remained there without any demand from the Japanese Government for their withdrawal, or any intimation that their presence was objectionable. The arrangement was of a temporary character, but the strength of the force there must necessarily depend upon the state of the country. There were not many Papers on the subject, and he had no objection to lay them upon the table.

METROPOLIS GAS BILL. QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Metropolis Gas Bill before the Easter Recess ?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, the second reading of the Bill had been fixed for to-morrow, but it would be impossible to take it then. He had that day met a deputation at the Board of Trade, and had proposed to them that if it would satisfy the Gas Companies he was prepared to withdraw the first Bill and bring in another, leaving blanks for filling in the price and standard quality of the gas. He told the deputation that he would postpone the second reading of the present Bill till next Thursday, and if they should agree to his proposal he should then move that the Order for the present Bill be discharged, and should ask leave to bring in another, to be read a second time after Easter.

QUARANTINE AT SOUTHAMPTON. QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, on the 25th of January last, the Lords of the Privy Council issued an Order permitting Dr. Edward Seaton to go on board the vessels called the La Plata, Æolus, and Menelaus, under quarantine at the Motherbank, off the Isle of Wight, "without being in any way subject to the restraint of quarantine ;" and, if so, on what principle Dr. Seaton was privileged to forego the requirements supposed to be necessary for the security of the public health ?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, the occurrence alluded to by the hon. Baronet took place during the very cold weather in January last. Quarantine was not founded on the theory that it was necessary to stop the spread of yellow fever in cold weather, but rather to prevent injury to commerce. If a vessel arrived at Southampton from the West Indies with yellow fever on board, that port would be declared infected, and every vessel proceeding thence to foreign countries would be detained in quarantine. That would be injurious to commerce. Quarantine in this country was not a medical, but a commercial regulation. Dr. Seaton did go on board the vessels named ; but it was recognised by all foreign countries that medical officers had a right to board vessels in quarantine.

CESSION OF RUSSIAN AMERICA TO THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give any information as to the reported cession of Russian America to the United States; and, whether the Alentian Islands are included in the Russo American territory?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I have a telegram from St. Petersburg which in substance is to this effect, that official intelligence has been received of the purchase of the territory by the United States. I presume, therefore, that the arrangement is complete so far as the American Executive is concerned; but the House is of course aware that, by the constitution of the United States, a treaty requires to be confirmed by the Senate, and I have not yet heard that that confirmation has taken place. I am not able to state whether the Alentian Islands are included in the ceded territory. I should rather think not. I believe they are under the Government on the Asiatic side. But of that I am not quite certain.

REPORTS OF INSPECTORS OF CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWORTH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if there are any reasons why the Statistical Tables of the Reports of the Inspectors of Constabulary should not be alike in form; and, if not, whether he will give instructions for the Reports of the Northern and Southern Districts to contain similar Tables to the valuable ones supplied by the Inspector for the Eastern Counties, Midland, and North Wales Districts?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the Secretary of State for the Home Department has no control over the form in which these Returns are drawn up. They are certainly different in different parts of England, but I will make inquiry as to how uniformity can best be secured.

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN. QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE: I wish, Sir, to ask a Question of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, suggested by the extraordinary nature of the last Despatch written by the noble Lord to the Spanish Government. The Question I wish to put is, Whether the noble Lord will give the House any account or assurance of the state of our relations at this moment with the Spanish Government?

LORD STANLEY: All the correspondence that has passed between the Spanish Government and that of Her Majesty is in the hands of the House.

MR. OSBORNE: Has no answer been returned? ["Order!"] I wish to put this Question distinctly, and to have an answer without fencing. ["Oh!"] Yes. It is very important. I speak with reference to the last despatch of the noble Lord, in which a distinct threat is held out to the Spanish Government. I wish to know if the noble Lord has received any answer to that threat?

LORD STANLEY: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that if he expects from me a definite answer, he must first put a distinct Question. He has now done so, but certainly he did not in the first instance. My difficulty in replying to him was this:—We have at this moment two questions pending with the Spanish Government, one relating to the Tornado, and another relating to the Victoria. I presume the hon. Gentleman refers to the latter. Then, with regard to that case, I can say nothing more than what I have stated—that the whole Correspondence, as far as it has gone, is in the hands of the House. I have not yet received any answer to the last despatch which concludes the papers.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. GOSCHEN,
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped the House would consent to read the Bill a second time that night, and take the debate on going into Committee. That was the course which he found was approved by many hon. Members with whom he had spoken on the subject. It would enable them fully to debate the subject, and at the same time expedite the passing of the measure.

WAYS AND MEANS— THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

WAYS and MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, when my right hon. Predecessor last year made his Financial Statement, and offered to the House his Estimate of the amount of our income and expenditure, although the air was then apparently serene, we were on the verge of perhaps the most severe monetary disturbance and crisis that this country has ever experienced. It must therefore be a source of satisfaction to the right hon. Gentleman that his Estimates, tested by a trial of so extreme a character, should yet have proved the sagacity of his calculations; and it will not only be satisfactory to him, but I am sure to the whole House, when I tell them that notwithstanding the scenes of apparently extreme peril this country, as regards its financial condition, went through after that statement was made—notwithstanding the disasters experienced by the financial circles of this country—the consuming power of the country never for a moment flagged, and the results are of a nature which, whatever may be the anticipations of the House, will, I am sure, be a source of as much satisfaction as surprise.

Sir, the right hon. Gentleman estimated his income last year, for the year 1866-7 at £67,013,000, and the actual income amounted to £69,434,000, showing a surplus of £2,421,568, and this after a period of trial which, so far certainly as the monetary interests of this country are concerned, has seldom been equalled. But what is most gratifying is that this surplus has been acquired mainly and almost entirely under the heads of Customs and Excise—by the consumption of sugar, of tobacco, of malt, and of spirits. The right hon. Gentleman estimated his Customs last year at £20,923,000; they have realized £22,303,000, showing an increase of £1,380,000. He estimated his Excise at £19,665,000; it has realized £20,670,000, showing an increase of £1,005,000. The other items in his Estimate have been realized, but they call for no particular remark. As the Committee will see from the items I have given them, the surplus is almost accounted for by the increase in the Revenue of the year under the two heads of Customs and Excise. The estimated expenditure for the year 1866-7 was £67,031,000—including the sum of £369,000, Supplementary Estimates voted in the Session of 1867. The actual issues from the Exchequer during the year were £66,780,396. There has therefore been a saving effected of £251,000, so that the balance surplus of the year 1866-7 will amount to £2,654,172. This, of course, has exercised a very salutary influence on the balances of the Exchequer, which stand thus—on March 31, 1866, the balances in the Exchequer amounted to £5,851,314; and on March 31, 1867, to £7,294,151.

Sir, it will now be my duty to call the attention of the Committee to the expenditure for the present year 1867-8. I may mention, in the first place, that the Naval and Military Annuity granted to the Bank in 1823, which was designated at the time by Mr. Cobbett "the Dead Weight Annuity," and which has ever since borne that name, ceases, I believe, to-morrow. Though we shall have to provide a portion of that annual charge during the present year, that provision will be limited only to the last moiety, which is something under £300,000. The exact sum is £284,000. The estimated expenditure of the present year will stand in this wise—the interest on the Debt actually payable in the year, and providing for the completion of the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire for the conversion of the £5,000,000 of Debt, which, from circumstances to which I shall afterwards have to refer, is not yet completed—the total interest on the Debt actually payable, providing for that conversion, will be £26,000,000. The other charges on the Consolidated Fund will amount to £1,900,000. There is an increase—though a slight one—which arises from a change in the mode of meeting certain charges. Thus the salaries of the Masters of the Law Courts, which were formerly paid by fees, have been transferred to the Consolidated Fund, as the fees have been converted into stamps—the increased charges on the Consolidated Fund caused by this transfer will be balanced by the increased receipts under the head of Stamps. The Army Services, including the Supplementary Vote for £500,000, will amount to £15,253,000; the Navy Services will reach £10,926,000; the Civil Service, £8,203,000; the Revenue Departments, £5,045,000; the Packet Service, £807,000; making a total estimated expenditure for the year of £68,134,000.

I now proceed to state in what manner the income to meet these estimated charges is to be obtained. We estimate the Customs income for the year at £22,000,000. That is a diminution certainly upon what was received during the year just terminated; but there are special reasons, and which are to us apparently valid, for that estimate; there were exceptional circumstances concerning the consumption of sugar and rum last year, in consequence of the scarcity of barley, which very much affected the Revenue; and it would not be prudent to estimate the Customs at a higher figure than £22,000,000. The Excise we estimate at £20,700,000; Stamps (including £100,000 for Common Law Stamps), at £9,550,000; Taxes at £3,500,000; the Property and Income Tax, £6,000,000; Post Office, £4,650,000; Crown Lands, £340,000; and the Miscellaneous we put at £2,600,000. Under this last head there is an increase upon the previous year, which I think was £2,350,000; but there are items of a special character to the amount of £255,000 which will accrue this year. These are:—estimated balance of Common Law Fee Fund, released under the recent Act, after paying salaries, &c., £80,000; the Japanese indemnity, estimated share of Great Britain, after paying the other Powers, £68,000; constabulary fines and penalties from Ireland, the salaries being provided for the future in the Estimates, £70,000; and re-payments by the Post Office and Mint, and other charges connected with the Post Office Annuities, and Mint, re-payable to the Exchequer, £37,000. These justify us in placing the Estimate under the head "Miscellaneous" at £2,600,000. The total estimated income for the year will therefore be £69,340,000, as against an estimated expenditure of £68,134,000; and this will leave an estimated surplus of £1,206,000 for the ensuing year.

Now, Sir, it is extremely easy, in making the Financial Statement, to proceed to this point; but, having shown that we possess a surplus, our difficulties commence when we begin to consider how that surplus is to be dealt with. There can be no doubt that, leaving a moderate but sufficient balance, there is a sum, and not an inconsiderable sum, which may be applied to the general relief of the community. The question then arises in what manner this sum can be best applied in giving that relief. Of course, the first impulse of every mind under the circumstances would be to consider what taxes might be most advantageously remitted. I would, however, remind the House that the remission of taxation during the last ten years—I take that period because it dates from the termination of the Russian War—has been very considerable. Irrespective of the reduction in the Income Tax, which never stood at so low an amount as it does at the present moment—namely, 4*d.* in the pound—irrespective, I say, of the reduction in the Income Tax, the remission of taxation during the last ten years, over and above the amount of taxes that have been imposed during that period, has not been less than £11,000,000 per annum. When, therefore, we consider the great reduction of the Income Tax, and the other great remissions of taxation, it is not very surprising that it is difficult to fix on any particular tax of that extreme severity and apparent injustice that all minds will agree at once that the resources of the country should be directed to alleviate or remove it. There is, indeed, no tax at the present moment that injuriously affects the industry of any class of the community, except that affecting the industry of the producers of barley. I cannot avoid seeing that the incidence of the malt tax injuriously interferes with the industry of a considerable portion of the community. But to deal with that tax would involve a very large question. I have, indeed, in my generation, carefully considered this question, and I have shown no desire to evade the difficulties attending the re-adjustment of a system which, as it at present exists, injuriously and inequitably affects the industry of a considerable portion of Her Majesty's subjects. I have, however, come to the conclusion that it is impossible to deal with the malt tax, unless you do it in a very comprehensive and effectual manner. It is quite impossible, with the resources at my disposal, that I can deal with this tax in this manner. Putting aside the malt tax, there is no particular tax that can be particularly alleged to be one that unduly interferes with the industry of any portion of the community, or which from its severe and unequal pressure demands our immediate attention. There is no tax, of course, of which the removal or the reduction may not be vindicated and upheld by the most plausible reasons; but I maintain that, generally speaking, there is no particular tax—with the exception which I have acknowledged, and with which I confess my inability to deal—there is no tax which demands, before any other, special consideration or immediate attention.

Then, Sir, what is the next mode by which relief can be given to the general interests of the country? The next mode, of course, is the reduction of Debt. The attention of the Committee will be obviously directed to the consideration of that question. Now, it is impossible to deal effectively with the reduction of the National Debt, unless you do it by means of some specific sum which is charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and which is annually applied to that object. Of course, in considering the question of the reduction of the Debt, I do not want for a moment to advert to the existing law, by which occasional surpluses, when our account every quarter is periodically settled, are appropriated to the reduction of the National Debt. I take it for granted that no Gentleman on either side of the House wishes to interfere with the action of that law. It is founded on scientific principles, it is, as far as it goes, extremely useful and beneficial, and the effects of which have to a certain extent been satisfactory. But that is not a course of legislation by which we can deal on any large scale with such a question as the Public Debt. Now, if we admit that the only way of dealing effectively with the Public Debt is to deal with it by some specific amount which shall be charged upon the Consolidated Fund, there are only two modes by which we can operate. The first is by a charge of that character, voted annually, when the Financial Statement is made, the amount of which shall be employed in the purchase and cancelling of stock and other public securities—in short, what is called a Sinking Fund. Now, I have myself always looked with great disfavour upon that mode of operating on the Debt. I have always felt that, however sound might be the situation at the time when such a fund is established, whenever a strain should come upon our resources, such a fund would infallibly cease to operate. The last attempt made to establish a Sinking Fund upon this principle was made during the Russian war by the excellent Sir George Lewis; and I felt it my duty then to oppose the proposition. I was supported in that opposition by the right hon. Gentleman my predecessor—a rare and gratifying incident; but notwithstanding our united efforts, I am sorry to say we were completely defeated. But, Sir, Ministers—even those who are so popular as Lord Palmerston—are totally uninfluential in the long run against the inexorable logic of facts; and in a very short time there was no surplus to feed the Sinking Fund, and the only way in which the Sinking Fund could have been supplied would have been by the imposition of new taxes upon the community. That strain upon our resources which adversity brings, and which the right hon. Gentleman and myself had contemplated, did occur. I happened to be in that year, 1858, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I had the melancholy satisfaction of proposing to the House that the Sinking Fund should be terminated; and I think there never was a proposition which was agreed to with greater unanimity; because the House thought that to inflict upon the country new taxes at a moment when, like the present, there was considerable monetary disturbance and pressure—and that to the amount of £1,500,000—for the purpose of paying off debt, would be to involve ourselves in a ruinous and really silly proceeding; and I think that was the last effort which will ever be made to establish a Sinking Fund upon the old principle. However, there is another method by which the reduction of the Debt can be effected. The Committee are of course aware of it. You may grant Terminable Annuities, or you may even do better—you may convert Stock into Terminable Annuities; and that is a proceeding for which there are great facilities in this country, because the Government themselves are very great holders of Stock; they hold Stock to the amount of many millions on account of the savings banks and other interests. Last year the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) called our attention to this subject. He was impressed with the policy of dealing with the amount of our National Debt. He thought there having been a great remission of taxation for many years, that the time had arrived when we ought to consider whether our surplus revenue should not be employed to that object. Now, Sir, although the right hon. Gentleman, when he opened his scheme, commenced with a sneer at myself, in consequence of an expression which I had once used in regard to the Public Debt—but which I had never used in this House, and which therefore it was unnecessary for him to have taken notice of—

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he did not on that occasion allude to the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Well, I suppose my natural egotism induced me to appropriate the right hon. Gentleman's remark to myself. At any rate, I am responsible for using a very familiar expression regarding the Public Debt, though my respect for the House will not allow me to repeat it. I did answer a great booby on the hustings of my county, who quoted the great amount of our National Debt as a reason why we could not vindicate the honour of the country, or even defend its independence, that, compared with such considerations the Public Debt would be—I will not use the familiar expression—but that it might be compared to the incision of the most troublesome though not really the most unpopular of insects. Now, although the right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech with that quotation, which, with the egotism that influences all men, I really thought was intended for myself, because I was guilty of the phrase, I entirely approved of the policy which it enunciated. I thought it a wise policy and a sound policy. The measures which the right hon. Gentleman brought forward to effect that policy were numerous. In some instances I thought them unnecessarily complicated, and, further, that they attempted to deal with too great a space of time, and penetrated farther than it is necessary for Parliament to follow the scheme of a Minister. But these were small objections compared with the character of the policy itself, and I, and those with whom I act, entirely approved of that policy, and supported the right hon. Gentleman throughout.

I must now very succinctly call the attention of the Committee to the general character of those plans of the right hon. Gentleman; because one of them indeed very much affects—whatever may be the decision as to the proposals that I am going to make at the present moment—the state of our finances. The right hon. Gentleman proposed first to cancel Debt to the amount of £5,000,000 which we owe to some of the savings banks, by its conversion into an annuity, which was to terminate in the year 1885—eighteen years' time. One moiety of that £5,000,000 belonged to the Post Office savings banks, and the other moiety to the old savings banks. The measure was agreed to; but before it could be carried into operation very great changes had taken place in the monied world, to which I have already referred, and it became impossible at that time to carry out the original intention. But fortunately there was what was called a suspending power in that Act—the Chancellor of the Exchequer had discretion to suspend its operation, if necessary, and generally to act as circumstances would allow him for the completion of the scheme. Now the £2,500,000 that was applicable to the Debt owing to the Post Office savings banks was operated upon immediately; but there happened to be a considerable panic in the country, which caused a run upon the old savings banks, and the trustees of those savings banks did not feel justified in consenting to the conversion that was intended. They felt that, if the distrust continued to prevail, they might be called upon to realize other securities at greater loss and inconvenience than would result from realizing the stock which was to be converted—and at one time it even seemed probable that they would have had to fall back on the great debt that we owe to the savings banks, and which the right hon. Gentleman formerly explained to the House. But I am glad to say that we now live in different times—those circumstances have disappeared, or are fast disappearing; and I hope, and, in fact, feel confident, that we shall very soon be able to complete the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's plan—that which was agreed to—and I have accordingly made provision for it in the charges for the present year. It was necessary to advert to this in order to explain the amount of the interest of the Debt; but I think that the Committee may fairly assume—certainly for this evening in deciding upon our general policy—that the operation of the right hon. Gentleman will be completed.

The next operation proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was of a much more considerable character. He proposed to deal with no less than £24,000,000 of the Debt. It was an operation which would at once cancel that amount of debt by its conversion into annuities to terminate in 1885. That operation he termed "operation A;" and then by a second operation, which was described as "operation B," we were to deal with such amount of the Terminable Annuities as represented the capital advanced; and fresh conversions were fixed upon this part of the arrangement—the operations extending to a very long period—I think its final solution was not to occur until the year 1905. At that time I expressed my opinion that that part of the scheme appeared to me of too complicated a character for us to adopt, and one which would unnecessarily extend the sphere of legitimate financial operations. But those were criticisms which, after all, do not affect the principle of the measure. Although, however, neither of those measures of the right hon. Gentleman has really ever come into operation, it would be a great mistake to suppose that that fact was occasioned by any change in the Government. Her Majesty's Government entirely approved the general policy of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject; and, if circumstances had permitted it, although they might have slightly modified some of the secondary arrangements, they would have loyally attempted to carry it into effect. But very considerable changes occurred in our financial position; and when we acceded to office we found that the surplus upon which the right hon. Gentleman counted as the basis of his operations had been already considerably diminished; and circumstances were hourly occurring which created a further diminution or an almost entire absorption of it. There were the circumstances of the cattle plague, the distress of Irish railways, the battle of Sadowa, which brought about a complete revolution in our small arms, and other circumstances no doubt familiar to the Committee, which materially affected the surplus upon which the right hon. Gentleman had counted. The consequence was that it was quite impossible to proceed with that operation; and the House will perhaps recollect that on coming into office I made a statement on the subject, the fairness of which was not contested, and the policy of which was assented to by the right hon. Gentleman.

Now, Sir, I wish the Committee to consider to-night a proposition—the effect of a proposition—which I am going to make in reference to this large sum of £24,000,000, which is of a simpler description than that recommended to our notice last year by the right hon. Gentleman; but to the merits of which, if the proposition have any merits, the right hon. Gentleman is solely entitled. What I wish the Committee to consider is the effect of cancelling this debt of £24,000,000 by granting Terminable Annuities which shall cease in 1885; and which shall not be accompanied by any of those more complicated arrangements which would have extended it to the year 1905. Before, however, the Committee decide on the proposition which we recommend, perhaps they will allow me to give some figures which will be explanatory of the result, and without which they can scarcely come to a decision on the subject. It is necessary that the Committee should bear in mind that this sum of £24,000,000 consists of two amounts. One is a sum of £18,000,000, and the other of £6,000,000. The interest upon these two amounts is payable at different times in the year, summer and winter—on one in July and January, and on the other in October and April. The plan we wish the Committee to consider is this: we propose to convert the £18,000,000, now yielding an interest of £540,000 a year, into an annuity of about £1,332,000 per annum, terminating on the 5th of July, 1885, and payable half-yearly, the first quarter to be payable on the 5th of July, 1867. We propose to convert the £6,000,000, now yielding an interest of £180,000 a year, into an annuity, terminable on the 5th of April, 1885, of about £440,000, payable half-yearly—namely, on the 5th April and the 10th October, the first quarter to be payable in October, 1867. The total of both annuities will be £1,776,000. We have got an annuity, then, of about £1,776,000 by which to cancel this debt of £24,000,000. I wish to show to the Committee the amount of the annuity which will be payable in the present financial year. There will be one quarter payable on the 5th of July, 1867, on the annuity of £18,000,000, which will be £333,000, and a half-year on the 5th of January, 1868, on the same annuity, which will be £666,000. There will be, on the annuity for £6,000,000, a quarter payable on the 10th of October, 1867, amounting to £111,000. But we must add to our liabilities the interest of those two capital sums until the dates of conversion—making, firstly, for the one half-year on the £18,000,000 due the 5th of April, 1867, £270,000, and secondly, for the one half-year on the £6,000,000, due the 5th July, 1867, £90,000, being a total of £1,470,000. But then of course we must deduct from that sum the interest we are now paying during the year for the £24,000,000 stock debt, which amounts to £720,000—so that the total additional charge for 1867-8 will be £750,000.

It will be necessary, in the next place, that I should put before the Committee what will be the effect of this operation in its entirety, and therefore I must take the next year, and see what will be the complete charge on the Consolidated Fund when the whole shall be in operation for the entire year. The future annual charge will be £1,776,000, less of course by the amount of the annual interest we are now paying on the capital sums to be converted, which is £720,000. Therefore the increase of annual charge from 1868-9 up to 1885, when the annuity will cease, will be £1,056,000 per annum. But I must remind the Committee that the "Dead Weight Annuity" which amounts to £585,740, from which the country will now be totally freed, has to be deducted; and therefore, practically, the increase of annual charge by which we shall cancel this £24,000,000 of debt, will be a sum less than £500,000 a year. That is the proposition which we recommend to the Committee to adopt. It is a sensible and very considerable reduction of our Public Debt; amounting, coupled with the original measure which the right hon. Gentleman carried last year, and which I hope to bring to completion, to £29,000,000; and, practically, it will be effected, as far as £24,000,000 is concerned, by a charge less than £500,000 a year.

Now, Sir, if the Committee will, after consideration, adopt the measure we recommend, the surplus of the year will be reduced by the sum of £750,000, and there will still remain a surplus of £456,000. Now, under ordinary circumstances, if the balances in the Exchequer were in the same condition as they were in this time last year, I should not hesitate to recommend the Committee not to deal with that surplus. If our balances were £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 less, I do not think it would be wise to reduce a surplus of £456,000. But in the present state of our balances I think that we are justified in dealing with this portion of it. That portion cannot be very considerable; but the great point is to employ our resources in the manner which will be most effective, and which will give the most sensible relief to the community. Although the amount is not large, there are several modes by which it may be beneficially appropriated. After much consideration of the subject it appeared to Her Majesty's Government that the manner by which the most extensive relief could be given would be by dealing with the question of Marine Insurances. That is a portion of our fiscal system which has long been open to various objections, and to which all persons who are interested in the transactions of trade have frequently called the attention of the Government. The Committee are probably aware of the extremely complicated character of the law as at present existing in reference to the tax upon Marine Insurances. These duties are based upon the principle of a graduated scale, and in that scale there are a great many degrees. They commence by 3*d.* per cent, and they go as high as 4*s.* per cent. They are so framed that precisely as the premium is higher—that is to say as the danger is greater—the duty increases. Therefore you are really taxing risks and inflicting a penalty on the incurring of danger. Now, that is a principle which I cannot think the Committee will for a moment approve of. Moreover, the tax in its present form has led to great evasions; it is a great restriction upon commercial intercourse; and in an infinite variety of ways this complicated arrangement of the duties of Marine Insurances exercises a very baneful influence upon our general commercial intercourse. What we propose to do is—with one slight exception, which is rather of a technical than of a fiscal character—at least it is rather a technical than a fiscal reason which influences us—is to establish one uniform rate of Marine Insurance, and to fix it at the lowest amount which now prevails. Therefore you will have for all policies, whether they be time policies or voyage policies, a uniform rate of 3*d.* per cent, except in the case of time policies exceeding six months, the duty on which will be 6*d.* per cent. And the reason is that if that arrangement is not made no policies will be negotiated except time policies of the length of twelve months. Now the fact is that time policies for twelve months are not in accordance with the spirit of the age, nor the circumstances under which we live; and there is no reason why time policies, with the rapid communication at present at our command, should be for a longer period than six months. But, certainly, unless that increase is made with regard to time policies after six months, it will have an injurious effect upon all voyage policies; and therefore we recommend that, in establishing what we wish to make a uniform rate, that exception should be sanctioned, with the conviction that after a short time the fashion of time policies for twelve months will become a thing of the past.

Now, Sir, I have informed the Committee of the state of our finances and our surplus, and the mode in which we recommend the Committee to deal with that surplus. [An hon. MEMBER: What is the amount of the reduction of the Marine Insurance?] It will cost about £210,000; and will leave a surplus of £246,000, not an excessive, but, I believe, an adequate surplus, considering the state of the finances and the general condition of the country.

I have placed before the Committee the present general state of our affairs, and the mode in which we recommend them to deal with this surplus. But there are one or two other points which I ought to mention to the Committee or rather remind them of. They are aware, of course, that the tea duties annually expire in August, and that the Income Tax expires within twenty-four hours. It will therefore be necessary for me to take these Votes this evening, and the Committee, I apprehend, will make no difficulty in their renewal. In November of this year, and in March of next year, Exchequer Bonds to the amount of £1,700,000 will become due, but we recommend them to be renewed. The floating debt of the country is very small, and it is really for the public convenience that they should be so renewed, and it is not with reference to any financial operation that I recommend it to-night, but because I think that, under any circumstances, it would be politic to renew them.

Sir, I believe I have now informed the Committee of everything, and I hope they will approve of the propositions we have made for the reduction of the Debt. I am not myself an alarmist in public affairs. I do not awake in the morning believing that the country is going to be involved in a great European War. I have great confidence in the sagacity with which our affairs are managed by my noble Friend (Lord Stanley), and I hope that any expectations that are afloat in the air may not be fulfilled; but it is impossible to shut our eyes to what is passing around us—to the state of Europe. The state of Europe is remarkable—it is at present an armed camp; and although I trust and feel confident that, so long as my noble Friend retains the management of our Foreign Affairs, we certainly shall not be involved in any unnecessary war, still at this time, when we are speculating on the fortunes and destinies of the nation, it is impossible to shut our eyes entirely to contingencies which, however improbable, may occur; and certainly I think that, if a Chancellor of the Exchequer is called upon to go into the market to raise money, he will walk with a prouder mien, and experience greater facilities in raising money, if it can be shown that in the day of our prosperity we have made an honourable and an honest attempt to reduce the amount of our National Debt. [Cheers.] I hope I may construe that expression of feeling on the part of the Committee as sanctioning the measures which the Government have recommended to them, and with that observation, I will take the liberty of placing in your hands, Sir, this formal Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1867 until the 1st day of August 1868 on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland, viz. s. d.

MR. CANDLISH said, he would take the earliest opportunity of thanking the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his proposed reduction of the duty on marine policies. Considering its amount there was no tax that acted so prejudicially to the trade of the country, and was so anomalous in its character, as the marine insurance duty. The right hon. Gentleman by this change was rendering great service to the commercial marine of the country. He would also congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the simplicity, and quiet, unassuming character of his Budget, and the extreme good sense in which it had been conceived. He ventured to say that it would commend itself to the general acceptance of the House.

MR. LALING said, that was not the time to enter into any detailed discussion of the measures which had just been submitted to the Committee; but as the principle of the reduction of the National Debt had been discussed at such great length last year, he thought it advisable to offer a few words of warning on the subject. He would not then offer a decided opinion upon the proposition which had just been made to the Committee in reference to the Debt, because it was one that required very great consideration before the House committed itself to its adoption. A nation, like a landed proprietor when he found himself embarrassed with a heavy debt, might adopt either of two principles in dealing with its liabilities. It might proceed to get rid of the debt, either by paying off part, while the value of the estate remained the same, or he might continue to pay the interest keeping the amount of the debt the same while he employed the surplus revenue in improving the value of the estate. In this country we had proceeded for a long series of years on the latter principle; and that principle was summed up in a few words by the late Lord Sydenham, when he said that "the money of the country should be left to fructify in the pockets of the people." The practical result of that system might be seen by contrasting our present state with that of 1815, at the termination of the great war; the income of the country had increased three or fourfold, while the charge for the National Debt had slightly diminished. He wished to point out that the proposed system of temporary annuities to a certain extent involved the principle of a sinking fund. What was a temporary annuity after all but a compulsory sinking fund? It differed from an ordinary sinking fund in this—that being unable to trust their own virtue they pledged themselves to their creditors. Several inconveniences were inseparable from such a mode of proceeding. First, it was a more expensive way of paying them off than the simple straightforward process of going into the market and buying up whatever the amount of surplus revenue permitted. In the next place, as being a compulsory sinking fund it was open to the objection that it created engagements that must be met, although circumstances might have completely changed in the meantime. In the instances referred to by the right hon. Gentleman of money being borrowed for the Crimean war, if instead of applying the sinking fund, they had applied terminable annuities, they would have found themselves in exactly the same position—in the first year in which there was not a surplus they would have been obliged to put on increased taxes or borrow money. He merely pointed it out because the objection was certain to be raised when they came to consider the principle of the measure. With reference to the alleviation of the burdens of the people, he did not think they had yet arrived at that millennium in which there were no bad taxes to reduce. On the contrary, the discussions which had taken place respecting fire insurance made it obvious they clearly were not in that position; and the discussions of last year on the post-horse duty, and other taxes of that description, showed there were still taxes which pressed heavily on the humble classes of the community, and which ought to be taken into consideration, when there was a surplus to dispose of. He reserved his opinion whether the whole or a portion of the present surplus, instead of being applied to the reduction of our National Debt by the establishment of temporary annuities, should not go to a further reduction of our present taxation.

MR. MARSH congratulated the Committee on the very flourishing state of the revenue, notwithstanding the panic and the deficient harvest, from which the nation had suffered severely. He also congratulated the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the improved method of keeping accounts, under which fees which used to be paid to officers of Chancery and others were now to be paid to the Exchequer, and the salaries paid out of the Consolidated Fund. This was a step in the right direction, and there were other parts of our financial system in which similar changes might be made with advantage. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) that there were many taxes still in existence which were very disagreeable and ought to be removed at the first opportunity. Some he thought actually did more harm than was compensated for by the revenue which they produced. In this class the licenses might be included. They were most objectionable. The tea licence caused that article to be sold dearer, whilst the Exchequer got very little by it, and the purchaser of a glass of sherry wine at a confectioner's, paid 700 per cent more for it than he ought in consequence of the licence.

MR. DENMAN said, he rose merely to state the course he intended to pursue with reference to the Bill now pending (the Attorney's, &c., Certificate Duties Bill) the second reading of which was adjourned a few nights ago. He did not wish to interfere with the chorus of approbation with which the Budget just disclosed had been greeted, beyond saying that he looked upon it as a grand testimonial to the success of the financial measures proposed during late years by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he never could consent to consider a Budget as entirely satisfactory which made a portion of its surplus depend upon the continuance of an unjust and oppressive tax. He would have preferred leaving the surplus at £156,000 rather than £246,000, for it was perfectly certain that in the course of the year there would, owing to the elasticity of our commerce, again be an ample surplus in hand, and an unjust and oppressive tax of £90,000 a year might have been given up at once. He should consult those of the profession most interested in the Bill with regard to the course proper to be pursued in relation to it; and if they were so enamoured of the Budget as to think that it ought not to be interfered with, even to the extent required to do them justice, he should not press the Bill forward in the present Session, otherwise he should name a convenient day for proceeding with the discussion on the second reading of the Bill in question.

MR. WHITE said, he regretted he was unable to express his concurrence in the approbation which the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman had already elicited from the House. Its great blot was that it began by asking from the people £2,000,000 more than was disbursed last year. He had on several previous occasions protested against the magnitude of the expenditure proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had often urged on him the necessity of practising the economy he habitually inculcated. He must say that the present Government beginning by inaugurating so large an increase in the national expenditure led naturally to the inference that they were not merely indifferent, but absolutely adverse to public economy. In following the financial policy of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman had also imitated his eminent predecessor in his estimate of the incoming revenue of the current year. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) used systematically to under-estimate the amount of the revenue, his desire being to apply as large a surplus as he could to the reduction of the National Debt. This was no doubt a very laudable ambition; but he (Mr. White) would rather the funds appropriated to such an object should be derived from a diminished expenditure than from an increased draft on the industry and earnings of the people. With regard to the proposed reduction of the Marine Insurance Duty, he thought it would be better to abolish it altogether. By the Finance accounts for the year ending the 31st March last he found the net produce of the Marine Insurance Duty was £472,561 8s. 6d., and seeing what a large amount of Marine Insurances were effected abroad, he was convinced that the total abolition of the duty would lead to a vast augmentation of the underwriting business of this country. Again, our tariff was still disfigured by several duties which ought to be abolished. According to a recent Return he found, for instance, that the gross revenue derived from a duty of 1d. per pound on almond paste was £1. From the same rate of duty on dried cherries £7, and comfits £9, the duty on the latter must, however, be retained, on account of the present scale of sugar duties. He (Mr. White) did not hesitate to express his conviction that it would have been much more conducive to the prosperity of the country had the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the immediate abolition of all duties on coffee, cocoa, chocolate, currants, raisins, and other dried fruits, instead of the Budget which was now so favourably received by both sides of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he considered that the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the reduction of the National Debt left the House in the same difficulty as they were placed in by the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year. He agreed in what had been said by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) that these complicated plans of terminable annuities and so forth resolved themselves into nothing more nor less than a sinking fund, which he (Sir George Bowyer) regarded as an awkward and inconvenient way of paying debts. They could not get 1s. more out than they put in. What, he asked, would be the result of the extinction of the £24,000,000 in eighteen years? Why, simply that there would be a surplus of something more than £1,500,000. But they had very nearly got this now; so that it was in reality as broad as it was long. It seemed to him that the more advantageous plan would be to pay the money over manfully at once, and thereby extinguish so much debt. He thought there were many taxes which might be reduced without detriment to the revenue; and one of these was the duty on fire insurances. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that in the event of a war the then Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to go into the money-market with greater advantage on account of this arrangement for the prospective extinction of the Debt than he could otherwise do. He (Sir George Bowyer) could not see this ; as it appeared to him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have a better chance of borrowing money if he could say, " We have £1,000,000 surplus available now," than if he said, " Eighteen years hence £24,000,000 of debt will be extinguished." What were £24,000,000 in comparison to the whole amount of the Debt? They were really not a bit more than the bite of that insect which had been referred to on a former occasion by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman dealt with a very serious matter in a very trifling way. It reminded him, in fact, of the proposal of the schoolboy who, hearing people say what a dreadful thing the National Debt was, said he would gladly give half his pocket money towards paying it off. He was unable to see any merit in the proposed arrangement. In the event of a war breaking out, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be able to borrow money more advantageously than if these prospective reductions of the National Debt had not been determined on ; but, on the contrary, he would then have reason to regret that he had pledged himself to this increased annuity. Indeed, the scheme was worse than the old Sinking Fund, which might be given up at any time when necessary, and the surplus revenue taken. In the present instance, however, a pledge was made to give up the surplus revenue for eighteen years ; and even if a war broke out, the arrangement could not be changed.

MR. HUBBARD said, the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's statement had given him unmixed satisfaction. Last year it was his duty to call the attention of the House to the exceeding demerit of the tax upon marine insurances ; and he hailed with great satisfaction the announcement that the tax was to be equalized and reduced to a minimum. Here, however, his satisfaction stopped. He regretted to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had re-produced a portion of his predecessor's last year's financial proposals, touching the terminable annuities. He (Mr. Hubbard) could not but express his deliberate disapproval of any sort of plan for reducing the National Debt while we had taxes pressing upon the industry and the prudence of the country, such as the duty upon fire insurances. When the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) proposed that the House should repeat for almost the tenth time its condemnation of that obnoxious tax, he (Mr. Hubbard) had taken the liberty of interposing, and begging the hon. Gentleman, out of courtesy to the new holder of the financial seals, not to press his Motion. He did so because he could not think it possible that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having in mind the numerous times the House had pronounced its views, could delay obedience to them, if any opportunity were offered of dealing with the impost. An opportunity had now arrived. We had a surplus of more than £1,000,000 ; and that surplus would more than exterminate the tax. Its original amount was £1,600,000 ; but half had been abolished. There had, no doubt, since been an increase ; but he believed that the present produce of the duty would not exceed £900,000. There was not a man in that House — there was not an economist in the country—who had not pronounced this tax, both in practice and in principle, to be one of the most mischievous that was ever devised. Although it was true that in time of war or pressure the House might be obliged to maintain, or even to impose, taxes which were injurious, it was " a new and horrible thing " to pretend to reduce the National Debt by such means. The fire insurance duty was a tax, not upon the rich, but upon the middle and poorer classes, who could not afford to run the risk of fire ; and it ought not to be continued for any such purpose as paying off £1,000,000 out of a debt of £800,000,000. He should therefore at a fitting opportunity feel it his duty to move a Resolution to the effect that, until the fire insurance duty is abolished, or considerably reduced, this House is not prepared to enter upon the consideration of any mode of reducing the National Debt.

MR. GLADSTONE : Mr. Speaker—Although, Sir, it is the general rule of the House that those Members who have the advantage of hearing the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should postpone the declaration of any final judgment upon them, yet there are two reasons which make me desirous to address you on the present occasion. One is, that I think the simple character of the statement which has been so clearly submitted to us by the right hon. Gentleman makes it easier than under other circumstances it might have been to appreciate the nature of his proposals ; and secondly, he has referred so pointedly to a portion of the scheme which it was my duty to submit to the House last year, that I think, not feeling myself incompetent to do so, it is only fair that I should give him at once the opinion which I form on the proposals he now makes. With respect to the retrospective part of that proposal I shall be very brief; but I will venture to refer to one or two points on which it is possible that the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to give us further information. He did not enter upon any details with respect to the sources from which the great increase in the revenue from the Customs and Excise during the year 1866-7 has proceeded; and I confess that I should be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman had given us the particulars, which I feel could not fail to be full of interest. The case of the Excise is, indeed, a very remarkable one, and well deserves the special attention of the House. I think the right hon. Gentleman stated at £900,000 the amount of augmentation which has taken place in the revenue of the Excise over and above the Estimate submitted last year. Now, Sir, I think these figures are among the most extraordinary that have ever been submitted to the House of Commons—and particularly on account of the singularly unfavourable character which the season of last year assumed, at the most critical moment, with regard to the yield and especially with regard to the quality of the barley harvest, upon which commonly it may be reckoned—at least, it has in former times been reckoned—the malt tax will depend to the extent of £500,000 or £1,000,000. To judge from the gross figures before us, and from such fragmentary information as has reached me, I am under the impression that, notwithstanding the exceedingly unfavourable character of the weather of last August and September, which seemed in a great degree, in many parts of the country, not so much to damage as almost to destroy the barley crop for malting purposes, yet I apprehend we must be in the condition of having received from the article of malt a revenue as large as, or probably even larger than, we ever have received in any former year. If so, this is a circumstance of very great interest and importance, for it seems to show that the consuming power of the community, even in regard to this, which the right hon. Gentleman seems to consider rather persecuted article, has reached such a point that beer must be brewed whether there is a fine barley harvest or not, and that the brewers, partly availing themselves of the resources opened to them by foreign barley, of which a considerable portion is of high quality—and partly falling back on sugar and other materials, produce, even in a year of a very bad barley harvest, an amount of malt duty not less than that obtained in former years, even with the advantage of a very good barley harvest. It would be extremely interesting to be assured of this satisfactory circumstance, because it implies the removal of an element of very great and perplexing uncertainty which has always had to be encountered in calculating the revenue of the country. I presume, also, there must have been a considerable increase in the revenue from spirits, and consequently that the present working of the very high duties imposed for fiscal purposes may be judged, as far as present experience goes, to be satisfactory. With respect to Stamps, I observe that the actual revenue appears to have fallen slightly short of the Estimate submitted by me about twelve months ago. I shall be glad to know, if the right hon. Gentleman happens to have the information at hand, what are the items to which the shortcoming is to be attributed. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The total is only £20,000 short.] The total deficiency is only £20,000; but although not in the same degree as the revenue from Customs and Excise, yet of late years the revenue from Stamps has exhibited a remarkable elasticity; and this year, as I am reminded, there ought to be some receipts from the Courts of Justice Stamps above those included in my Estimate. I shall be glad to know what has been the actual result of our financial operations with regard to the Fire Insurance Duty. My hon. Friend who has just sat down (Mr. Hubbard) still apparently clings to that phantom expectation for which he has always had a great attachment, and for which some hon. Members have had a greater and warmer attachment. I mean, that a great reduction of the Fire Insurance Duty could in a great degree be compensated for by an augmentation in the number of insurances. [Mr. HUBBARD: I never said such a thing in my life.] My hon. Friend said just now that he anticipated that the revenue had been increased some £100,000 in consequence of the diminution of the duty; and therefore my hon. Friend has, not only in his life, but within a very recent portion of his life, said something which I, perhaps, put rather strongly—possibly more strongly than the form of expression justified—but something which indicated an expectation that a very considerable increase of revenue had followed the reduction of the duty. It would be important and interesting that even now or on a future occasion we should be favoured with the exact figures of the right hon. Gentleman, because it is now two or three years since the first reduction of the Fire Insurance Duty was made, and the case can now be put completely before us. As far as my knowledge goes, there was no reason to suppose that the revenue from Fire Insurance Duty would be in so great or considerable degree replaced by the effect of a reduction, when you distinguish between the increase due to that reduction and the regular annual progressive increase which the wealth of the country necessarily produces. The right hon. Gentleman has been able to present to the Committee a most favourable statement of the condition of the country with respect to its financial resources. I consider that one of the most remarkable results of the great change we have passed through with respect to our commercial legislation and the liberty which has been given to the operations of trade has been, that along with a vast increase in the scale of those operations there has been an almost equal increase in their steadiness. It is not that the spirit of speculation is less active than in former times; but if there be a peculiarity of the present time, it seems to be this—that whereas in former times, when what is called a panic occurred, and commercial men experienced a period of pressure, the effect of that pressure was felt in the diminution of the consuming power of the country, and, consequently, in the diminution of the revenue, in a manner which we have now the greatest difficulty to realize. We now seem to pass through years of great and serious difficulty—years like the two last—without their appearing to leave the smallest trace upon the consuming power of the country or upon the revenue which is its produce. That is a circumstance of the greatest possible consolation, and it should encourage us to go forward in the path which we have for so many years been pursuing. I will not dwell at any length upon the subject to which the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) referred. I do not contemplate with satisfaction the augmentation of the Estimates for the present year. The Supplies which were voted last year, the demands for which were laid on the table twelve months ago, amounted to £38,205,000, including the Army, Navy, Civil, Miscellaneous, Packet, and Revenue Estimates. If I have put the figures together accurately, the present Estimates for the same classes amount to £40,234,000, which represents an increase of £2,029,000. It is not upon an occasion like this that this augmentation can be duly analysed, or that the grounds of the claims for such increased expenditure can be discussed. Far less would it be upon an occasion like this, so far as I am concerned, that any endeavour should be made to impart a political aspect to such a discussion. But, speaking generally, I own I do not think the circumstances of the country such as to warrant this very serious additional outlay. I know that on many points it is impossible to question those charges without joining issue in the most serious manner with Her Majesty's Government, and there are particular reasons at the present moment in the gravity of the political issues that are pending why every man must desire not to multiply, but rather to reduce and diminish, those points on which the House, or any portion of it, may be in conflict with the Advisers of the Crown. Certainly, in view of these circumstances, I, for one, should be and am disposed to examine more slightly those particulars than I should be disposed to do in the circumstances of an ordinary year. Some of these augmented charges have reference to purposes of great importance, and I would even venture to hope there are among them items in respect to which discussion in this House may lead to a diminished demand. For the present, however, it is not my intention to go beyond those general observations. I will therefore pass on to consider the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to deal with the surplus at his command. That surplus, I calculate, is £1,206,000. I may be permitted to observe—not in the way of criticism of what has fallen from him—that nearly the whole of that surplus would actually have been applied during the year 1867-8 to the liquidation of the Debt had the plans of last year taken effect. An Act which was passed early in the year, if carried out to its full extent during 1867-8, would have applied about £150,000 to the liquidation of the Debt in the form of terminable annuities. A greater measure which was pending at the time we quitted office, and which the right hon. Gentleman found himself, owing to augmented charges, obliged to drop, would have entailed, if I remember rightly, for the year 1867-8, a charge of about £1,000,000. Consequently, the whole of the money with which we have to deal is money which, if these plans had been carried forward to their consummation from the time they were introduced, would actually have been disposed of for the purpose indicated. I would depart from the order pursued by the right hon. Gentleman, and deal first with that portion of the surplus which he proposes to apply to the reduction of the Marine Insurance Duty. Undoubtedly, there are a large number of imposts, a list of which it is impossible to survey without feeling a strong desire that it may be in our power, from time to time, to apply to them the beneficial effects of growth in the revenue, and so gradually mitigate the burdens or remove them altogether. I, for one, cannot except to what is said by those who point out that licence duties are among those which it would be most desirable to reduce, and in some cases remove, and altogether and among these especially the duties upon locomotion. In point of fact, they tax, at its very root, the whole raw material of labour, because the movement of the industrial portion of our population from place to place is an essential portion of the cost of production; and these taxes are, therefore, more analogous to the taxes upon the raw material of industry than I think all or any of the other taxes to which allusion has been made. I can assure my hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) that I am no admirer of the Duty upon Fire Insurance. All I plead for is that when we deal with that duty—not the part of it which relates to stock-in-trade, but that which relates to buildings—we should remember how closely that duty is associated with property, and should consider this element of the question along with others—the possibility, if we part with it, of obtaining a fair substitute from property in some less objectionable form. I cannot help thinking that if there be a widely spread and earnest desire in the House to make with respect to the Fire Insurance Duty—not that sort of reduction which we sometimes make in order to obtain an augmentation of revenue—but a root-and-branch reduction, so that the act of insurance should no longer be felt to be a sensible burden—if the House were disposed to take that view of the matter, and at the same time were indisposed to grant to property remissions that might be fairly claimed by trade and labour, it would not be difficult to devise some arrangement which would enable them to attain that end. The cases adduced by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) do not awaken in my mind so much emotion as they have stirred up in his. Nothing, I admit, can be more ridiculous than to read a list of trifling and trumpery articles, happily now very short, on which the duty is still continued, and, at first sight, nothing can be more absurd than to levy £9 a year upon comfits. But then these duties are not to be considered alone; they must be looked on as outworks and defences of great branches of the Customs revenue. What would be the effect of abolishing the duty on comfits? There would be a most enormous increase in the importation of comfits? You would be able to put them into your tea and coffee, and use them there with just as much satisfaction as we now use the article called sugar. Sugar would, in fact, come to us under the name of comfits. Whether, in proposing to reduce the duty on Marine Insurances, the right hon. Gentleman has made the very best choice among the many claims which present themselves, I cannot undertake to determine. But I think these two points may be safely assumed. In the first place, a great deal is due to the initiative of the Government, and to the superior means which the Government must possess for making a selection among many competing claims in the application of a surplus revenue. In the second place, unquestionably, the duty with which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to deal, whether it be or be not the most exceptional upon the list, is a duty which urgently calls for revision. So far as I am concerned, I have not the smallest intention of entering into any controversy upon that point, but shall thankfully accept the very simple, and at the same time the very effective proposal of the right hon. Gentleman respecting this duty, which is totally indefensible in its present form. Then the right hon. Gentleman proposes to leave himself a surplus of £246,000, and I earnestly hope that the House will not countenance any invasion of that moderate sum. My hon. Friend (Mr. White) says I have a habit of systematically underestimating the revenue of the country. Now, if my hon. Friend will only travel back to a period when there was, unfortunately, a greater pressure upon our resources than there now is, and when in certain instances the actual revenue fell short of my Estimates, he will find that at that period I was more than once accused of systematically over-estimating the produce of various branches of the revenue. The truth is that a very salutary practice prevails in estimating revenue—I mean, that of paying very great respect to the opinions and judgment of the able and experienced gentlemen who are at the head of the revenue departments. I say of myself, and I should say of any Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is not wise that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, either of this day or of any day, should take too much into his own hands the business of estimating revenue. You must proceed upon fixed rules, and these cannot be well propounded or applied without a great and determining regard to the judgment of those who are at the head of your Revenue departments. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman has been guided in the Estimates he has submitted to us to-night by just and sound principles; and I am quite sure it would not be wise in us to undertake upon our own responsibility and imperfect information to question these Estimates for the purpose of throwing the right hon. Gentleman into a deficit by our eagerness to deal with some of the taxes which still press upon us. Regarding the £210,000, then, which is to be applied in the reduction of the duty on Marine Insurances and the £246,000 of surplus as fixed points, I come to the measure by which the right hon. Gentleman will dispose of the principal part of his surplus—a fresh investment in those terminable annuities originally created by Sir George Lewis, which will come to an end in 1885. Here I must say—and I say it in no spirit of complaint—I think that in all probability the right hon. Gentleman has exercised a sound discretion in liberating himself from that portion of the measure of last year—which may be called the secondary portion—which dealt with the fruits of the reduction to be effected by the primary portion, and which ranged over a longer period. If I had been able to deal with the measure of last year, I think it is very probable that the same result would have happened. Parliament is justified in saying with regard to such a measure, “Do not take the question too much or too long out of our view. Come back to us when you are prepared to recommend a further adjustment of national income to national debt; but do not ask us for too much at a time.” I have no complaint to make of the right hon. Gentleman on that score, and think that, upon the whole, he has taken the wise course. But now comes the question—Is the basis of his measure just and sound? Here I must say that I have undergone no change in the opinions I held last year, and, moreover, I must express the conviction that of the objections which were stated by several hon. Members last year, and which have been re-stated to-night, a large portion arise from want of minute and accurate acquaintance with the subject, which is of a complicated character, and upon the complications of which the merits of the case really depend. My hon. Friend the Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) is a Gentleman to whose speeches, in regard to financial questions especially, we always listen with the greatest advantage. But I differ from him in what he has said to-night. He tells us there are two systems which he places in contrast one with another, and with regard to which he leaves his own preference not a subject of much doubt. One of these systems is, diminishing your debt; the other is, leaving the money with which you would otherwise diminish debt to fructify for the benefit of the nation through the reduction of taxation. Now it appears to me that that is not a just or a true statement of the case, and that when you talk of the “fructification” of money—I accept the term, which is originally due to very high authority—for the public advantage, there is none much more direct and more complete than that which the public derives from money applied to the reduction of debt. For what becomes of that money? It is not sent to the moon—it is not exported from the country. It finds its way into the money-market of London, and that is the point whence loanable capital finds its way to the most direct and profitable employment in cheapening production and stimulating industry. In my opinion, therefore, it is an entire fallacy to suppose that the question lies between the diminution of debt and allowing your capital to fructify. I contend, on the contrary, that there is no surer method of promoting an immediate and profitable application of capital than by reducing debt. Of course, that proposition would require to be modified under given circumstances. Suppose, for instance, this was a country with a National Debt held mainly by foreign creditors. The question then would assume a different aspect. But in our own case, our National Debt being held in overwhelming proportion by Englishmen, the money applied in reducing that debt will take its first start in London, where it is paid ; [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Then why reduce the debt at all?] and I think the proposition may be broadly laid down that such an application of money is immediately profitable, not merely with regard to the commercial and political stability which you acquire by pursuing such a course in finance, but with reference strictly to the industrial pursuits of the country. Then, my hon. Friend (Mr. Laing) says this measure involves the principle of a sinking fund, and my hon. Friend (Sir George Bowyer) dwells much more strongly and with less limitation upon that point, no doubt because he has not studied the subject of a sinking fund so carefully as my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Laing). Now, I deny that in its ordinary and usual application this measure involves the principle of a sinking fund at all. I cannot justify this denial now, because to do so would require a very long and minute statement. But the essential point in our condition, which relieves a measure of this kind at the present day from the objections applicable to the sinking funds of former times, is that we not only have an Exchequer account, but a great banking account to manage. That banking account is commonly in a surplus, even when the Exchequer is in a deficit. Under no circumstance is it likely, except in the exigencies of war—a general war—that both those accounts should be in a deficit together ; and I will undertake to prove that setting aside the contingency of a deficit so arising, there cannot be the loss of one single farthing from the operation of the measure proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. It is much too complicated to go through the several cases. The essential point to be kept in view is that your banking account is one upon which you have a steady and a uniform surplus, upon the continuance of which you may pretty confidently reckon ; that you are always looking for investments of that surplus from year to year ; that those annuities afford the means of making such investments ; and that the profit of your banking account is, in point of fact, your own profit, because it is as much a business carried on for the benefit of the State as any branch of the national revenue. I do not pretend to have proved this proposition. I am only stating the effect which a close investigation of the case will, I believe, produce upon the minds of hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) challenges the whole policy of reduction. He says, "Why reduce the debt at all?" Well, that likewise opens a very wide question ; but I hope that, without pretending to aim at as wide a discussion of that question as it deserves, I may call the attention of the House to a half-sheet Return, No. 69 of the present Session, which contains matter of considerable importance in relation to this point. It may, however, be enough for the present purpose to stand upon this basis—that the reduction of the Debt has been recognised in this country as a principle of public policy ever since our Debt began to be created—with the exception, of course, of those unfortunate periods when we were obliged to go on adding to it ; and that reduction was sought to be effected in two modes—first, by the application of surplus revenue, and secondly, by means of terminable annuities. A principle of policy so established and recognised has something to say for itself even independently of the abstract argument. I may assume that the House of Commons does not intend to reverse that policy. I may, at any rate, throw on my hon. Friend the burden of proof, and say, "Why not reduce your debt?" The Legislatures and Administrations of this country have established this policy as right ; and let us now see how it has been acted on. From 1834 onwards a regularly increasing sum has been applied to the reduction of the Debt by the fixed operation of law through the medium of terminable annuities. In 1834 a sum of £2,076,000 was so applied. The amount increased progressively ; in 1855-6 it passed £3,000,000, and in 1858-9 it was nearly £3,500,000. Then fell in the terminable annuities. In the year 1860-1 we paid only £1,292,000 ; but the payment of 1865-6 was raised to £1,673,000. And now in this year with which the right hon. Gentleman has to deal falls in the "dead weight"—a sum in round numbers of £600,000 ; and if no endeavour is made to replace it, it amounts to very nearly an abandonment of our policy, and is as much as saying that we will adopt no means for a reduction of our Debt, except the application of the casual surplus of revenue. The occasion does not admit of lengthened argument ; but I will quote an example which I think the House will do well to bear in mind ; and I say, let us not be ashamed to follow a good example, find it where we may ;—let us not be ashamed to cross the Atlantic and to render a just tribute of admiration to the courage and forethought with which the American people are at this moment bearing a burden of taxation which, both in amount and in kind, makes their conduct a marvel, because they think that the true secret of their future power lies in the steady and rapid reduction of their Debt. Sir, I think that the authority of the British Legislature so adopted—repeated and echoed from the other side of the Atlantic—has a weight which it is very difficult to resist. At any rate, it is worth while to consider what the Americans have really done. The American debt reached its highest point on the 31st of August, 1865, when the total amounted to 2,757,000,000 dollars. Immediately after it reached that point the process of reduction was commenced ; and on the 30th of June, 1866, it had been reduced to 2,650,000,000 dollars. By the 31st of October, 1866, it was reduced to 2,551,000,000 dollars ; and by the 1st of January, 1867, to 2,543,000,000 dollars. Thus the total decrease of the debt between the 31st of August, 1865, and the 1st of January, 1867, was 214,500,000 dollars, or very nearly £43,000,000, all taken out of the taxation of the country in a period of sixteen months. And, Sir, I must say, passing by the argument of my hon. Friend, when I see such facts I am infinitely more impressed with the greatness of that people, and with the formidable character of the conflict which we or any other country would have to sustain upon entering into conflict with them, than if, instead of thus applying their resources, they had idly and vainly imagined that the secret of their security lay in endeavouring to maintain huge armaments in time of peace. I believe they judge rightly in the calculation they have made—and made deliberately—with regard to the true basis of national power, that their means ought to be husbanded and saved in ordinary times, but should be developed freely and without stint in periods of emergency. Therefore, so far from assenting to the doctrine of my hon. Friend that we should not reduce our Debt, I cherish the hope that this magnificent example set by the American people will have an effect not only in England but in Europe, and will shame the nations of the Continent into an abandonment of that suicidal policy by which they are wasting the resources created by the thrift and industry of the people in what is either an idle parade or, worse, a source of positive danger ; because to be ready with the means of conflict is, perhaps, the very course which may tend to render conflict itself possible. These are the feelings with which I cannot help contemplating the policy of America with regard to the reduction of the National Debt ; and I am sure that the sentiment of this House would be to convey, if we could, to the American people and their able Minister of Finance, Mr. M'Culloch, our hearty congratulations on what he has achieved, and our best wishes that he may long continue with the same vigour and prudence thus wisely to apply the resources of his country. Not that we can expect a continuance of the same extraordinary and unheard-of measures by which so much has been already done, for human nature can hardly stand such a strain ; but I trust that the American people may persevere in the vigorous prosecution of the decision at which they have arrived as to the true policy they have to pursue ; and I believe that the same policy which is good there is good here and good elsewhere. Really, what the right hon. Gentleman now proposes, and what I proposed last year, shrinks into insignificance in comparison with what the Americans have done ; and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundalk takes advantage of that, and says, " What is £24,000,000 out of £800,000,000 ? " But I say it is something. Do not despise small things. If we have the self-denial and courage to do this now, the year after we may have self-denial and courage enough to do something more. The language of the hon. Baronet seems to me like that of the young spendthrift, who, when he has reduced himself to the last fragment of his property, finds it so little that it is not worth keeping. But my hon. Friend, instead of tempting us as he does—instead of approaching us on the frail side of human nature, and endeavouring to take advantage of our weakness, ought, on the contrary, to have appeared here as a prophet of truth, and endeavoured to brace us up to the manly discharge of our duty. I would request my hon. Friend to reflect upon these matters of grave importance ; and when he next addresses the House I hope it will be in a manner more worthy of his position, and of that recondite, well-stored, and long-tried wisdom which he possesses. In conclusion, I beg to say that I cordially concur in the proposition.

of the right hon. Gentleman; and I must add that if in this year, when we are about to cease to pay £600,000 of the "dead weight," some proposition of this kind had not been made, it would have amounted to a dereliction of duty. I think the right hon. Gentleman deserves credit for having resisted the temptations to which he must have been subjected; and I believe the course he has taken a wise one, and one well adapted to the promotion of the national wealth.

MR. READ said, that judging from the applause which had greeted the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement from the other side, and from the silence with which it had been received on that side, the Government had consulted the wishes of the party opposite rather than those of his own party. He knew it was a Divine principle to love our enemies; but it did not follow that they were to shirk their friends, or to ignore what was due to them. It might be a true saying that the acknowledgment of our faults was half their remedy; but in this case they had the acknowledgment of a grievance, and a substantial grievance, not only without any attempt at a remedy, but with the adoption of measures that would prevent the chance of a remedy for many years to come. If the right hon. Gentleman had reduced the malt tax even by one-fifth—if he had reduced the duty of 2s. 7½d. a bushel to 2s.—this would have brought the revenue derived from malt to £4,000,000, and the right hon. Gentleman might then have instructed the Committee which was about to sit to consider whether the duty thus charged on malt might not be transferred to beer. In that case the right hon. Gentleman would have earned the confidence of the agricultural class, and he would have conferred a special benefit on the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire seemed surprised that the duty on malt should have yielded such a large return during the present year; but the result was explained by the comparatively fine crop of 1865, and the bad yield and harvest of the following year, which rendered good barley in demand, and which brought even the dark-coloured barley into request. The supply was rapidly exhausted, and the duty would fall off. With regard to the other propositions of the right hon. Gentleman, and especially with regard to his proposition respecting marine insurances, he must say that if he would dabble in insurances, whether by land or water, he thought the right hon. Gentleman might have relieved the agricultural interest from the beggarly insurances they were now obliged to pay on their cattle and hail politics. They produced a very trifling revenue, but were a source of great annoyance to those who had to pay them. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said we ought to borrow an example from America, and strive to reduce our National Debt. He (Mr. Read) wished they could; but however desirable it might be to pay off our Debt, he did not think the means used by the Americans—a high tariff and a depreciated currency—would find favour in England.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART said, there were two things which disappointed him in the Budget. He remembered the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had once stated that the taxes ought to be reduced to £60,000,000; but now, he was sorry to say, not only was there no attempt to bring the reduction to £60,000,000, but he thought they were getting farther from it than ever. His next point of disappointment arose from the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman was the author of the novel of Sybil, and in that novel he complained that taxes were laid on the comforts of the people for the benefit of the Whig oligarchy. But now that the right hon. Gentleman was himself in office, there was no attempt to reduce the taxes on the comforts of the people. The right hon. Gentleman had a splendid opportunity before him. If he had raised the income tax to 7d., which was its normal amount, and that to which all were accustomed, he might have made large reductions on those taxes which pressed on the comforts of the people. For example, with the surplus which would then have been at his disposal, he might have repealed the malt tax. If he had added only another 1d. or 1½d. it might have enabled him to repeal half the malt tax. With regard to the reduction of the National Debt, it was not so clear a matter as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to think. It was worth consideration whether they had yet arrived at such a financial millennium that they would reduce no further the burdens on the people, but were free to give their whole attention to the reduction of the Debt. What was the object of paying off the National Debt? It was not like the debt of a private individual; it only represented a certain annuity. He was glad, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had given notice of a Motion which would raise the whole question at some future time. Even with regard to the taxes which were to be reduced, he doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman had chosen his tax in the wisest manner. He was glad, however, to find that the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to reduce the balances in the Exchequer, for he thought that a time of adversity might yet come; and as to what had been said about bad harvests, it should be remembered that bad harvests usually affected the revenue of the second year after their occurrence.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, his hon. Friend who had just sat down proposed to get rid of the malt tax by placing an extra  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. on the income tax. Now, he was one of those who considered that the malt tax was a great grievance, and he had worked hard, and he believed conscientiously, for its repeal. But he wished to remind those who had worked with him that this end could be secured only by consulting the House of Commons, and offering to the House some proposal which would commend itself to the common sense of hon. Members. In this view of the case the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acted wisely; if the right hon. Gentleman had proposed the repeal of the malt tax, although the proposal would have met with warm approbation by those who had agitated for the repeal, he firmly believed the Committee would have rejected it, and then in what position would the malt tax question have been? Three or four years ago there was a large surplus, and that was the time when the malt tax ought to have been dealt with; but the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), in his wisdom did not think so. He had no doubt his right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was sincere when he said that he would like to deal with the malt tax; but he was satisfied that the mere remission of £1,200,000 would have been of little benefit to the barley growers, and would only have shelved the question for a time. The tax was a large one, and it could not be dealt with in a small way. But he did not see why the tax should not be removed from malt to beer. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said that the repeal of the malt tax would be the death-blow of indirect taxation, because spirits were included in the same category with beer. But they were not parallel cases. They would be so if, as in the case of spirits, the tax was removed from the raw to the manufactured article—from malt to beer. He proposed to move on a future day for a Committee to inquire into that question of the malt tax; and he hoped that their labours would expose the great injustice of that impost, and would show that that injustice could be removed in some unobjectionable manner.

MR. MORE observed, that when a deputation of farmers asked the advice of Mr. Cobden, with respect to the subject of the malt tax, he told them that they could not possibly expect any reduction in it until there was a reduction of public expenditure; and he regretted to hear that, so far from any such reduction taking place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer rather anticipated that there would be an increase. In past years the leading newspapers of the country had expressed their surprise at hon. Members urging the malt tax as a great grievance, and recently they had expressed just as much surprise at the comparative silence of county Members on the subject since the present Government had been in office. He was afraid that if they wished to estimate the liberality of the Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the farmers, they must take some other test than that of the malt tax. The right hon. Gentleman informed a deputation of farmers in 1852 that he was prepared to deal partially with this tax; but that he did not receive sufficient support from the country party. He did not speak in hostility to the right hon. Gentleman; because from the great influence he possessed, and the interest he manifested in everything connected with counties, he possessed the sympathy more or less of every county Member, though they did not appear to support him. He (Mr. More) believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would gladly deal with this tax if other Members of the Government would permit him to do so and his party would support him; and he was convinced that if he brought in a measure for the reduction of the malt tax a large number of Liberal Members would support him even against their own party. The hon. Member for West Sussex had prepared the House for the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken, and there was now the objection which formerly existed to his moving for a Committee on the tax; because the hon. and gallant Member could not have moved for it before the Budget without some misapprehension arising that the Committee was to be proposed for the purpose of preventing the Chancellor of the Exchequer from dealing with the tax.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY admitted that in selecting the duty on marine insurance for a remission of taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken a very proper course, for that and the charge on fire insurance were, perhaps, two of the most objectionable imposts which now existed. With respect to the mode of reducing £24,000,000 of the National Debt by the means of terminable annuities, he thought that there was considerable force in what had been stated by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing), that the scheme was adopted because the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to pay a larger sum than he had money to pay it with. The great blot in the scheme was that by this proposal the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not only dealing with the Budget of 1857, but with those of eighteen succeeding years, and the plan was defective on that ground, although he agreed that the very best way of preparing the country to bear a war expenditure was to reduce the National Debt in time of peace. It might be that before eighteen years elapsed, and at the very time they were raising taxes to pay the annuities, they would be going into the market to borrow money. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had dealt simply with the surplus, the case would be wholly different. As he had stated on a former occasion, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer set aside £500,000, and created terminable annuities, payable over 100 years, he might pay off £10,000,000 of the debt, and that course would be one free from the objections which had been raised to the proposed plan by many hon. Members. At the same time, he (Sir Francis Crossley) was so convinced of the necessity of reducing the Debt that he would accept the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in lieu of what he considered would have been a better one. He regretted very much to see an increase of expenditure to the amount of £2,000,000 in time of peace, and could not divine any reason for it. So far from it being necessary to have a large expenditure in time of peace, that we might be prepared for war, he believed that we should be far better prepared for war if we considerably reduced the enormous expenditure we went to in time of peace. The people of the United States were able to pay off a considerable portion of their debt, not by keeping up a high rate of expenditure, but by reducing their expenditure in time of peace. We, in England, however seemed to have adopted the plan of increasing our expenditure when we were involved in war, and maintaining it at something near the same level when peace was restored.

MR. FAWCETT said, he had listened to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with mixed feelings. He was gratified at the clearness of his statement; but, on the other hand, he strongly objected to some of the propositions the right hon. Gentleman had made. For instance, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman was correct in saying that scarcely one tax was now levied in this country which could be regarded as operating at all oppressively. He (Mr. Fawcett) would not refer to the malt tax, but he thought the taxes on locomotion, hackney carriages, and tea were objectionable; besides which there were a number of small Customs duties which yielded no great revenue, but which encumbered and embarrassed the trade of the country. That, however, which impressed him with the greatest degree of anxiety, was the fact that in a time of peace our expenditure had increased £2,000,000—and he could not discover the slightest reason or justification for that increase. It seemed a very incongruous thing to him that at the very time they were inaugurating a scheme for the reduction of the National Debt, we should be incurring an increased expenditure. Without wearying the House with giving reasons for it, he would say that he was in favour of reducing our National Debt in time of peace, agreeing with his Friend the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) that it was an act of prudence which they owed to posterity. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire alluded in glowing terms to the magnificent efforts now being made in this direction by the people of the United States. But how have they reduced their debt? They did not rely upon elaborate schemes of financiering, but they had made up their minds to reduce expenditure, to keep up taxation, and resolutely to apply the great surplus of each year, not in any fantastic schemes, but in the plain, simple process of cancelling so much debt; and that was the only honest, satisfactory, and straightforward way of reducing debt. He looked with most startled alarm upon the state of the Continent of Europe at the present time. Every country seemed to be rushing upon a mad career which must land them in ruin; and without exaggeration, he believed that, with one or two exceptions, there was not a Continental State which was not each year spending more money than it raised by revenue. If that policy was continued it must lead to disastrous conclusions. Europe, as the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had said, was never so full of armed men as at the present time. Do not let us follow in the same mad career. He was afraid there was a wish in some quarters to do so, and that partly explained the additional expenditure this year of £2,000,000. He thought the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for reducing the National Debt had many of the defects of the old Sinking Fund. By this arrangement, as by a Sinking Fund, the country arranged to pay off debt by agreeing to increase its annual burdens. But if next year, from bad harvest, the breaking out of war, or some other unfortunate cause, our expenditure should exceed our revenue, the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not be carried out. If it were carried out it could only be in the same way as Mr. Pitt's Sinking Fund was carried out, either by borrowing money to pay the annual charge, or—a more objectionable course—by imposing some additional taxation, which must to a certain degree embarrass the trade of the country. Therefore, any scheme of reducing debt by terminable annuities involved more or less the defects and mischiefs of the old Sinking Fund. They ought to adopt one of two plans for reducing the National Debt. If there was a surplus they might do as the Americans had done, and apply the surplus at once to cancel so much debt. In that way they would reduce the annual burden, and get all the advantage of the principle of compound interest; because if they cancelled £1,000,000 of stock this year the annual burdens next year would be less by £30,000; and therefore, if they had the same expenditure and the same taxation, instead of a surplus of £1,000,000 there would be a surplus of £1,030,000 applicable to the reduction of the Debt. The other way of reducing the Debt, if they were enamoured of terminable annuities, was this. The difference between a permanent annuity of £3 a year and a temporary annuity of the same amount, extending over fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty years, was of very trifling amount; and therefore if they had £1,000,000 at their disposal they might apply it by transferring permanent stock into long annuities, by which they would create terminable annuities, without any increase of the national burdens, and without taxing posterity.

MR. M'KENNA: I cannot permit the unmixed eulogium of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and that of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Fawcett) upon the American financial system, to pass without some protest on my part. If the American system is to recommend itself to this House and to the world it will be in my opinion the triumph of the principles of protection. The Americans, to this day, maintain a system of protection of the most enormous and extravagant proportions, as well as a system of irredeemable paper money. Before they return to the system of payment in coin they commence the reduction of their debt, and no doubt they deserve credit for the efforts they have made, which have accomplished the reduction of £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 by paying back the holders of bonds with greenbacks which they had issued at pleasure. The first duty of a man anxious to pay his debts is to discharge his promissory notes in coin, or, what is equivalent, in exchange for coin, and the same principle applies to a State, with whom the first duty should be to apply its surplus means to restore the integrity of its currency. With respect to the strictures on the mode of reducing the debt proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, by creating terminable annuities, there is some force in them; but it appears to me that the system adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a judicious compromise between what is most desirable and what is most practicable. A State is about as wise and provident as the average of the units of which it is composed and no more. In our private affairs, we are in the habit of placing ourselves under stoppage for a short period to accomplish some future advantage; and although perhaps that system is not as efficacious or as sound as the reduction of all unnecessary outlay, and the immediate application of surplus to the payment of debts, it is found to be more consonant with our natures, and is unquestionably more successful in practice. In this light I view the annuity scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—it is a compromise between two principles of economy, and such as a private individual would be the most likely to adopt successfully in his own affairs.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he had been led to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman would have felt it his duty to do something more with respect to the fire insurance duty. It was not his intention to discuss the policy of reducing the Debt, which was the policy laid down last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Lancashire; but he rose for the purpose of giving notice that on an early day he should raise the question in a definite manner, whether the Resolutions of the House upon the subject of the fire insurance duty should be altogether passed over, or whether they should proceed to discuss the problem for the extinction of the National Debt. There had been no petitions presented for paying off the National Debt; but petitions in vast numbers had been presented, and Resolutions had been passed, in favour of a reduction of the duty on fire insurance. He could hardly understand how the right hon. Member for South Lancashire insisted upon treating that duty as a charge upon property—the way to test that would be to propose a duty upon property of all kinds, and the abolition of the duty on fire insurance. He did not think it right or statesmanlike to approach the reduction of the National Debt until all taxes were remitted which pressed upon prudence and forethought.

MR. GREENE said, he differed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his proposal to reduce the National Debt by terminable annuities. It was a mere deception. A much more simple plan would be to reduce it year by year by the application of his available surplus. By that means they would avoid the risk of having to tax the country to pay off debt when, perhaps, they might be borrowing money to pay for a war. He thought a revision of the licence system was very much required. It was most unjust as a principle to tax men for their trade; but before he would consent to remit the tax on attorneys' certificates, he must ask the House to consider how the entire hop duty had been placed on brewers when it was taken off the hop-growers. It was just to remit the tax on hops; but when it was charged directly on brewers, and became an augmentation of the malt tax, it became most unjust. He should take an early opportunity of calling attention to the whole subject of licences. It had been suggested that a substitute for the malt duty might be found in a tax on beer; but if it were to be repealed, it ought to be repealed entirely, and not added to the price of the poor man's beer. If the farmers desired it he should rejoice at the repeal of the tax; but he thought that before proceeding to pay off the National Debt, they should reduce the burdens on the country. That would enable them to pay off the Debt in a more consistent manner. England was becoming richer every year, and he believed that, with proper management, the present Government, whom he believed to be thoroughly practical business men, would be enabled to propose such a reduction of taxation as would pave the way to the reduction of the Debt in a more consistent manner.

COLONEL SYKES said, he must express his hearty approval of the determination of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to operate on the National Debt, though probably he might not entirely concur in his modus operandi. He would prefer the simple operation of applying the annual surplus to the reduction of the National Debt. But what was proposed was a step in the right direction: it was a diminution of the charge on the country, and therefore it had his approval. It had been said by the last speaker that they should diminish taxation before attempting to operate on the National Debt. But it should be remembered that the present amount of taxation was the consequence of the National Debt. The interest of that Debt, including management, terminable annuities, and interest of Exchequer bonds and bills, was £26,233,287 a year, which must be raised by taxation. The labouring classes had a greater interest in the reduction of the National Debt than any other portion of the community, for taxation on articles of consumption was necessary to pay the interest. In the year ending the 31st March, 1866, £21,276,000 was derived from Customs duties, and £19,788,000 from Excise duties, making a total of £41,064,000. Now, the Customs duties were derived chiefly from articles consumed by the labouring classes—tea, sugar, coffee, &c. The importer was compelled to add the duties to the sale prices; and the retailer did the same, and the consumer therefore had to pay 20 to 30 per cent more for articles of necessary consumption than he would have had to pay, if it had not been necessary to raise so large an amount of Customs duties for the payment of the interest of the National Debt. The same argument applies to the Excise duties—spirits, wine, beer, &c. The working man, therefore, has a deep interest in the reduction of the National Debt. The Americans were doing precisely what we would not do. During the war they had an immense expenditure, but they had a system of taxation commensurate with it. Since the termination of the war they had diminished their expenditure; but the people submitted to be taxed as if the war still continued. There was therefore a large surplus of revenue which they applied to the reduction of their debt; and within little more than one year they had reduced it to the extent of £40,000,000. One word as to the obligations we had incurred. Take, for instance, the question of fortifications. The country had engaged to lay out on fortifications £6,995,000; of which £3,491,000 had been already advanced. There remained £3,500,000 to be provided for. But this was not alluded to in the Budget. Then, again, the armament of the defences when completed would require 1,104 rifled guns, and cost £1,882,000. We were also pledged to the extent of millions for dockyard extensions, barracks, public works, &c. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not said one word about these prospective claims on the finance of the country. So long as the National Debt existed with an annual charge for interest to the amount of £26,000,000, taxation must be kept up for the payment of interest.

MR. AYRTON said, he entirely concurred in the general feeling of satisfaction with which the House had heard the Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was marked by severe simplicity and prudence. That simplicity, he hoped, would be accepted by the House as an evidence of the real intention of the Government to enable them to deal during the present Session with the great subject of Parliamentary Reform. He could not conceive anything more unfavourable to the complete discussion and solution of that question than being embarrassed during the Session by any complicated matters of finance. He also thought the speech of the right hon. Gentleman deserved to be admired for its prudence. He had not in the present posture of affairs attempted to do battle with any great remission of taxation. He had done well and wisely in pursuing the course marked out by the speech of his predecessor last year in attempting to effect a reduction of the National Debt. He thought the House might safely adopt the method of dealing with the National Debt indicated in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that night. He did not think that the propositions deserved the criticisms which had been passed upon it, and which seemed to him to be of rather a pedantic character. There was a general disposition to cry out against the principle of sinking funds; but it must not be forgotten that we should never have got rid of so large a portion of the Debt had not £3,000,000 per annum of it been contracted in the form of terminable annuities, and he must ask what was the use of indulging in abstract speculations when they had such a cogent argument before them? The question of extinguishing the National Debt was not simply an arithmetical question—it was a moral question, and he ventured to express his earnest thanks to those Chancellors who had declined to yield to the pressure of particular class interests, which were seeking to get rid of the taxes that pressed most peculiarly upon them. It was in consequence of the resistance of Chancellors of the Exchequer to such pressure that the right hon. Gentleman was enabled that night to remit a tax which he regarded as being the most unjust. He wished, however, to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to one other tax which might be considered without materially trenching on the Budget. He had for some years brought under consideration the unjust character of some of the charges upon locomotion, and he succeeded at last in obtaining from the late Chancellor of the Exchequer some remission; but there still remained the vexatious tax levied upon hackney carriages in the metropolis. This was a tax levied originally for the purpose of improving the communication between the City of London and the Houses of Parliament and the Courts at Westminster. At that time the road lay through a miserable lane, which was almost impassable, and the consequence was that most persons chose to make the passage by water. No sooner was the tax levied than by a dexterous movement the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day converted the tax into a source of Imperial revenue. At that time hackney carriages, or, as they were now more generally called, cabs, were almost exclusively used by the wealthier classes, but now they had become conveniences for a very large portion of the inhabitants of the metropolis. The charge upon these vehicles was perfectly amazing, it being no less than 1s. a day on each. If the proceeds of the tax were applied to local improvements something might be said in its favour; but there was no pretence for its being made a source of Imperial revenue. This tax was not levied on conveyances anywhere else. In all other parts of the kingdom the only duty paid by these vehicles was the ordinary tax upon horses and carriages. The result of this tax was that the public had to put up with bad cabs. There was no objection to the impost being levied in the metropolis as it was in Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and other large towns; but in its present form the burden was most objectionable, and if it were removed one good result would be that a better class of vehicles would be provided. Although the total sum raised by its means was but small, the pressure upon the proprietors of the street cabs was enormous. He did not intend to press his views on this subject upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the form of a Motion; but he hoped that that right hon. Gentleman would take the matter into consideration, and would allow the Secretary of the Treasury to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to this duty, so as to subject the metropolitan cabs to the ordinary horse and carriage duty only. He regretted that the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) should have given notice of his intention to raise the issue of the reduction of the Fire Insurance Duty against the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No doubt the question would be brought under the notice of the House with all the vast machinery of agitation which insurance companies could bring to bear upon the minds of Members of that House, and might therefore find more support than it deserved. The hon. Gentleman had denied that the Fire Insurance Duty was in any way a tax upon property; but he, on the contrary, believed that that duty was only a bad method of collecting what was really intended to be a tax upon personal property. Although bad in the mode in which it was collected it represented one of the most ancient forms of taxation with which the country was acquainted—namely, a tax upon personal property possessed by individuals. The fire insurance duty was only a means of ascertaining the quantity of personal property of which the individual was possessed; but it was open to the great objection that it only included those who consented to assess themselves by taking out a policy of insurance. If the owners of property insisted on being relieved of that tax, the question would arise, how they were to levy a substitute for it on the visible personal property of the country. If the House should like to add to the income tax 2d. in the pound, and take off that and some other duties, it would, he believed, be a very wise proceeding; but it was not just to the mass of the people that there should be an agitation on the part of the owners of property to relieve themselves of that tax unless they would frankly tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they were ready to submit to another impost which would yield an equal amount to the revenue. He must also express his deep regret that, instead of having a diminution of the national expenditure, they should be compelled to bear so large an increase as £2,000,000 to that increase in the present year. He hoped that that increase might be regarded as temporary, and that the Government would apply themselves earnestly to the question of reducing the public expenditure, so that if they remained in office till that time next year they should not have to ask the House to raise Ways and Means to the enormous amount that was asked that night; because if in the exceptional state of Europe the country should assent to that scale of expenditure this year, it certainly would not assent to its continuance. Though the present Government came after Lord Palmerston, who inflicted the greatest injury on the public interests by encouraging every kind of expenditure and extravagance, still it was to be hoped that as that Minister's career was forgotten so his extravagance would not be imitated in these days. The Minister who had not left associated with his name any great act for the benefit of the people, but who had only increased their burdens, would, he repeated, be forgotten unless he was remembered to his disadvantage. But the time had come for applying themselves seriously to that subject, in order that a better account might be presented by the Government next year.

MR. M'LAREN said, that last year he expressed his approval of the plan for reducing the National Debt by means of terminable annuities, and he was delighted to hear that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken up that plan. It was much to the right hon. Gentleman's credit that, foregoing the advantage of the popularity which he might have obtained by trying to do something new, he had candidly adopted the proposal of his predecessor, thinking it the best for the country under the circumstances. That we, the richest people in the world, should make no effort to pay off the National Debt was quite discreditable to us. He could not admit that the paying off of £24,000,000 of that Debt was so infinitesimal a matter as not to be worth considering. £24,000,000 was 1-33rd of the whole Debt, and by ten such operations as that proposed one-third of the Debt would be extinguished. Some hon. Gentlemen had approved the Budget with certain qualifications, but for his part he made no qualifications; he approved it pure and simple. He thought, however, that the right hon. Gentleman ought to offer a little reciprocity, and not be so much afraid, as some of his friends seemed to be, of intrusting the people with political power. It was a curious fact that every hon. Member who supported the proposal to pay off a portion of the National Debt represented a large popular constituency.

1. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1867 until the 1st day of August 1868 on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland, viz.

2. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the 6th day of April 1867, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains, mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the 16th and 17th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 34, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):

For every twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of Four pence.

And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, for every Twenty shillings of the annual value thereof,

In England, the Rate or Duty of Two pence, and

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of One penny halfpenny.

Subject to the provisions contained in Section 8 of the Act 26th Victoria, chapter 22, for the exemption of persons whose Incomes from every source is under One Hundred pounds a-year, and relief to those whose Income is under Two Hundred pounds a-year.

3. Resolved, That the Stamp Duties now payable in the United Kingdom under the Act 7 Vic. c. 21, and the Act 28 and 29 Vict. c. 96, for Policies of Sea Insurance shall cease and determine; and that, in lieu thereof, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for such Policies the Stamp Duties following (that is to say):

For every Policy or other Instrument whereby any Insurance shall be made upon any Ship or Vessel, or upon any Goods, Merchandise, or other Property on board of any Ship or Vessel or upon the freight of any Ship or Vessel, or upon any interest whatever in or relating to any Ship or Vessel which may lawfully be insured, for or upon any voyage, in respect of every full sum of One Hundred Pounds, and in respect of any fractional part of One Hundred pounds thereby insured

And for every Policy or other instrument whereby any such Insurance as aforesaid shall be made for any time, in respect of every full sum of One Hundred pounds, and in respect of any fractional part of One Hundred pounds thereby insured—

s. d.

Where the Insurance shall be made for any time not exceeding Six Months

s. d. 0 3

Where the Insurance shall be made for any time exceeding Six Months and not exceeding Twelve Months

s. d. 0 6

But if the separate interests of two or more distinct persons shall be insured by one Policy or Instrument for a Voyage or for Time, then the Duty of 3d., or the Duty of 3d. or 6d., as the case may require, shall be charged thereon in respect of every full sum of One Hundred pounds, and every fractional part of One Hundred pounds thereby insured upon any separate and distinct interest.

4. Resolved, That no allowance shall be made for the Stamp Duty on any Policy or other Instrument whereby any Sea Insurance shall be made, except in the first case specified in the first section of the Act 54 Geo. 3, c. 133.

On question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"

MR. OSBORNE said, that before the Chairman vacated the Chair he wished to make an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did so without having been in any communication with the Irish Members whom the next Order on the paper (the Tenants Improvements (Ireland) Bill) more immediately concerned. But the right hon. Gentleman, who understood the matter as well, if not better, than any Member of that House, would hardly gainsay that the Bill to which he referred was probably one of the most important measures that could be brought before them. ["Order!"] He thought he was taking the simplest course by raising that question then.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question before the House was that he should now leave the Chair. The hon. Gentleman having put the Question, declared, in the usual form, that "the Ayes have it."

MR. OSBORNE believed that he could speak on that Question, and he challenged the Chairman's ruling by saying that he thought the "Noes" had it. The hon. Member was proceeding to offer some observations to the House; but being called to order said he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

Motion, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Naas.)

MR. CANDLISH moved that the debate be adjourned.

MR. OSBORNE, in seconding the Motion, said, he would resume the appeal (where he had left off) to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—whose knowledge of Ireland and, it was only fair to add, whose good intentions towards that country no one was more ready to admit than he (Mr. Osborne) was—whether the right hon. Gentleman thought that so important a question as this confessedly was should now be proceeded with on its second reading—whether it should be brought on at the fag end of the Financial Statement introducing the Budget, and which, with the discussion upon it, lasted for a period unexampled by its brevity in that House. In reference to that fact he must compliment the right hon. Gentleman upon the succinctness and completeness of his speech—a speech which he thought would stand as a good model for all Chancellors of the Exchequer. He believed that within the recollection of the House there had never before been a Budget introduced, which, with the discussion arising from it, terminated at a quarter before nine o'clock. Whether that be a fact or not, he thought that hon. Gentlemen generally must confess that few measures involved such important consequences to Ireland as the present Bill, and deserved more attention in that House. He was sure that the Government attached so much importance to that Bill that they would not wish it to be brought on at a time and under circumstances when it was impossible it could receive due consideration. Intimately connected as he was with Ireland he thought that such a Bill was entitled from its importance to stand first on the paper as the great question for debate. The second reading of the Bill brought in last Session was placed first on the paper, and had an entire evening appropriated to itself. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), who was to take a prominent part in the discussion on this subject, had left the House under the impression that the discussion on the Budget would last beyond the time fixed for entering upon the consideration of this measure. The Leader of the Opposition—not the hon. Member for Roscommon (Colonel French)—had also left the House. [Here Colonel FRENCH made an observation which did not reach the gallery]. He (Mr. Osborne) was obliged to the hon. Gentleman below him for his running commentary, but he was then referring to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was sure that the House generally would be of opinion it was desirable that the Leaders on both sides of the House should be present when a question of this importance was called on for discussion. In all fairness he submitted to the right hon. Gentleman the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas) whether it would not be better to name a night for the second reading, when it would stand first on the paper, and assume that importance to which the question involved was fully entitled—namely, an early day after Easter. If the measure were then brought under discussion the result would be a partial and unsatisfactory debate, resulting at length in an adjournment. He would not enter into the details of this Bill; but ventured to remark that it was not one that would settle the question at issue. And if it were now proceeded with there would, of course, be a great deal of speaking against time, and the result would, at all events, be unsatisfactory. The question was one of such importance that it ought not to stand second even to the Budget—indeed, to his mind it was quite equal in importance to any Budget. He therefore urged the Government to postpone its consideration, and to give an early day after Easter for a full discussion upon it.

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Candlish.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us is quite correct in crediting me with fully understanding and appreciating the importance of this question. Out of the many measures introduced to that House, some of which I am glad to say we have passed, none in my mind are superior in importance and interest to this Bill. It is a measure in which I take a great personal interest, and one which I think deserves our best consideration. It is not our fault that this important business has been delayed to this moment. The pressure of public business has been very great, and circumstances of an exigent character during the first few weeks of the Session required the presence of my noble Friend in the sister island. It was therefore no wish on our part to delay the progress of this measure. On the contrary, Her Majesty's Government felt an anxious desire that the Bill, when matured by the suggestions and assistance of hon. Members on both sides of the House, should pass into a law. Whatever may be the opinion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) in regard to this measure, I am profoundly impressed with the conviction that it contains a substance which may lead to beneficial results in Ireland. At the same time, I am perfectly well aware of the disadvantage of entering into a subject of this importance in a House which is not very full; but this is a circumstance arising from what may be called a Parliamentary casualty. It is really very difficult for us to fix another day for the second reading, in the face of the large amount of business before us. At the same time, I should be happy if hon. Gentlemen opposite will consent to meet us on the 29th instant, being the first day when the House re-assembles after the Easter recess. But, generally speaking, when we fix the first day after the recess for Irish Bills, the Gentlemen from Ireland are not then to be found in their places. If, however, the hon. Representatives of Ireland will endeavour to be present here on the 29th instant, or the Monday on which the House re-assembles, I shall be happy to meet them then for the consideration of this question. Indeed, I think that there ought to be an exertion made on both sides to be then present, when I hope that the subject will be treated by all parties with that respect and attention which its interest and importance demand.

COLONEL FRENCH expressed his regret at being supposed by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) to have interfered with the observations he was then making. He for one, however, disagreed with the opinions expressed by that hon. Gentleman in respect to the suggested postponement of this Bill. It was announced, apparently with the approbation of the Irish Members, that his noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland would bring on the Bill that evening if the previous business on the paper were disposed of before nine o'clock. He (Colonel French) was prepared to give the measure the fullest consideration.

MR. BRADY suggested that the Bill should be read a second time sub silentio in order to make progress, and take the discussion on the principle of the Bill on the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. SYNAN said, he should not have thought that any Irish Member would have proposed or suggested that a Bill of so much importance should be read a second time without discussion. The Bill must be fully discussed, and he saw no objection to the discussion being then proceeded with until twelve, when the debate could be adjourned until the 29th.

MR. SANDFORD said, he was surprised that the Government had declined to proceed with the Bill, the understanding being that it should not be taken after ten o'clock. No doubt it was a very disagreeable subject, both for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord the Chief Secretary—the measure being in direct contradiction to that introduced by the noble Lord last Session. He had no desire to say anything disagreeable to any Member of the House; but if it was more agreeable to adjourn the discussion than to proceed with it, he would accede to it.

LORD NAAS said, that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Sandford) were uncalled for. The Government had no desire to press on the Bill against the wishes of hon. Members. There had only been one evening since the Bill was read a first time that the discussion could have come on, and at that time he and the Law Advisers of the Crown were compelled to be absent. The observation, therefore, of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon was unjustifiable. It was the earnest wish of the Government to proceed with the Bill, and take the opinion of the House upon it as early as possible. He thought there was great force in the objection to what was called fragmentary discussions, and he was of opinion that very little time was gained by adjourned debates—and besides that, they were very inconvenient. By adjourning the second reading until the 29th, and then taking it the first thing that evening, he hoped they would be able to get through the discussion that night. The Government did not shrink from any discussion of the measure.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he had always believed that Her Majesty's Government were sincerely anxious to press forward this Bill in the hope that it would settle the question. There was a great deal in the Bill that was good, and well worthy of the support of the House; and his reason for supporting the adjournment was that many Irish Members who wished to take part in the discussion had left the House under the impression that the Bill would not come on that night, and it would be impossible that they could have a full and adequate discussion that evening.

MR. GREGORY said, he believed the Government had been anxious to take the discussion on these Bills at an earlier period. Events had, however, occurred which had prevented the Law Officers of the Crown and the noble Lord (Lord Naas) from being in their places, and it was therefore impossible to go on with the Bills. A partial debate on this subject would give the impression that the House was trifling with it, and although it would be rather inconvenient to Irish Members to bring them back on the 29th, he would make no objection to the postponement to that day. It might be impossible, in consequence of the Reform debates, to obtain another night, and he would take care to be in his place on the 29th to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Debate adjourned till Monday 29th April.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.
(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

[BILL 47.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee. [Progress 26th March.]

(In the Committee.)

Clause 40 (On Retirement of Masters, the Examiners and Clerks to be entitled to retiring Pensions of the same Amount as Salary).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) moved the insertion of the words "or clerks," making the clause applicable to all clerks, instead of to one only, the object being, by reserving the rights to retiring pensions to the present clerks, to induce them to continue in office, rather than to have to make new appointments.

Amendment proposed, in line 27, after the word "clerk," to insert the words "or clerks."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. LAWSON objected to the proposed Amendment, on the ground that the "clerks" were entitled to a more explicit declaration of their rights, if they possessed any.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 45: Majority 16.

Clause 41 (Appointment of Office of Second Assistant Registrar of the Court).

GENERAL DUNNE moved an Amendment to the effect that both of these officers, whose duties were identical, should be paid £1,000 a year, instead of as the clause proposed, £1,200 to the one and £800 (with a prospective increase to £1,000) to the other. He saw no reason why there should be any difference in the emoluments when the duties were the same. He therefore proposed the substitution of "£1,000" for "£800."

MR. HUNT said, that the salary of the second officer was fixed at £800 last year, under arrangements for a gradual increase to £1,000.

MR. MONSELL asked for some explanation of the great difference between the salaries assigned to the two officers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) said, that it was proposed to appoint the existing officers to the new offices created under the Act, and the apparent discrepancy between the two salaries arose out of this circumstance.

MR. HUNT observed, that the proposition was not a new one, it having been made by a previous Government.

MR. MONSELL could not see why any difference should be made between the salaries of two officers whose duties were precisely the same.

MR. HUNT said, it was no uncommon thing to have senior and junior officers, the senior officers having larger salaries than the others.

COLONEL FRENCH observed, that in this case there was no such distinction as senior and junior officers.

Amendment negatived.

MR. O'BEIRNE proposed the addition at the end of the clause of these words—

"Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of Junior Clerk the Lord Chancellor shall appoint thereto a fit person, who shall have been admitted a solicitor or attorney in one of the Superior Courts in Ireland."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) objected.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would bring up his clause on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 42 to 87, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 88.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN moved the omission of Clauses 88 to 107, both inclusive. The proposal in the Bill was, that evidence in the Court of Chancery should be taken before the Examiner, in the nature of written questions and answers. What he proposed was, that all evidence should be taken vivâ voce before the Court, unless differently ordered by the Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) resisted the Amendment on the ground that it would utterly clog the business in the Chancery Courts. A discretion was left with the Court to examine witnesses vivâ voce, if necessary.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN moved that the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again. The question was an important one, and it had now reached so late an hour that he thought one of two courses should be adopted. The Clauses from 88 to 107, both inclusive, should either be postponed by the Attorney General or Progress should be reported.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) declined to postpone the clauses, and opposed the Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 68: Majority 24.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

After a short discussion, Motion negatived.

MR. ESMONDE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

After a short discussion, Motion negatived.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law which regulates the Burials of persons in Ireland not belonging to the Established Church.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONSELL and Mr. SULLIVAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 109.]

(The Lord Cranworth.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CRANWORTH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, stated that its object was to enable religious and charitable or scientific societies to acquire land for the purposes of their buildings not exceeding two acres in extent without being obliged to comply with the provisions of the Mortmain Act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would not oppose the Bill, which, however, seemed very carelessly drawn, and would require considerable amendment in Committee. If it were not amended it would apply to dispositions made by will. He thought also it would be absolutely necessary that all deeds conveying land for such purposes to such societies should be enrolled, and should move a clause to that effect in Committee.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

(The Earl of Longford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that some formal alterations had been made in the Bill at the instance of the Judge Advocate General, which it would not be necessary to detail; but on the 22nd clause, by which the infliction of corporal punishment was governed, considerable discussion had taken place in the other House, and after some contradictory decision, a new clause had been substituted for that contained in the usual annual Bill. The effect would be to limit the infliction of corporal punishment in time of peace to two offences only—mutiny, and insubordination accompanied by personal violence. He should be very glad himself, as everybody else would be, if corporal punishment could be dispensed with altogether. Like capital punishment, it could only be supported as a painful necessity. The preamble of the Bill explained in reasonable language why summary powers should be placed in the hands of courts martial, and these powers were quite as necessary for the protection of the citizen as for the restraint of the soldier. Law and custom had selected corporal punishment as the mode in which these summary powers should be exercised in preference to carrying into execution sentences of death, which might be the alternative. He did not think it would be judicious at this moment to weaken the authority of those who were responsible for the discipline of the army by abolishing corporal punishment; but their Lordships might rest satisfied that it would only be resorted to when necessity demanded.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

RAILWAY (No. 3) BILL.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES moved that the Standing Orders of this House, Nos. 18, 38, and 40, be suspended in the case of the Petition for this Bill. He said, that the Standing Orders Committee had objected that the promoters of the Bill, a section of the debenture-holders of this company, had not given proper notice to the parties whose interests this Bill affected; but the circumstances which gave rise to the Bill did not originate until after the proper time for giving such notice had expired. The case was one of urgency, and a compliance with the Orders ought not to be insisted upon. There were twenty-four debenture-stocks in this company, twenty-nine share-stocks, and three special share-capitals charged on specific funds. The consequence was that every one of these bodies had rights which conflicted more or less with the rest of them, which made it impossible for more than one set to join together in suits for having their rights established. A large number of suits had been already instituted of a most expensive description, and many more would be instituted unless the House would think it right to allow the present Bill to go before the Committee which was sitting upon other Bills relating to the company, and would find out some way of enabling the company to go to compulsory arbitration, for that was the object of the Bill to which this Motion referred. The object of the Bill was well described in its title—to transfer all litigation respecting the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, and all matters arising out of the Act constituting and defining the powers of the company, and out of the Acts of other companies over whose line the company's line now runs, to the decision of a tribunal of arbitration which should have special power to prepare a scheme to relieve the company from its present embarrassments. The House was aware that a railway company could not commit an act of bankruptcy in ordinary form, nor could it be wound up in the Court of Chancery. The House, therefore, would admit that to allow a great railway company in the condition of this company to go to arbitration was the only just way of dealing with it. Unless arbitration took place there would be hopeless and endless litigation.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Standing Orders of this House, Nos. 18, 38, and 40, be suspended in the case of the Petition for the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (No. 3) Bill."—(Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the company had come before the Standing Orders Committee on the 27th of March without having given due notice to the several parties who were interested in the passing of the Bill. It was the duty of that Committee to take care that persons who were likely to be affected by the legislation of the House should have in such cases ample notice, and they had in the present instance, therefore, come to the conclusion that they could not, in the absence of such notice, recommend the Standing Orders established to secure that object to be dispensed with. The House itself or the Government, of course, might decide that the case under discussion was one which warranted a departure from that rule. If the Government thought that this was a question worthy of being settled by a Special Committee to be appointed for the purpose he would offer no opposition to a proposal to that effect; but the Standing Orders Committee were bound to act as they had done, or they would have lost the confidence of the House.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the question was, whether there was any good ground for dispensing with the rules of the House, which ought not to be set aside without full and sufficient cause shown. The promoters said that non-compliance with these rules was not their fault; that the circumstances which induced them to bring forward this measure did not arise before a period at which it was impossible for them so to comply with those rules. It seemed to him that this was a strong argument. He quite agreed that the object of Standing Orders was to give full notice to all parties whose interests might be affected. This notice, no doubt, had not been given in this case; but the dissentient parties could not be said to be taken at a disadvantage, as they were fully represented. In fact, they had the start, and had their own measure advanced several stages. It was possible, no doubt, for the promoters of this scheme to be heard against the one already before Parliament, but the Committee could not take cognizance of the alternative scheme unless it was before them, and, if the promoters proved their point, could only reject the first Bill, by which much time would be lost, and the great object of staying ruinous suits unattained. Upon these grounds, while carefully refraining from expressing any opinion on the merits, he could not help thinking on the whole that it would be advisable to let this Bill go before the Committee, and that it would be a harsh measure to reject this Motion. With regard to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten), it was, he confessed, one which had often occurred to himself, and which, in his humble opinion, the House should seriously consider. Apart from the weight justly due to the hon. and gallant Member's authority, and without wearying the House with arguments which must suggest themselves to every one, he thought that an exceptional case like this justified and required exceptional treatment. He recommended that both Bills be referred to a Committee to be carefully selected by the House, in order that, if possible, some useful measure might be passed and come into operation at the earliest possible moment.

TIPPERARY ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That the Honourable Charles White is duly elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Tipperary.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolutions:—

That no such case of general riot at the last Election for the County of Tipperary has been proved as would make the said Election altogether null and void.

That it was proved to the Committee that, previous to the last Election for the said County, divers of the Roman Catholic Clergy exercised their influence upon their congregations in a manner calculated to prejudice the free choice of the Electors, but that such conduct on their part did not in the opinion of the Committee amount to the offence of undue influence as defined by law.

That serious disturbances took place at the last Election for the said County, at the polling places and in other localities, which materially interfered with the Electors tendering their votes.

That the Committee have no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the last Election for the said County.

Report to lie upon the Table.

INDIA—CLAIMS ON OUDE.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, with reference to the statement made by his predecessor on the 23rd of July last, that the claims against the late State of Oude, which have been investigated and reported upon by a Commission in India, "were claims of a moral character;" and to the fact that a notarial Copy of the Bond granted to Captain Thomas Edwards by the Vizier of Oude, as admitted in the Report of the Commission, was produced before it from the archives of the Supreme Court at Calcutta; What arrangement he proposes to make with a view of coming to a settlement of the amount due under the Bond, in order to carry out the pledge which was given to this House by the President of the Board of Control, on the 12th May 1857, "that all the public and bonâ fide claims against the State of Oude would be paid out of the revenues of the country."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, the Question which had been put by the hon. Gentleman was a peculiar one, and he thought unusually argumentative. The only answer he could give to it was, that this question was considered by his predecessor and his Council on the Report of the Commission to which the Question referred, and that the Report of the Commission had decided that it was not a case in which, from the evidence, there was any claim on the part of the representatives of Captain Edwards against the late State of Oude. His predecessor in Council had approved the Report of that Commission. He need not inform the hon. Member that in matters of finance the Secretary of State had no power to act without the assent of the Council. The matter had not been brought before him officially; but he had looked into the evidence, and he was perfectly disposed to believe that in the form in which it was presented to the Commissioners, and afterwards brought under the notice of his predecessor and Council, the conclusion arrived at was right. But he had been told privately that there was certain evidence not brought before the Commissioners which might have affected their opinions. If that was the case, and if his attention were called to the fact of any evidence not brought before them, he should be perfectly willing to refer that evidence to them and ask them if it would have made any difference in the conclusion at which they had arrived. But he might just say that, as this was described to be a "claim of a moral character," he understood that moral claims against the British Government arose in this way—when we took possession of Oude, and prevented the Sovereign from paying any debts that might be due from him, the Government considered itself liable for any debts that would otherwise have been paid; but this was a claim in respect of a very old debt, incurred seventy years before the annexation of Oude, which had been repudiated by the Sovereigns of Oude, and which, if the annexation had not taken place, in all probability would not have been paid. In that case he could not think there was any moral claim for payment out of the revenues of this country.

TRANSPORTATION TO WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the recent chartering of a ship to convey convicts to Western Australia, How soon transportation to that colony will finally cease; and, whether the supply of convicts for Public Works in connection with the Dockyard extensions in this country has been represented to the Home Office as inadequate?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that transportation to Western Australia would cease at the end of the year. One ship had been chartered to go out now, and there would be another chartered to take out between 200 and 300 convicts more. That was the extent of our engagements, and we were bound to fulfil them. With regard to the deficiency in the supply of convict labour in the dockyards, there was no particular information at the Home Office, but he would make inquiry upon the subject.

STORM SIGNALS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, When the Returns relating to the Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade, ordered by the House on the 12th day of February last, and the Returns relating to Memorials on the subject of Storm Signals, ordered on the 7th ultimo, will be laid upon the table?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in reply, said, he had already that evening laid on the table of the House the latter Returns; he hoped to lay the former on the table next week.

VOTING PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SYNAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he proposes retaining and moving in Committee on the Representation of the People Bill the Clause for the use of Voting Papers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir, it is my intention to retain in the Representation of the People Bill the clause for the use of voting papers, and I hope it may be adopted by the House. I hope also it may be adopted in Ireland. That, I think, is a country in which it would work very advantageously.

IRELAND—COURT OF EXCHEQUER. QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the Second Report of the Irish Law and Equity Commissioners, it is the intention of the Government to fill the vacancy in the office of Master of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland?

LORD NAAS replied, that he had not heard that there was any vacancy in the office of the Master of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. In fact, he rather believed there was no such vacancy. Of course, if such a vacancy should occur it would be for the Government to consider whether it should be filled up or not.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the Second Reading of the Marine Mutiny Bill would be taken that evening? He understood it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to introduce certain alterations in order to bring it into harmony with the Mutiny Bill. He (Mr. Otway) had the Paper showing the alterations to be introduced into the Marine Mutiny Bill of the present Session, but the alterations to which he referred were not comprised in it. He wished therefore to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether this Paper contained a correct list of the alterations proposed to be made?

MR. CORRY said, the Paper to which the hon. Gentleman referred had been printed before the Mutiny Bill had passed through Committee, and therefore did not comprise the alterations necessary to make the two Bills in conformity with each other. It was his intention to take the second reading of the Marine Mutiny Bill that evening.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to know what regulations Marines would be subjected to in future?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that Marines on shore were in exactly the same position as soldiers; but when afloat they were subject to the ordinary naval discipline.

ITALY—THE MINISTRY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information that the Italian Ministry, presided over by Baron Ricasoli, had resigned; and, if so, whether the noble Lord concluded that that resignation was definitive?

LORD STANLEY: I have heard, Sir, that the Italian Ministry has resigned; but whether that resignation is definitive or not, is a question that I am not able to answer.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—THE WAR OFFICE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, in referring to the Notice that stood upon the Paper in his name, announcing his intention of calling the attention of the House to the necessity that exists for a re-organization of the War Office, in order that the efficiency and prompt action of all the subordinate departments may be increased, and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the best means of accomplishing that object, he had to state that when he put that notice upon the paper some days ago, he was ignorant that the right hon. Member for Inverness had a previous Motion upon the same subject upon the paper. Having since been informed of that fact, he begged to withdraw the notice that stood upon the paper in his name.

EDUCATIONAL GRANTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LOWE: Mr. Speaker—I rise to move the Resolution of which I have given notice—

"That this House dissents from so much of the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education as provides for an increase of the Grants now made to Primary Schools."

I have to preface what I have to say upon this subject by congratulating the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu)—and I must also congratulate Her Majesty's Government—upon his accession to the place of Vice President of the Committee of Council. I beg further to congratulate his party and the country upon the appointment to such a position of a nobleman who holds such enlarged and liberal principles upon the subject of education. I read with the greatest pleasure the speech that the noble Lord delivered at his re-election, from which it would appear that we are at last in a fair way to have settled a question which has proved most irritating, vexatious, and difficult. I saw with much pleasure that the noble Lord intends to adhere to the Conscience Clause, which he intends shall be not only the condition upon which building grants to schools are to be made, but also the condition upon which the annual grants are to be made. I read that declaration with the most sincere pleasure, and I hope that when the noble Lord rises to take part in this debate, he will inform us what measures Her Majesty's Government propose to take in order to give the utmost effect to that most wise and auspicious declaration. I must entreat the patience—which I will endeavour not to exhaust—of the House while I draw its attention to this subject, which is of a very abstract and technical character, though I think the issue before us is one that we can all understand. The question we have to determine is, whether the Education Estimates shall be increased by the sum of £70,000, and I ask the House to dissent from that increase being made. I beg not to be misunderstood in making that observation. I would not grudge the sum of £70,000 per annum, or a much larger sum, for the education of the people, if I believed that the money would produce a beneficial effect. I have assisted on more than one occasion in reducing the amount of the grant for public education; but on those occasions I saw that the reductions were consistent with—nay, I believed would be the cause of—the greater efficiency of the system. Therefore, I beg that the House will understand that, although I am a friend to economy, I only uphold economy when combined with efficiency. I think that no sum that this House would grant would be too large if by its aid the education of the people would be rendered more efficient. But the House should recollect that our system of education is a voluntary system, and that it is quite possible to spend large sums upon a voluntary system, not only without increasing, but actually diminishing its efficiency. A voluntary system depends not so much upon grants of public money as upon the spirit of those who volunteer, and if you overload the system by grants of public money you merely clog the efforts of those who are endeavouring to carry it out; you deaden the action of the system rather than enliven it. Now, Sir, in 1862, those who had then the charge of public education saw by the light afforded them by the Report of the Royal Commissioners that the grants were given in such a way, that they were obtained by schools, whether they deserved them or not, that they were given in such a manner as to impede the control that the manager ought to have over his school; that vested interests were being created which it might be difficult to get rid of, that the system was altogether one of great complexity, and that it could not be expected that any ordinary person who did not devote his time to the subject could really understand it. Acting upon these views, we introduced very large and sweeping changes; we reduced the grants from a large number of heads to two. We allowed 4s. on every child for average attendance, and 2s. 4d. for every child who could satisfy the inspector in reading, the same for writing, and the same for arithmetic, making in all 8s. on each child. By this means we reduced the system of grants to something like simplicity. We did away altogether with grants to teachers, thus avoiding the creation of vested interests, and we also did away with the very pernicious practice of giving bounties to pupil-teachers. This latter part of the system then in force was likely to have had a very bad result, because while the Government paid only one-third of the salaries of the adult assistant teachers, they paid the whole of the salaries of the pupil-teachers, thus giving a premium upon the employment of pupil instead of adult teachers. It is necessary that I should state these facts in order that the House may fully understand the state of things with which we had to deal. The alterations of 1862 created a great panic among the managers of schools, who succeeded not only in frightening the public but themselves also—

“Scared by the noise themselves had made,” and no doubt for a year or two that panic had a most injurious effect upon the extension of the system. Since that period, however, the advance that the system of education has made has shown that the plan of 1862 has worked most satisfactorily. The increase in the number of schools since 1862 has been 1,035, while the number of pupils has increased by 110,000, and this increase in efficiency has been effected with a saving of expenditure, as calculated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce), of £400,000, but which I am inclined to place at £100,000 higher. We are now asked to add £70,000 to the expenditure, and I should be only too happy to assent to that proposal if I thought that the public would receive a quid pro quo for their money; but I am afraid that by this additional expenditure we shall not be extending the advantages of the present system or giving any real impulse to education. On the contrary, I believe that this additional grant will be wasted where its effect is not mischievous. These certainly are strong assertions, but I will endeavour to prove their truth. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) in proposing this Minute said, that there were three faults in the present system—the first was that the smaller schools were unable to comply with the conditions of the Revised Code—that is, that the conditions were too hard and too stringent for these small schools to comply with them, and that they therefore lost the grant. The second objection was that too much attention was given to reading, writing, and arithmetic—the subjects beyond them of geography, astronomy, grammar, and history being much neglected, and that the pupils were not thoroughly well taught, and, in proof of this allegation, he showed how few pupils passed through the three uppermost examinations. The third objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman was that, under the present system, the number of pupil-teachers had declined very much indeed, and this he considered to be a very great blow to education. [Mr. CORRY: Hear, hear!] I gather from that expression of assent from the right hon. Gentleman that I have stated his objections correctly, and I need scarcely say that it is my desire to state them as accurately as possible. Now, with regard to the first of these objections, I am not sure that the fact upon which it is founded can be considered an evil. I believe that whatever grants are made they should be uniform, and that if the grants are to bear hardly upon any schools, it should be on the smaller ones, as there is a tendency in the denominational system under which education in England is regulated to make schools small. Each denomination likes its own school. Where there should be only one school there are two or three. I cannot think that that is an evil which counteracts this spirit of subdivision and dispersion, and induces the denominations to coalesce in schools where the education will be better, and where the money will go much further. For the sake of argument, however, I will admit that the regulation upon this point is an evil, and I will presently proceed to show how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to remedy it. I do not see that there is any force in the right hon. Gentleman's second objection, which alleges that reading, writing, and arithmetic are attended to, to the neglect of higher branches of study. This system of education is not intended to apply to the upper or the middle classes, but to those who are too poor to pay for education themselves. It is a very anomalous system to say the least of it, and I think that we cannot too firmly direct our view to its essential portions, disregarding that which I may, perhaps, describe as its ornamental features. There can be no doubt that an enormous number of children leave school before they are twelve years of age, and if we can teach them to read with facility, to write legibly, and to cast accounts, I think we do a great deal. It is more than we have been able to do up to the present time. My right hon. Friend, however, while complaining of neglect in this direction, complains also that the higher subjects are not sufficiently well taught; but it seems to me that one objection answers the other, for if they cannot teach children to read and write during their school life, what chance have they of teaching them grammar or geography? Then, as to the decline in the number of pupil-teachers. The number of pupil-teachers was artificially increased by the determination of the Privy Council to pay the whole of their salaries from the public money, while a third only of those of the adult teachers was so paid. That policy, of course, gave an enormous bounty upon the employment of pupil-teachers, and it always appeared to me that that was a false principle, contrary even to the very rudiments of political economy. It must also be remembered that until 1862 the teachers received a grant in augmentation of their salaries. This augmentation was then withdrawn, and it was determined that the money should be paid to the managers to do as they pleased with it—a course by which the Government and the teachers were no longer brought into contact with each other. That course was, no doubt, necessary, because vested interests, which would have been intolerable, were growing up under the old system. Having taken the teachers, however, from the hands of Government, and having handed them over to the iron laws of political economy, we now, when the bitterness of grief is past, begin again to tamper with those laws of political economy in a contrary direction, and after throwing the teachers upon the market we now proceed by our bounty to create an artificial supply of competitors. I have been no advocate of certificated masters; it has been my misfortune before now to give them great displeasure; but I cannot conceive greater injustice to that class than to send them into the market, and then artificially to glut that market with competitors, who but for our conduct would not be there. I entirely dissent, therefore, from my right hon. Friend's statement of grievances; and, so dissenting, I cannot be expected to assent to the remedies he proposes. I will, however, for the present, waive all question of assent, and proceed to inquire how far his proposals will remedy the evils of which he complains. I will state what I regard as a crying evil. The crying evil is not, I think, the inevitable fact that while small schools are more expensive to maintain than large ones we are obliged to apply the same measure in all cases. That fact is inseparable from the principles of rendering Government assistance, and the adoption of any other course would give rise to endless disputes. That is not the difficulty of the system. The difficulty is that, being a voluntary system, it is liable to break down for want of volunteers. There are many parishes in the country where persons will not come forward to assist schools. Consequently those parishes whose inhabitants contribute to the taxes, as well as others, and who have children to be brought up by the State, see this golden river of the Privy Council flowing past them without leaving any of its wealth on their shores. If my right hon. Friend had come forward to supplement what has been done without destroying the system as it exists, I should have thought £70,000, or even a much larger sum, a very small amount to pay for such an object. But the fault of the system does not lie in the direction that my right hon. Friend, from the short time that he has had experience of the office, has not unnaturally supposed it to lie. Now, I come to see how far the remedies which my right hon. Friend proposes are calculated to attain the object for which they are intended. He lays substantially two minutes before us—the one addressed to the question of pupil-teachers, and the other to the question of capitation. At present the school has to employ one certificated master or assistant teacher for every eighty children after the first fifty, and in the new grant he proposes to reduce the number of pupils from which you are to take the departure from fifty to twenty-five. He then proposes to give a grant of £8, I think, for every pupil-teacher who passes a first-class examination in a training college, and £5 for every pupil-teacher who passes a second-class examination. I may inform my hon. Friend (Mr. Stuart Mill) that this ungallant minute refers entirely to the male sex, excluding the female pupil-teachers altogether. Now, this grant will, no doubt, be very acceptable to those schools which by means of capital, energy, and enterprize have done well, and which are well furnished with pupil-teachers, but it will not afford any stimulus to schools which do not possess these advantages. This is a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. The cost of a pupil-teacher we assumed to be £15 a year, and consequently those who do not already employ the pupil-teachers will not be induced to do so by this grant, because by doing so they will sustain a heavy pecuniary loss. They will have to advance the salary of the pupil-teacher for several years, amounting to perhaps £50, and will receive perhaps £8 at the end of them, perhaps nothing. Now, a grant of that kind I call a waste, because it will be given to those whose present arrangements will entitle them to it, while, owing to the great discrepancy between the amount of the grant and the expense which would be incurred to obtain it, it will not stimulate the employment of fresh pupil-teachers. Even admitting, therefore—a thing that I entirely dispute—that it is right and proper to spend the public money in turning the market against the certificated masters whom we have deprived of their augmentation, the money would, I believe, still be wasted. I now come to the more important and the more complicated part of the matter. At present 2s. 8d. is granted to the managers of the schools for every child who passes in reading, writing, and arithmetic. This grant my right hon. Friend proposes to increase by 1s. 4d., but he attaches to the payment of the grant to a school the condition that the passes in reading, writing, and arithmetic must exceed 200 per cent of the annual average number of scholars in attendance who are over six years of age—a condition which I take to mean that the passes must be twice as numerous as the pupils above that age, or that each pupil above six years old must pass in two subjects. He then says that the school must have at least one-fifth of the scholars above six years of age passed in the three upper standards, and he says, moreover, that there must be one subject besides reading, writing, and arithmetic in which the inspector shall report the children to be proficient. Now, I would not grudge this or any larger increase if I thought it would do good; but let us take my right hon. Friend's own showing that this is intended to benefit the small schools. Observe, we begin by paying to all schools, small or great. My right hon. Friend will not dispute for a moment, I am sure, that the larger schools are amply paid under the present system. The large schools already get quite as much as we should wish, and perhaps in some cases more. Where a school is in a town and is attended by the children of respectable people who can pay, and pay handsomely, it is in a prosperous state and can afford that tuition which enables it to obtain large grants; but where a school is small and in a remote locality it cannot afford to do so. What, then, does my right hon. Friend propose? He says he wants to help small schools, and in order to help them he gives a grant, 99-100ths of which will go to the large schools which do not want it, while the small schools can only get the remainder by complying with very strict and difficult conditions which they are notoriously unable to comply with, for they are the very schools which, as he himself admits, are unable to satisfy the existing requirements of the Privy Council. So that the course we are asked to pursue is to make a grant for the aid of small schools, the lion's share, and much more than the lion's share, of which shall go to the large schools, which do not want it: and as to the remainder, to clog it with conditions which shall prevent the small schools getting even that. And that is what is called stimulating and assisting small schools! Sir, if that is not a waste of public money, I do not know what is. It is doubtless desirable to assist small schools if possible, but the difficulties are great. In assisting small schools there are two principles upon which we may proceed. If we are to give grants for efficiency, it is impossible to assist small and poor schools to the same extent that we do large ones. If we are to give it for need, we may indeed do that, but it will break down the whole system. Between these two alternatives we are placed, and what I submit is that my right hon. Friend has not extricated himself from either. He has not broken down his system by giving to poor schools, but what he has done is this—while he has had in view giving assistance to small schools, poorly supported and weak in their staff, he has really given a quantity of prizes to large schools that do not want it. I do hope, therefore, that the House will pause before they grant £70,000 to be expended in this manner. As I said before, it is not here that the shoe pinches; it is in a different direction—it is in the inability of the voluntary system to extend itself all over the country. I think my right hon. Friend has turned his attention in the wrong direction. The problem he had to solve was not to give more grants to schools that do not want it, in the vain hope of giving it to those which do, but to extend the system and make it pervade the country. Education I know has an all-atoning sound, and it appears very invidious to refuse anything that is asked for in its name. If my right hon. Friend can show us that this money will do any substantial good to the cause of education, by all means let us vote it; but, till I am answered, I shall maintain that I have shown the House that the objects which my right hon. Friend wishes to attain are not objects which it is peculiarly desirable to attain, while even assuming that they are desirable his means entirely miss the end he has in view. They would not in reality largely increase the number of pupil-teachers, they would not give any impulse to studies beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic, and would not do anything worth speaking of towards helping small schools; for, while my right hon. Friend makes grants and spends an enormous sum of public money to be able to include them, he annexes conditions which would effectually exclude them. It is like the old story of the man who could not think of any way of roasting his pig except burning down his house. I beg to submit this also—that having got a system which works efficiently and economically, we should do wisely for the present to let it alone; and for this reason—that such is the feeling of nervousness and anxiety all over the country from the changes that have been made, and made under the compulsion of the Report of the Commission, that even a beneficial change—a change by which more public money finds its way to managers of schools—will be looked upon with jealousy, because it will shake the feeling that this matter is not likely to be tampered with. I think managers of schools are entitled to this security as long as the system under which they act does really perform what its projectors contemplated. As long as schools go on increasing, and the attendance of children becomes larger year by year—as long as the grant is kept within reasonable proportions, we should not interfere with it and alter the conditions, because the inference is obvious, that the same interference which in a hot fit adds to these grants, may, in a cold fit, take away from them. Nothing is more desirable than that those on whose money we count to support the schools should feel that they have something permanent and definite on which they can count, and adapt their arrangements to it. I am quite sure that the changes which were made in 1862, however much they were repined at at the time, have given the present system a new lease and a new chance. I do not regard that system as abstractedly right, and I have never concealed that opinion; but I should be most unwilling to see it swept away, because before a new system could be organized on its ruins—and it has struck deep roots into the country—the education of one generation of Englishmen would be nearly lost in the course of the transition from the old to the new. Try, therefore, by all the means you can to extend the system where it has not yet reached ; keep it economical, that it may be popular and tolerable ; above all things, look carefully to its efficiency, and then I think we shall be in a condition, when some few years have passed, to see whether the system can be moulded or extended so as to be worthy to be a national system, or whether it must give way to something more logical. Of this I am quite sure, that those are the worst enemies of the system who, for whatever reason, tamper with it—whether from feeling the difficulties which managers have to contend with, or perhaps from a feeling of the great popularity to be gained all over the country by undoing changes which were wrought out with so much unpopularity to those who made them. If once it is understood that he who tries to economise the public money and to secure efficiency is only labouring to give some one else a douceur to give away and so acquire popularity, the death knell of the system is sounded, and it must make way for something which, whether more efficient or not, will be more in accordance with the feelings of Parliament and the reasonable wants of the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House dissents from so much of the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education as provides for an increase of the Grants now made to Primary Schools,"—(Mr. Lowe),

—instead thereof.

MR. CORRY : Although I am no longer connected with the Department which this Minute concerns, yet as the author of the plan on which it is founded, I think it right to say a few words in its defence. My right hon. Friend has stated that while he regarded it as a great mistake to add £70,000 to the Education Vote, he would not complain of that large expenditure if he believed it would conduce to any useful purpose ; but that not believing it would do so, he felt it his duty to oppose it. I quite agree that if this additional expenditure would not serve any useful end the House ought to refuse to grant it ; but I am convinced not only that it will be usefully employed, but that the state of education in some of the schools receiving a public grant is becoming such as to render it absolutely necessary. My right hon. Friend has remarked that one of the objects of the Minute is to give assistance to small schools, which is quite true. But he has added that he does not look on the exclusion of small schools from sharing in the grants as an evil. My right hon. Friend stated on a recent occasion that his position was one of isolation, and that he could not get any one to agree with him. But in this instance he does not even agree with himself ; because in 1862, when he explained the Revised Code to the House, after having enumerated 964 parishes, in five counties only, having a population of less than 600, which derived no assistance from the State, he said—

"These districts contribute to the revenue equally with others ; and it is exceedingly desirable, on the ground both of justice and policy, that they should receive back some share of the money."—[3 Hansard, clxv. 199.]

Yet my right hon. Friend now thinks the exclusion of small schools is not an evil.

MR. LOWE : Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain ? What I said was, that I thought the exclusion of small schools was a great evil ; but that it was not a great evil that small schools should be more expensive to maintain than large ones.

MR. CORRY : I am glad to find that my right hon. Friend admits the exclusion of small schools to be a great evil. It must, therefore, be desirable to give them some assistance. My right hon. Friend went on to state that although it had been complained that under the existing system the education given in schools was almost exclusively confined to reading, writing, and arithmetic—grammar, English history, and geography being neglected—he did not think that that was an evil, because the great object in educating the children of the poor was to teach them reading, writing, and arithmetic. On a former occasion I quoted the opinions of some of the most intelligent of the inspectors of schools, who agreed in regretting the practical exclusion of higher subjects. I do not want to introduce any very ambitious system of education ; but I certainly think it desirable that children should know something of the country in which they live, and something of what its history has been. During the autumn I happened to be in a country town, in which there were several Protestant schools and one Roman Catholic school. I happened one day to meet a respectable looking boy and got into conversation with him. In answer to my questions he told me he was eleven years old, and had lately left school, that he had never learnt anything of geography, and had never heard of such places as Dublin, or Edinburgh. I then asked him whether he had been at the Roman Catholic or at a Protestant school? He said a Protestant, and when I further inquired if he knew the difference between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic, he said, "Oh! the Roman Catholics are people who burn candles in the daylight,"—which this intelligent youth considered a convincing proof of the errors of Popery. I am not quite certain whether the boy's answers may not have put it into my head that this was a common case of neglect in all schools, and so have led to the inquiry which resulted in the framing of this Minute. My right hon. Friend alleges that if the reading, writing, and arithmetic are not in a satisfactory state it affords a conclusive argument against teaching boys grammar and history; but I remember quite well that when I proposed my Minute, some weeks ago, my predecessor in the office of Vice President of the Council (Mr. Bruce)—for whose ability and judgment everything that I saw when I was in that office inspired me with the greatest respect—agreed with me, and disagreed with my right hon. Friend; for he stated that, in his experience, in whatever schools the higher subjects were successfully taught, there also reading, writing, and arithmetic were also found to be most carefully attended to. Therefore, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe), I think, fails to make out his argument that teaching the higher subjects tends to weaken the instruction in the elementary branches. With regard to the number of children examined and their proficiency, I will again state what the latest statistics show. The average attendance of children in England and Wales for the year ending the 31st of August was 863,240, of which number 566,371 were presented for examination. 284,027 of these passed the three lower standards, and upwards of 80,000 in the fifth or higher standard. But the number of those who passed Standard VI, or the highest standard, was 13,000 only, out of a total of 566,000. My right hon. Friend stated, not in a speech, but in a much more formal manner—that is to say, in the Report of the Committee of Council for Education for the years 1861-2, drawn up by himself and by my noble Friend Lord Granville—

"We regret that our first proposal to examine children for grants according to their age had to be withdrawn. We cannot think that the opposition which this measure, adopted upon the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, encountered rested upon good grounds. The school itself, for the purpose of instruction, must, of course, have continued to be organized according to proficiency; but age and proficiency coincide, in fact, far oftener than not. The change of arrangement for examination (supposing such a change to be necessary, which it is not) would have been partial only. The reason for examining according to age was this; the amount of proficiency required by Standard VI. represents the minimum of book instruction which can be put to practical use in life. Less than this is almost sure to be forgotten, because it cannot be used with pleasure or profit."

Only 13,000, therefore, out of 566,000 have attained the standard which my right hon. Friend thinks the minimum amount of book learning that can be of practical use to a child. When it became my duty to consider these things I came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary to give some further encouragement to education, and to raise it from the state of stagnation in which I found it. With that view I recommended to Her Majesty's Government, by whom it was adopted, the Minute which I had the honour to propose some weeks ago. My right hon. Friend refers to pupil-teachers, and considers there is no necessity for encouraging an increase of their numbers. But men who know as much of education as my right hon. Friend himself—Mr. Tuffnell, for instance, in his evidence before the Education Committee, and nearly the whole of the twenty-three inspectors of schools in England, whose general Reports are appended to the last Report of the Committee of Council—allude not only to the decline in the number of pupil-teachers, but express the greatest alarm at the growing deficiency. I will not trouble the House with quotations; but the deterioration in the character of the education given in some of our schools is almost universally attributed to the falling off in the number of the pupil-teachers. My right hon. Friend talks of this attempt of mine to increase the number of pupil-teachers as inconsistent with the principles of political economy. I do not care what the principles of political economy may be; but this I will say, that, as the Minister charged with the education of the people of the country, when I found a great falling off in teaching power, and by the reduction in the number of pupil-teachers a great injury resulting to the education of the children, and when

I found, moreover, a great diminution in the supply of candidates for the certificate, threatening to break down the whole system of certificated teachers, it appeared to me that my duty was clear to take immediate action, and I lost no time in submitting the outlines of the Minute for the consideration of the Cabinet. I do not care whether I violated the rules of political economy or not; my object was to improve the quality of the teaching in the schools by increasing the number of pupil-teachers; and, notwithstanding the sinister auguries of my right hon. Friend, I have no doubt that the Minute will effect the object at which it aims. My right hon. Friend says that before the introduction of the Revised Code, the salary of a pupil-teacher was £15 on the average of the five years of apprenticeship. But at that time the State paid the salary of the pupil-teacher, and the State always pays more than persons in private life. I inquired a short time ago from a very intelligent diocesan inspector what was the average rate of payment to pupil-teachers in his district, and he told me about £9 a year. That was in a rural district; in an urban district it would undoubtedly be higher. But, at all events, the rate of £15 put by my right hon. Friend is far above the present average even in large towns. As to the cost of an extra pupil-teacher, you must remember that additional teaching power can hardly fail to produce additional results of teaching; and that it must, therefore, be assumed that the number of passes would be increased by the employment of a greater number of pupil-teachers. In looking over one of the Inspectors' Reports recently received, but not yet presented to the House, I found a particular school mentioned, in which a pupil-teacher having been dismissed, through the poverty of the school, there had been a falling off of 30 per cent in the number of the passes, and, of course, the payment on results to which the school was entitled was diminished in proportion. It may naturally be inferred that if, under this Minute, a pupil-teacher is again employed in this school, the payment on passes would be restored to its former amount, which would be a further contribution towards the salary of the pupil-teacher. My right hon. Friend is of opinion that the educational conditions required by the Minute are too stringent, and that few schools will be able to fulfil them; but they were very carefully considered by my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India (Sir Stafford Northcote), by Mr. Lingen, and by two of the inspectors of schools, and they all came to the conclusion that they were not too severe. In point of fact, the conditions, in general, require less than what the average of schools now accomplish—our object being to place the increased rate of payment within the reach of indifferent schools, and thus lead to their improvement. One of the points made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) was that this additional grant of £8 would be mainly for the benefit of large schools which did not want it, to the exclusion of others by which it was really more needed. But I can assure my right hon. Friend that he is quite wrong in that respect. He says all these large schools are very rich. I believe a great many of them are very poor. A clergyman—the incumbent of a parish in London—told me some time ago that the managers of the school in his district were obliged to work it at the minimum cost possible—which he explained to mean that, whenever the limit as to numbers prescribed by the Code was reached, they suspended the further entry of children, as their funds could not afford the expense of an additional pupil-teacher. That is a state of things far from satisfactory. The effect, then, of this Minute will be not only to give assistance to necessitous small schools, but also to such large schools as may require it. I should have thought that my right hon. Friend would have been the very last person in the House to object to the Minute, because its objects are in strict conformity with the views which he himself expressed in the year 1862, but which the Revised Code has in some respects failed to realize. It offers some assistance to small schools with the view of helping them to fulfil the conditions which would entitle them to a public grant—and this my right hon. Friend stated to be in accordance with every principle of policy and justice. It holds out inducements to improved teaching, and I have shown that, under the existing system, the results fall far below the minimum which my right hon. Friend considers indispensable. It encourages the employment of a pupil-teacher where there are sixty-five children in average attendance, instead of ninety, as at present, and the original draft of the Revised Code, as prepared by my right hon. Friend, proposed that there should be a pupil-teacher for every thirty children. If you are of opinion that one unassisted teacher can be capable of instructing eighty-nine children of various ages, vote with the right hon. Gentleman—if not, vote with me. If you consider the results of the examinations, as shown by the statistics I have quoted, to be satisfactory, vote with him—if not vote with me. In short, if you wish to discourage education you will vote with him, but if you wish to encourage it, you will vote with me.

MR. POWELL said, that on former occasions he had made complaints of the continual changes of the system, on the ground that they produced uncertainty and prevented its extension and expansion. But the difficulty arose to a great extent from the fact that all the changes had been in the direction of economy. It was rather surprising, in the present state of politics, to find the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) such a persistent advocate for fixity and permanence of system. The right hon. Gentleman looked upon the Revised Code with the view of some ancient law-giver, who desired that his laws should remain in a state of fixedness. The right hon. Gentleman himself stated, before the Committee on Education, that he—

“Considered the Minutes as they then existed did very well, and felt like Lycurgus did when he made the Spartans promise to keep his laws until he came back again.”

But even Lycurgus was a benevolent man, and would have had no objection to an improvement of his laws to meet an altered state of society. He (Mr. Powell) hoped that means would be found to improve our educational system which would be consistent with perfect efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to underrate the difficulty of school management; and he had not borne in mind the necessity for a high standard of teaching. The children of the working classes came from homes where books were rare, and the faculty for using them with advantage rarer still; and this rendered it necessary that they should have a much more powerful teaching staff. No doubt there was a great diminution of pupil-teachers. This would cause in time a reduction in the number of masters. Therefore, the Government were bound to take into consideration this state of things. The deficiency existed more with regard to males than females; and therefore he thought that the Government had done right in giving the greater stimulus to male teachers. No doubt with regard to small schools the great difficulty had been that they did not receive sufficient assistance from educational grants. In many small parishes there did exist schools; but the education was of a very defective character, and he understood that it was the intention of the Government gently to draw these schools within their influence, and to supply them with a higher class of teachers, in the hope that education might receive a corresponding advance. He believed that under the proposed system a considerable number of small schools would be drawn within Government influence. The right hon. Gentleman omitted to consider that as schools increased they would require an increased number of pupil-teachers; that they must increase the number of pupil-teachers to supply the place of those who passed into training colleges; and that inducements must be offered to managers to effect these objects. He (Mr. Powell) thought that it was a wise and just provision that children must pass a higher standard in a greater proportion before the schools could derive advantage from the increased grant; for there was reason to suppose that the children were too often kept within the lower standard. He believed that the absence of teaching in the higher subjects was a great deficiency of our present system, and that they should teach reading and writing with a double object—first, that of merely teaching it; and secondly, that of impressing the minds of the pupils with higher knowledge. In some parts of the Continent education had been narrowed, as with us, to its very elements; but last year a proposal was made to improve education in France, and part of the plan was to teach geography and the history of the country. The Minute appeared to him to be beneficial.

MR. BRUCE said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) had divided his attack on the Minute into two parts. In the first place, he said that nothing was required; in the second place, he argued that if anything was required the present attempt to overcome the objections to the Revised Code was ineffective and futile. Great as had been the exertions of his right hon. Friend, great as had been his courage, and great as had been his public virtue in passing that Code, still he (Mr. Bruce) was far from saying that the system was perfect and could not be improved. What had been the immediate effect of the Revised Code? All must agree that it had pressed very heavily on the resources of the managers. He had stated the other day, and he adhered to the calculation, that the schools were now receiving two-fifths less than they would have received under the old Code—namely, £622,000 instead of £1,000,000. Economy was a great advantage; but his right hon. Friend had himself said that if it could be shown that the schools had suffered by an excess of economy he should be the first to sanction a larger grant. His right hon. Friend had referred to certain defects as being inherent in the voluntary system.

MR. LOWE said, his remark was that the proper course would be to try whether that system could not be supplemented.

MR. BRUCE said, his right hon. Friend in his last speech on the subject had warned the House against the patching-up of the system. It was, indeed, a defective system; but whose fault was that? Over and over again Parliament had been asked by statesmen of the greatest eminence to endow the country with a system which would be adequate to its wants, and to supply it with a really national system of education. Earl Russell had asked Parliament to lay down the principle that every district should be obliged to supply itself with schools. A proposal had also been made by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) that such districts should be at liberty to levy rates to defray the cost of schools. The House, however, refused to adopt either principle, and the result was that the Committee of Council on Education were compelled to adopt the present system, which, he admitted, was a wasteful one. He stated the other day that a small school ordinarily cost from 35s. to 45s. per head on the inhabitants of the place, whereas a large school could generally be conducted at a cost of between 18s. and 25s. per head. Those figures showed plainly enough that, if possible, more assistance should be given to small schools than to large ones. But when the attempt was made to remedy the defects of the system, which was less generous to the poor than to the rich districts, it was met by the opposition of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe). The practical difficulty was to define what were large and what were small schools. At present about 9s. per head was given to all scholars alike by the Government, and the consequence was that the small schools laboured under difficulties unfelt by the larger ones. Unfortunately, too, financial difficulty meant imperfect teaching. Nobody had been more strenuous than his right hon. Friend in asserting the principle that a school depended upon the teacher, and that a certificated teacher was essential to a good school. He (Mr. Bruce) went even further than that, and maintained that a sufficient staff of masters was more especially essential in small schools. The difficulties encountered by small schools in reference to the subdivision of classes were very great indeed. Having but few masters it became necessary for them to group together children of very different attainments, and the consequence was that the progress made by the pupils was less than in the large schools. When he held office in connection with the Committee of Council on Education, he felt that the small schools were suffering on account of their not possessing a sufficient amount of teaching power, and his noble Friend (Earl Granville) and himself accordingly tried to devise means for remedying the evil. Without saying that the proposals which they would have brought under the notice of Parliament were identical with those submitted by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry), he must at least admit that they would have been similar in principle. In regard to this matter he felt bound to say that the Revised Code was partly to blame. Under the old Code, after the first fifty children a pupil-teacher might be employed for every forty children, and, being paid by the State, he always was employed. The result was that there was always a staff of teachers adequate to, and sometimes in excess of, the requirements of the school. Under the Revised Code it was not necessary to employ a second teacher until the number of children reached ninety, and the result was that the minimum number of teachers required to obtain the grant were almost invariably engaged, to the manifest injury of the school. No doubt great benefits had been derived from other parts of the system, such as the scheme of individual examinations; but those benefits had been diminished in consequence of there not being sufficient teaching power. In 1861 the number of pupil-teachers was about 16,000; but now, when there were about 350,000 more children in the schools than there were then, the number of teachers was reduced to about 11,000. Yet at this very time Parliament was engaged in considering measures to compel children to go to school under the half-time system, the effect of which would be to send hundreds of thousands to schools. Should it, then, be to good or to bad schools? In his judgment, it would be well to insist that children employed on the half-time system should be sent only to such schools as were provided with certificated masters. When they were about largely to increase the number of schools there was no fear, in this country at least, that the position of the certificated masters would be injured by an excess of supply. The evidence of the representatives of the British and Foreign Schools, before the Select Committees which sat in 1865 and 1866, was in favour of certificated masters, and they said that the reason why they were debarred from receiving assistance from the State was because they could not get a sufficient supply of such masters. Such being the case, was it not the duty of the State, which had undertaken so much for the education of the people, to provide also for the supply of sufficient and competent masters? His right hon. Friend had said that if any schools were to suffer it was well that the small schools should, because their smallness was owing to the denominational system which multiplied schools unnecessarily. But surely his right hon. Friend must be aware that the fact of a school being small was generally owing to the thinness of the population, and that the small schools were ordinarily to be found in the rural districts. Therefore, they had a prima facie claim for a special amount of assistance. But the right hon. Gentleman said that the effect of giving increased assistance would be not that the small schools which required it would receive it, but that some large schools which were already more than sufficiently paid would receive in most cases this assistance, without wanting it. It was undoubtedly true that large schools in flourishing districts might often do without State assistance at all; but that was the result of the existing system, and Parliament had over and over again refused to adopt a wiser and more elastic one. At the same time there were many large schools, for the maintenance of which the necessary funds could not be at all easily raised. In the East of London, for instance, and in the outskirts of all our populous towns, it would almost be impossible to obtain the requisite funds without raising the fees, and the effect of raising the fees would obviously be to keep the poorest children away from the schools. He was far from finding fault with the Minute of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry), because it was too liberal; indeed, as the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken the task of dealing with these defects in our system, he wished he had been more liberal. Instead of the 800,000 or 900,000 now at school in England and Wales, there ought to be 2,000,000. A great many schools were kept from receiving State assistance because they were unable to comply with the pecuniary conditions required by the Government. By the proposals of the Government the grant to a school of 100 children could not exceed £8, and this could not be earned except upon conditions which, however wholesome in themselves, were difficult to comply with. It was proposed that an additional grant, which certainly would not have the effect of choking and overwhelming the voluntary system, should be made to all schools with an average attendance of sixty-five children. Even that additional grant, however, could not be made without conditions. It was certainly right and desirable that every child on leaving school should know reading, writing, and arithmetic, and, indeed, in his opinion, they ought also to know something of geography, history, and other subjects. He repeated the assertion he had made on another occasion, that where these subjects were taught best the lower branches of instruction were also best taught. The results desiderated could be attained only by increasing the teaching staff; and vast numbers of schools were at present unable to employ certificated masters. The new Minute had in view the double object of increasing the teaching power in our schools and of raising the standard of elementary education. Whether the measures proposed were sufficient or not, time would prove. But they were in the right direction, and had therefore his sympathy and support.

MR. HENLEY said, he had listened with great interest to what fell from the right hon. Member (Mr. Lowe) in the attack he made on the Minute. Having heard the answer, he could not say that the attack had been sustained. There could be no doubt that when the Revised Code came into operation, there was a tendency to a great redundancy of pupil-teachers; but that tendency had been checked. It would be interesting to learn from figures, which must be accessible, the number of certificated masters that would probably meet the wants of the country; and the average yearly number of pupil-teachers it would take to supply that want. The matter was one calling for nicety of calculation, which, perhaps, no one official person alone could make. He would not venture to express an opinion as to whether a surplus was being created; but he was quite disposed to bow to the authority of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Corry), who had the best opportunities of forming a judgment; and both the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce) seemed to consider that there was a falling off, and that something was required to bring the number up again. There could be no reasonable objection to that part of the Minute which related to the aiding of the smaller schools. He hailed it as a pleasing symptom, and as an evidence of an indisposition to be bound by cast-iron rule. It must be remembered that the Privy Council really aided the voluntary effort of the country; that there was no system apart from that effort; and that the Government simply afforded in grants a limited amount of public money, to supplement the still greater voluntary contributions of the public. Sometimes the Privy Council was disposed to look too closely into the circumstances of a case which might greatly need their aid, and which their system did not reach. He had never spoken on this subject without expressing his regret that the Privy Council did not think that it came within the scope of their duty to endeavour to reach many of those forlorn children which in all great centres of the population were left untouched and without any assistance at all. They were the most needy, and yet they never had anything. He was consoled, however, by the fact that the Privy Council, taking a step towards those whom hitherto they had not reached, were in the right path. Therefore he would be sorry to express an opinion hostile to what the Privy Council were doing, and would give his support to the Minute as far as it went. The subject was a difficult one, and no doubt involved an enormous amount of official trouble. It was a great advantage in a public office to lay down a strict rule, and not to deviate from it; but the consequence of that must be that while spending enormous sums in aid, those who most needed aid were not reached. The Minute evinced a disposition to act upon rule, because it had been framed to meet the wants of the smaller schools only; but if some of the larger schools reaped any advantage, he, for one, should not grudge them it. He hoped that those for whom it was primarily intended would be able to take advantage of it.

MR. PUGH, who rose amid cries for a division, said, he would be very short. He knew what time it was, and what hour it struck last—Insonuere cavæ gemitumque dedêre cavernæ.”

He wished to state briefly that he cordially supported the policy of the Government as indicated in this Minute, because it showed their desire to remove some of the difficulties of the rural districts, and to render assistance to their schools. He had no wish to undermine the Revised Code, of which the principle was good—namely, payment for results, and he did not believe the Government wished to undermine it. They were too wise in their generation; but it could not be denied that, while the old Code had ignored the rural districts, the Revised Code had, from the difficulty of the subject, or from other causes, continued the ignoramus. The rural districts had long reminded him of a celebrated character of former times, of mournful celebrity, who said that he came asking but little, and getting less than little, and that sufficient for him; and he went on to say—and the parallel still held good—that his adversities, his antiquity, and the nobility of his nature taught him to be contented. The rural districts had not murmured, had not made themselves heard, had sounded no note of expostulation; but they thought that, in comparison with towns and other highly favoured regions, they were to a certain extent left out in the cold.

“Unconscious they in waste oblivion lie—
In all the world of busy life around
No thought of them.”

And yet it would be unjust to say that their case had not often engaged anxious attention. After a diligent consideration of the question for many years, he was unable to point out any party, or any section of any party in that House, from which there had not at some time proceeded a cordial admission that the Codes, however beneficent in their action in other quarters, had failed to benefit the rural districts.

“Quæ regio in terris nostri non plena laboris?”

But he had a confidence in the wisdom and justice of Parliament that induced him to believe that for Parliament to know of a grievance, to be conscious of its existence, was, sooner or later, effectually to redress it. He believed that the Government were anxious to take a step in that direction, and he thanked them for their good intentions.

MR. HADFIELD said, it would have been far better to have left the question of education in the hands of the people and intrusted it to their voluntary action, than to have deranged the taxation of the country by the making of grants in aid. Many of the young persons who had been trained as pupil-teachers at the expense of the State had turned clerks or adopted some other profitable occupation. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had done himself great honour by his attempts to stem the flow of money from the Public Exchequer for the purpose of education. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) would take the sense of the House; and, sooner or later, it would be proved that he was right.

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 40: Majority 163.

WRITS FOR RE-ELECTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he rose to call attention to the practice of not issuing a Writ for a vacancy in this House if the Seat which has been vacated be claimed on behalf of another Candidate; and to move—

"That whenever a Member of this House shall accept an Office of Profit under the Crown a Writ for a new Election may issue, notwithstanding that the time limited for presenting a Petition may not have expired, or that a Petition praying for the Seat may have been presented."

This was a matter of considerable importance as affecting the general interests of the public. According to the practice of the House, when a petition praying for the seat was presented against any person who had been appointed to an office of profit under the Crown no writ could issue until the petition had been decided. According to the old practice no writ could issue if a petition was merely presented against the return. But in 1852 it was decided by the House, in the cases of

Southampton and Carlow, that the writ should issue in those cases where the seat was not prayed for. He could see no difference between the cases where seats were prayed for and where they were not. By the present practice no writ for a re-election could be issued at the commencement of a new Parliament until after fourteen days of the meeting of the House. If on the death of Lord Palmerston Earl Russell had not been able to form a Ministry, and Earl Derby had been called upon to form a Government, the consequence would have been that the Members of the Government could not have taken their seats in the House until three weeks after the meeting of Parliament, fourteen days being required to elapse before the writ could be moved to see whether petitions against their return would be presented. Last year, at the commencement of the first Session of the new Parliament, matters of great public interest came before the House—namely, the Cattle Plague and the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. What would then have been the result if the Members of Her Majesty's Government having seats in the House had been petitioned against and the seats prayed for? If therefore they balanced any supposed personal advantage under the present system against public convenience, private feeling should give way to the latter. That a seat was prayed for was no ground for preventing a dissolution of Parliament by Her Majesty's command; why, then, should it be a reason for preventing the issue of a new writ when it might be for the public advantage that a writ should be issued? The present practice was also liable to abuse. On that ground also it required to be altered. Any person wishing to keep a Minister out of his seat for the purpose of gratifying a malicious feeling, might, at the last moment, present a petition praying for the seat, and thereby keep a Minister out of his place in the House for some months. On the last day for presenting petitions at the beginning of the last Session, a Mr. Wellington Shegog presented a petition against the return of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chichester Fortescue), then Chief Secretary for Ireland, on the ground of intimidation, and praying for the seat. Now, it appeared, according to a Return which he moved for, that from 1832 to 1866 not one person had been seated on petition on the ground of intimidation solely. The petition against the right hon. Gentleman was presented on the 20th February, and he was actually kept out of the House until the 12th of March, and might have been for a much longer period had not he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) made a similar Motion to the one then before the House, when the petition was withdrawn. The petition against the return of Mr. Morris was presented on the same day, and was not disposed of until May, and if the petition against the right hon. Gentleman had been tried he would have been kept out of the House a similar lengthened period. That, too, during the discussion with reference to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and other questions of importance relative to Ireland, at a time when his presence was most required. The only ground upon which the present practice could be defended was some supposed interest the person might have in the seat he prayed for. But that was not to be considered for a moment in opposition to the public inconvenience it occasioned. He moved—

MR. SPEAKER said, that by the rules of the House the hon. and learned Member could not then make a Motion, inasmuch as an Amendment had already been moved and negatived on the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had made out no sufficient case for altering the rules of the House on the subject to which he had called attention. That which might turn out to be the property of one person ought not to be given to another. In the very rare event of Cabinet Ministers not being able to take their seats for a fortnight or three weeks as had been described, the Secretary to the Treasury or some of the subordinate officers of the Government who did not vacate their seats might very well discharge the necessary business in their absence.

THE CONVICTS BURTON AND HAY. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GILPIN said, he had given notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the sentence passed by Mr. Baron Bramwell, at the recent Kingston Assizes, upon two prisoners, Burton and Hay, aged twenty-three and twenty-nine, who were indicted before him for burglary, and sentenced to eight and ten years' penal servitude, respectively, and who having been removed from the bar by the police were ordered to be brought back by the Judge, who thereupon sentenced them each to a further term of five years' penal servitude. If, when on a recent occasion he had put a Question on the subject to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) he had been able to inform him that he was acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and that the learned Judge had not proceeded beyond the limits of his authority, he should have abstained from mentioning the matter a second time. It appeared from the accounts which had been given in the newspapers that the two prisoners named had immediately after sentence was pronounced upon them become exceedingly violent in the dock, and had used most outrageous language towards the Judge. From those accounts, not only he himself, but many others supposed that the additional sentence which had been passed upon them was a punishment for their insubordinate conduct in Court. He had since learnt from the right hon. Gentleman, however, that the penalty of five years' penal servitude had been inflicted as part of the original sentence, and that it was perfectly within the discretion of the Judge to impose that increased penalty. Under those circumstances, disclaiming all intention of unnecessarily impugning the sentence of a Court of Justice, or of making, directly or indirectly, a personal attack upon the learned Judge, than which nothing could be further from his views, he should not press the right hon. Gentleman for any further explanation on the subject.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that as a member of the Home Circuit, and an intimate friend of Mr. Baron Bramwell's for many years, he could not allow the subject to drop without making a few observations. He was glad to find that his hon. Friend had withdrawn the Question, and so far had made the amende honorable; but he must say it was rather a hasty course of proceeding in giving notice of the Question. Such questions brought forward without sufficient inquiry and information of the facts had the effect of shaking the authority of the Judges of the land. [MR. GILPIN: No, no!] Such was their practical effect; and therefore it was desirable that they should be very cautious before they called attention to judicial sentences in that House. There was not a more upright or humane Judge on the Bench than Mr. Baron Bramwell, and he would be the last man to be induced from a spirit of anger or ill-judged feeling to aggravate a sentence on a fellow-creature. Such insinuations were worse than direct charges. He, however, accepted the hon. Gentleman's disclaimer on behalf of Mr. Baron Bramwell and the profession generally.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that nothing could be further from his intention than to make an attack on Mr. Baron Bramwell, and no one was more alive than he to the necessity of upholding the dignity of the judicial Bench, but he could not help thinking that the occurrence in question was unfortunate. The conduct of the prisoners had undoubtedly been most disgraceful, amounting as it did to a very gross contempt of Court. There was no doubt that it was open to the Judge in point of law to increase as he had done the punishment which was originally inflicted upon them. It was not the mere passing but the recording of the sentence which was the decisive act. At the same time it might, he was afraid, appear to the public that the Judge having felt himself insulted by the conduct of the prisoners had lost his temper, and sought to punish the insult offered to his dignity. He thought the incident unfortunate, for anything wearing the appearance of personal feeling on the part of a Judge had a tendency to impair the dignity of the Bench, though there might be no personal feeling in the matter.

CASE OF JOHN TOOMER.—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, that it was with great reluctance that he felt compelled to call attention to an error and exceptional case in the administration of justice, by which he believed that an innocent man had sustained a grievous wrong. He quite acceded to the general proposition laid down the other night by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole), that it was not desirable for that House to interfere with the ordinary course of the administration of justice and to erect itself into a tribunal of criminal appeals. But he was unable to subscribe in the full extent to the doctrine enounced by the right hon. Gentleman that the application for papers in this case was wholly unprecedented. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the House was entitled to an explanation of the grounds on which he had acted; but questioned the right of the House to require the production of documents and papers, without which it would be difficult for the House to form a judgment as to whether the right hon. Gentleman's explanation was satisfactory or not. The House had over and over again obtained that information, the request for which was designated by the right hon. Gentleman to be unprecedented, had acted on it, and had addressed the Crown on the subject of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. He would not dwell on the numerous instances in the reign of Charles II., in which the House had addressed the Crown to obtain the pardon of a criminal; but would refer to one or two precedents in modern times, for he should be sorry if the House supposed that he was leading it into a new and unconstitutional course. In 1814, Lord Ebrington, then a conspicuous Member of the House, moved an Address to the Crown praying for a revision of the sentence passed on Lord Cochrane. In that case the evidence of the trial and the Reports of the Judges were before the House. To show that that was the case, he would read some extracts from Hansard. The following passage was from the speech of the Solicitor General of that time:—

“ Having read and attentively examined the report of the trial, including the evidence, the address of counsel on both sides, and the Charge of the Judge, he should have felt himself bound, were he on the jury, to find Lord Cochrane guilty, were that noble Lord his own brother.”—[1 Hansard, xxviii. 768.]

The Solicitor General then went through the whole of the evidence which had been laid on the table of the House; and the feeling being in favour of the Motion, the Government announced that that portion of the sentence inflicting the punishment of the pillory should not be put in force. In the case of Frost, Williams, and Jones a Motion for an Address to the Crown was made. It was true that the Motion was negatived; but there appeared in the list of the minority no less a name than that of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Disraeli). It was not to be supposed that the high authority of that right hon. Gentleman would have sanctioned an Address praying for mercy if such an Address had been unprecedented and unconstitutional. Upon that occasion Mr. Fox Maule, then Under Secretary for the Home Department, was reported in Hansard to have read to the House the letter of Chief Justice Tindal communicating to the Secretary of State the decision of the Judges on the point reserved; and the reply given by the three Judges who presided at the trial to the memorial presented to them by Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Kelly.—[3 Hansard, lii. 1140.]

In the case of Jessie M'Laughlan the whole of the evidence was laid on the table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that was a peculiar case, but only peculiar cases came before the House. In the case of Townley, no less a person than the present Lord Chief Baron, Sir FitzRoy Kelly, applied for papers, and put precisely the same question to the then Home Secretary as he (Sir Robert Collier) had put to the present Home Secretary. He thought that he had stated enough to show that there was no novelty in the application he had made the other night, though there might be some novelty in the position assumed by the right hon. Gentleman. It behoved the House to investigate the manner in which the tribunal of appeal in the Home Office was worked, not from idle curiosity, but with a view to practical legislation. If many cases occurred, such as this, which he believed to be a case of mistaken severity (and there had been other cases of, he believed, mistaken and disastrous leniency), it would be for the House to consider whether it could not devise some better tribunal of appeal. He would now call attention to the facts of the case which he desired to bring under the notice of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had been courteous enough to inform him that he would produce the memorial sent to the Home Office on behalf of Toomer; but that he did not think it consistent with his duty to produce the notes of the evidence given at the trial. That being so, he must refer to the best sources he could for the evidence, and if any portion of his statement should be incorrect, all he could say was that he had done his best to be accurate. He was at issue with the right hon. Gentleman in limine, for the right hon. Gentleman treated this matter as a question of conflicting evidence; whereas it appeared plain that, according to the evidence of the prosecutrix herself, there ought to have been no conviction. It appeared by that evidence that the prosecutrix having advertised for a situation as governess, Toomer engaged her to teach his daughter music, she having previously, at his request, sent him her photograph, which was approved. When she went to Toomer's house she found that she had been deceived, for there was no daughter or daughters in the house, though she had been led to expect the contrary. She, nevertheless, remained for weeks in the house, and on familiar terms with Toomer, who kissed her and asked her to marry him. The prosecutrix also stated that on one occasion Toomer dragged her through the passage into a back room, undressed her, put her in bed, remained with her all night, and finally effected his purpose. During the whole of the time she was unable to make any alarm, because Toomer prevented her, and, though there were servants in the house, none of them heard any cry. It further appeared that she remained in bed, and in the morning took her breakfast, Toomer going out as usual to his business. She said that she wrote home on that day, and gave the note to the servant to post; but the servant denied that she received any such note, and no such note arrived at the place stated. She said that Toomer came home in the evening, and as he expressed himself penitent she forgave him. On the next day, by her own account, she walked out with him, was on the most familiar terms with him, took tea with him, and remained in the house. Three or four days after she said she was sleeping alone (why she did not explain, for she had been in the habit of sleeping with a servant), and for some unexplained reason she left the door of her room open. During the whole of that night she said that Toomer remained with her, again effected his purpose, but that she was unable to give any alarm, and that at some time next day she made a complaint. He put it to those who were conversant with the administration of justice—to those accustomed to criminal trials—whether even if that evidence of the prosecutrix stood alone, any jury would have convicted. But the case did not stop there. Medical evidence was called in behalf of the prosecution, and it distinctly negatived the possibility of a rape. So strong was the opinion of the medical man called on the trial, that he wrote a letter to the editor of the Berkshire Chronicle, from which he would read an extract. He had been called for the prosecution, and if he had any bias it might be supposed to be on the side for which he was called. Mr. Maurice wrote—

“After examining Miss Partridge I gave evidence before the magistrates that the result of the examination did not support the charge. Your medical readers will know that in consequence of certain rare and exceptional cases I was compelled to be thus guarded; but after Miss Partridge had sworn to prolonged resistance, I was enabled to affirm that the medical evidence disproved the charge.”

The case did not stop there. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman, of course, unintentionally, had led the House into a misunderstanding when he referred to the evidence of the two maid-servants. These two maid-servants were called on the part of the prosecution; and what was their evidence? It was to this effect, that if a rape had been committed and the prosecutrix had called out, they must have heard it, because they were in the house; but they heard nothing. That the prosecutrix had not written to her mother, as she said she had. That on the night of the alleged second rape she had made some excuse for the purpose of sleeping alone. That she had requested the maid-servant who was in the habit of sleeping with her to sleep with her niece, and on the maid-servant drawing her attention to the fact that she had left her door open, she made some trifling excuse. She slept alone therefore that night by her own contrivance. It further appeared, on the part of the prosecution, that she said she expected £20 from Mr. Toomer. He did not pay her that sum, and afterwards she went and gave information. That was the case in substance for the prosecution. Under these circumstances the counsel for the defence, a very eminent and able counsel, his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Huddleston), called no witnesses; and for this reason, it never entered into his imagination to conceive that there could be a verdict of guilty. And he (Sir Robert Collier) did not hesitate to say he was right. He should have done the same thing. The jury retired to deliberate. They came into Court, and said they could not agree. They again retired, and remained in deliberation five hours. Finally they found a verdict of guilty, but coupled with a recommendation to mercy on the ground that the girl had been indiscreet and had encouraged Toomer.

MR. WALPOLE: The jury said there were extenuating circumstances. The Judge asked what were the extenuating circumstances, and the jury replied that the prosecutrix had been indiscreet?

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he thought that amounted to pretty much the same thing. The jury had been locked up five hours. He was not speaking against trial by jury; but he did not agree with the principle of keeping a jury in durance vile, and no doubt in this, as in many other cases, the verdict was the result of a compromise. They were hungry and anxious to get away, and a compromise took place under the idea that only a slight sentence would be passed. He could not help thinking that the verdict almost amounted to this—that Toomer had committed a rape with the girl's consent. The learned Judge passed a sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude—a sentence which, he understood, astonished everybody in court, astonished the counsel on both sides, and astonished the country. That was the case so far as he understood it; and he was bound to say that in the whole course of his experience—and it had not been short—of criminal trials he had never known a conviction for rape founded upon evidence like this. He had conversed with a number of lawyers in Westminster Hall and out of it, and he had not met one—not, indeed, one man who approved the verdict. The public were against it, the Press was against it, it was condemned by public opinion. No doubt his right hon. Friend wished to do justice; but he ventured to think that this was one of those cases in which the prerogative of mercy, vested in the Crown, exercised under the advice of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, ought to have been exercised. There had been many Motions made in that House to the effect that a court of criminal appeal ought to be established; but the usual answer was that we had already a court of criminal appeal in the Home Office, which performed the function of the Courts in granting a new trial. He quite appreciated the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman's position, and he knew that only one motive actuated him which was to do his duty; but, in his humble opinion, this was a case in which it was the duty of the Home Secretary to set aside a verdict which was manifestly wrong. There were many cases in which it was extremely difficult to decide between conflicting evidence; but here there was no balance of conflicting testimony. The case was comparatively simple. On the evidence of the prosecutrix there could be no conviction for rape. The whole case for the prosecution had broken down. The verdict was wrong, and should have been set aside. A memorial had been presented to the right hon. Gentleman, stating very shortly the facts of the case, and laying before him affidavits of persons who would have been called as witnesses at the trial had counsel thought it necessary. The effect of their evidence was shortly this—the next-door neighbours gave their evidence. It appeared that the room in which Toomer slept was separated by so thin a partition that what was said on the other side of the wall could be heard. That affidavit was sworn by a nurse who sat up with a sick person in the room adjoining. She said she could hear conversations which passed in Toomer's house, but on the night in question she heard nothing. That was the night during which the supposed rape took place. It was further shown that the girl had stated that she did not write home to her parents, though she swore that she did. It was shown that she had walked out with Toomer in the country, that she was seen with him, hanging on his arm, grasping both hands together, and playing with his whiskers, and all this between the occasion of the first and second rape. With respect to these affidavits, he did not attach very much weight to them, because the parties who made them might have been examined on the trial, and the affidavits did not contain their cross-examination. What he ventured to affirm was this, that on the case of the prosecution the man ought to have been acquitted. He would now call attention to the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman to the memorial. He stated that he could not advise a pardon to be granted to the prisoner, from the perusal of these documents, unless he was satisfied that the prosecutrix had committed wilful and corrupt perjury. He ventured to say, with all respect for the right hon. Gentleman, that he had misconceived the whole subject. The question was not whether he was bound, upon those affidavits, to determine whether the prosecutrix had committed perjury; but, putting aside those affidavits altogether, whether upon the evidence a just and proper verdict had been returned? There were many instances in which Home Secretaries had determined the question whether upon the case for the prosecution there ought to have been a conviction. If it was not to determine such a question, what was the use of the tribunal of the Home Office? But the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“ Upon no other ground could he be justified in setting aside a verdict given after long deliberation, and entirely approved of by the learned Judge. It appeared to Mr. Walpole that it would be extremely unjust to form such an opinion upon statements which may without any difficulty be made in open court, subject to the test of cross-examination, and in the presence of the jury, who is to judge of the credit to which they are entitled. Mr. Toomer is bound, in the judgment of Mr.

Walpole, to indict Miss Partridge for perjury, upon his own evidence and that of the different persons who now make declarations in his favour, but were not brought forward upon his trial. Unless Mr. Toomer pursues this course, he cannot reasonably expect the Crown to interfere with the decision which has already been pronounced in his case by a competent tribunal.”

He wished to say a few words upon the two grounds put forward by the right hon. Gentleman for refusing to interpose in the case. The first ground was that the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Shee) approved the verdict. He desired to speak with the utmost respect of that learned Judge; and he quite admitted that the opinion of the Judge who tried the case must, and ought to, have weight with the Home Secretary. But he altogether denied that the opinion of the Judge was to be taken as conclusive; for if the Home Secretary was bound to act upon the opinion of the Judge, what became of his appellate functions? It came to this, that they substituted the Judge for the Home Secretary. But the Home Secretary was the Constitutional adviser of the Crown in respect to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy; and his responsibility could not be thrown upon the Judge. It was the duty of the Home Secretary to form his own opinion, giving the weight which was due, but not more than was due, to the opinion of the Judge; and if he saw that, on a review of the whole case, the conviction was wrong, he was bound to disagree with that learned person. Unless, therefore, he was much mistaken in his reading of the facts, he could not help thinking that that was one of those cases in which the Home Secretary was bound to exercise his discretion, and on a review of the whole case, to come to a conclusion different from that of the learned Judge. But, in the next place, the right hon. Gentleman stated that Mr. Toomer ought to indict Miss Partridge for perjury. That was throwing on Mr. Toomer an unreasonable obligation. What would be the result of a prosecution against Miss Partridge for perjury? He appealed to any man having experience of the criminal courts whether such a prosecution was at all likely to be successful. Toomer had no doubt behaved badly; and he would come before the jury with a certain prejudice against him as a man of loose morals. There would be no prepossession in favour of a man—an ironmonger's assistant. Would it not have been suggested by counsel that Miss Partridge had not stated what was wilfully false; that, at the worst, she had only exaggerated ; that she had resisted, but had not resisted quite so much as she had stated ; that she had not surrendered her virtue at the first attack, but had only capitulated after a certain amount of resistance ; and that therefore it could not be said she had committed perjury. That assuredly would have been the line of defence adopted ; and no one could doubt that she would have been acquitted. What, then, would have been the position of Mr. Toomer ? His case would have been hopeless, and he would have had no chance of the remission of any portion of his sentence. Mr. Toomer therefore exercised a wise discretion in not taking that course. It therefore appeared to be a case peculiarly calling for the intervention of the Home Office ; and it seemed to him that the grounds on which that intervention had been withheld were altogether untenable. He would venture to express a hope that, in deference to what he believed to be the public opinion and the opinion of the House, the right hon. Gentleman would give them the assurance that he would now, on re-consideration, advise the Crown to exercise the prerogative of mercy in the case. He was sure that such a statement would be received with great satisfaction by both sides of the House. If some assurance of that kind were not held out, it might become his duty on a subsequent occasion to take the opinion of the House on that subject. But he did not desire to follow that course ; and he trusted that what he had now said would have the effect of eliciting from the right hon. Gentleman some explanation which might be satisfactory to the House.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, there is one observation which I wish to offer before I enter upon the remarks just made by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and it is this, that whatever may be the responsibility of adjudicating upon a case like this, that responsibility rests exclusively with myself. The hon. and learned Gentleman need not have adverted to the fact that the Judge had given an opinion in confirmation of the verdict pronounced by the jury, as if he thought that I was going to shelter myself behind the opinion of the Judge. At the same time, I must observe, from all the experience I have had of what has taken place at the Home Office, that it is the duty of the Home Secretary to hear what the Judge has to say upon the case, and to give great attention to his opinion upon it. In fact, he is the person who can give a better opinion than anybody else as to what were the impressions left upon his mind at the time by the evidence adduced, and by the conduct and demeanour of the witnesses, and also as to what are the impressions still remaining on his mind when he has seen any subsequent declarations. The hon. and learned Gentleman has gone into a very long disquisition upon the facts of this case ; but he will forgive me for saying that I do not think it would become me to enter into his argument at any great length. The position which I have to take up, the position which I think I am bound to take up with reference to such a case as this, is one of neutrality and impartiality. I might traverse a vast number of the facts which the hon. and learned Gentleman has stated to the House. I might point out how he has collected together and put forward all the facts bearing upon one side of the case, as counsel would do in addressing a jury, without adverting to a single fact which weighs materially on the other side. I might point out that when he referred to the first assault, which was made upon the prosecutrix on the Wednesday preceding the Sunday, he entirely omitted all allusion to the struggles which took place, all allusion to the prisoner's producing a revolver and threatening in effect that her life might be in danger if she did not yield to him. I might advert to the night when the distinct crime was committed with which he was charged, and to the fact that the reason why she did not cry out was because the way in which he was alleged to have treated her, made it impossible for her to do so. I might still further refer to the circumstance—which the hon. and learned Gentleman wholly omitted—of her going to her room at night with the full belief that the maid-servant was to sleep with her, as she had done before, and of her being asleep in the room when Toomer came in and took her by surprise, and subjected her to these assaults. I should not have even alluded to these facts except for the purpose of showing that there may be two sides to a case, and that the opinion arrived at by the hon. and learned Gentleman was not inevitable. And here I may observe that I have never given any opinion upon this case, except to my able Under Secretary. I knew that it might be brought before me in every kind of form. I should have to consider whether, under all the circumstances, although the prisoner had been found guilty by a jury which had been approved by the Judge, and there would be no possibility of a re-hearing or cross-examination of witnesses, it was my duty to recommend the Crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy. It is said that this man is entirely innocent. But, at all events, he has been convicted by a proper and competent tribunal. The Home Office never is, and never was, a Court of Appeal—that is to say, it is not a tribunal appointed to re-hear cases of this kind. If the Home Office were to attempt to exercise such a jurisdiction, and were to re-hear cases depending upon the testimony of witnesses, without the possibility of judging how far that evidence was to be depended upon, the course of justice in this country would be greatly interfered with. Do not let it be supposed that I think that the Home Secretary has not a very large power vested in him of advising the Crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy. I think there is such a power vested in him, not for the purpose of re-hearing a case which can only be properly re-heard before a Judge and jury, but for the purpose of taking into consideration not only the facts proved at the trial, but any other facts and circumstances that may be brought to light subsequently, of weighing them, and of determining whether, under all the circumstances, it is his duty to recommend the Crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy, and to mitigate the severity of the punishment. In no case, however, should he interfere against the decision both of Judge and jury, unless the case is so plain as to leave no reasonable doubt on the mind of any intelligent man that a great injustice had been done. There was one case which was very similar to the one now under discussion. I refer to the case of Mr. Hatch, a clergyman, who was accused of an assault upon two young girls. Mr. Hatch was charged with that assault, he was tried, and convicted, and his case then came before the Home Secretary. The representations made to the Home Secretary in that case were as strong as those which have been made in the present instance; but in that case the Judge himself had great doubts about the justice of the verdict. Affidavits were made and were presented to the Home Secretary, and what action did the then Home Secretary, Sir George Lewis, take upon these representations? The identical course that I have taken the liberty of following. He pointed out to Mr. Hatch that he ought to indict the persons upon whose evidence he had been convicted of perjury. He said, "Either you must convict these persons of deliberate perjury, or the sentence must stand." What was the result? Mr. Hatch indicted the persons for perjury, the verdict was in his favour, and he received—as most undoubtedly he ought to have done—a free pardon. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that there are reasons which prevent Toomer from coming into court to prosecute the person upon whose evidence he has been convicted. I will not go into that question; but I say that if Toomer is an innocent man he need not be afraid to go into a Court of Justice. Had he gone into court as soon as the opportunity was afforded him the case would have been tried, and by this time the question would have been settled. He declined to go into court. He has never indicted the prosecutrix for perjury. And not only has he not done this, but he has never by himself, or by his friends, or solicitor, made a single application to the Home Office to have his case practically—though, of course, it would not be formally—re-heard. Sir, every person who knows the practice of the Home Office knows perfectly well that such cases as these are heard and re-heard over and over again; and therefore I am unable to understand why that course has not been adopted in the present case. I ask the House what course, under these circumstances, was the wisest for me to pursue? There were two points raised in this case for my consideration—the question of guilt or innocence, and the question of excessive punishment. The first question has been determined by a jury under the direction of a Judge, and the case could not possibly be formally re-heard unless there were some kind of tribunal to re-hear and determine the case afresh. The second point, the question of excessive punishment, has never been brought before me. In reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman I have to say that I have carefully avoided forming a judgment upon this case in any way as regards the guilt or innocence of Toomer; but I may add that this very evening an hon. Friend of mine now in the House asked me whether I was prepared to receive a memorial from the friends of Toomer, praying that the case might be re-considered in order that the punishment might be mitigated. I replied, as I have stated to many hon. Members during the present Session, that if such a memorial came before me it should have my best consideration. I have no bias in the matter. I have no desire whatever that any undue punishment should be inflicted upon Toomer. I cannot disguise from myself that the opinion of the Press and the opinion of the country—perhaps generally, although upon that point I could say a few words—is against Toomer's conviction, or, at all events, is against the extreme punishment to which he has been sentenced. Perhaps upon this point I shall not transgress my duty by saying that from the very beginning I thought the punishment to which Toomer was sentenced was so severe that it ought not to stand. I never had the slightest hesitation upon that point; but that question has never been brought before me. The reason why I thought that the punishment ought not to stand was, because I felt that the jury's recommendation to mercy, founded probably upon some indiscretion of the prosecutrix, should have been attended to. The case has been a very painful one to me; and all I can say is that whenever it is brought before me in a proper shape, I shall be ready to endeavour to exercise the best judgment I can upon the matter. And now one word as to another Question which has been put to me this evening. I could not, in consequence of the forms of the House, answer the Question put to me by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin) when he made the inquiry; but I may now state, with regard to the case tried before Mr. Baron Bramwell, that that learned Judge did not only not exceed his duty, but he did that which every honourable and upright Judge would have done under the circumstances. The law of the case is perfectly clear. Until the record is made up, which is not until the end of the assizes, the sentence may be either mitigated or increased, according to the circumstance that may arise. In the case alluded to, the conduct of the prisoners after sentence was passed upon them was of such a ferocious and murderous character, and indicated such depraved dispositions, that had the occurrence taken place before the sentence was passed, the Judge would have doubtless sentenced them to as severe a punishment as he afterwards did. I believe that the Judge was perfectly justified in all that he did; and I can only conclude by saying that a more able, upright, and honourable Judge than Mr. Baron Bramwell does not sit upon the Bench.

MR. CLIVE said, there was a difference between the case of Toomer and that of

Hatch. In the latter a conviction for perjury was possible; in Toomer's case it was out of the question. The evidence depended altogether upon the statement of the woman herself; and there was not only no corroboration of her evidence, but every circumstance was opposed to the truth of her statement. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to receive a deputation; but Toomer's friends looked upon it as a question of guilt or innocence. They denied the guilt, but not the immorality. He never could understand which was the most marvellous, the conduct of the jury who convicted the prisoner, the Judge who sentenced him, or the Home Secretary who did not take the first opportunity to interpose. He could only express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would go to the Home Office to-morrow with the determination to read the whole of the evidence over again. When he had done so, he was satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman would find it to be a case either for the entire remission of the sentence or the infliction of a merely nominal punishment.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that as he represented the town of which Toomer was an inhabitant, he was anxious to explain that the reason why there had been no deputation to the Home Secretary from Reading was, that there was a considerable difference of opinion as to the question of the convict's guilt. There was no difference of opinion whatever as to the propriety of remitting part of the sentence, but Toomer claimed to be altogether absolved. No further light could be thrown upon the case by indicting the woman for perjury. The opinion of the town was that the disproportion of the offence to the punishment was absolutely monstrous. The rape—if rape there were—was reduced to the very minimum to which an offence could be diminished. The woman was evidently one of those who—

And, saying she would ne'er consent, consented.”

He trusted that the result of the further consideration which the right hon. Gentleman would give the case would be that, if he did not advise the Crown to remit the sentence altogether, he would inflict only a nominal punishment.

MR. NEATE said, he had been in communication with the family and friends of the convict, and they considered him strictly entitled to an acquittal. In that feeling he entirely concurred. They were willing, however, to accept a remission of part of the punishment. As the question had been raised, he must express his most decided opinion that a more atrocious or absurd verdict was never given, or one which more called for the immediate interposition of the Home Secretary to set aside. If there had been more than one such verdict under the same Judge, he should maintain that there never was a case which more called for the constitutional interposition of the House to pronounce that a Judge who had encouraged—who had more than encouraged, who had compelled that verdict—was disentitled, by his manifest and notorious incapacity, to exercise his functions as a Judge. ["Oh, oh!"] That was his opinion, and he believed it was the almost universal opinion of the Bar and of the country. ["Oh!"] It was the opinion of every man to whom he had spoken on the subject. However, he did not wish to insist on this. The right hon. Gentleman wished to screen the office of Judge from the contempt and disrespect which might arise from cases of this kind. So far as he was entitled to represent the feelings of Toomer's family, they were willing to leave the case to the justice and humanity of the Home Secretary.

MR. OTWAY said, that unlike his hon. Friend (Sir Francis Goldsmid) who represented Mr. Toomer, or his hon. Friend (Mr. Neate) who represented the prisoner's family, he represented no one in this matter. A most extraordinary doctrine had been enunciated by the Home Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman said he had been of opinion from the very beginning that the sentence awarded to Toomer was excessive, and that it was one which ought never to have been passed upon him, yet he had told the House that he took no steps to mitigate it, because no memorial had been presented to him.

MR. WALPOLE said, the only question brought before him was one of free pardon to Toomer, and not one of mitigation.

MR. OTWAY said, he wanted to know whether that was not special pleading on the part of the right hon. Gentleman? What were the appellate functions of the Home Secretary? Toomer's case was in all the newspapers; everybody was talking about it; and was the Home Secretary to be the only person in the country who was to ignore the case? He thought it was the duty of the Secretary of State to take cognizance of such cases. If he had a sufficient cognizance of this case to justify him in forming an opinion from the beginning that the punishment was excessive, he ought to have taken some steps to mitigate that punishment, and not to wait until some formal memorial was presented to him. He would ask, supposing the right hon. Gentleman to occupy his present office for the next fourteen years, whether this unfortunate man would remain in prison until that time, unless the right hon. Gentleman in the meanwhile received a formal memorial? Such opinions showed, he was almost inclined to say, such an absolute incapacity for understanding the duties attached to the office of Home Secretary, that he was astonished to hear such a doctrine enunciated in that House.

MR. DENMAN said, he could not permit the observation of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) to pass without notice. There was no Member of the Bench for whom the whole Bar entertained a higher respect or a more affectionate regard as a man of justice and humanity than the learned Judge who tried this case. Even if there had been a miscarriage of justice in this case, he was at a loss to understand how such remarks could have been uttered by a member of the same profession as that to which the learned Judge himself belonged. Judging from the newspaper reports, there appeared to have been good ground for leaving the question to the jury. And when the jury had convicted the prisoner, there were circumstances in the case which fully warranted a sentence of great severity. The man had inserted the most artful advertisements in the newspapers. [SIR ROBERT COLLIER: The advertisement emanated from the prosecutrix.] Well, she had advertised; and he replied and offered her the situation of governess to his children. It must be assumed that the jury believed her story in finding him guilty of rape; and the learned Judge, in passing sentence, could not but take into consideration the fact that Toomer had taken the young lady as a governess for his children into his house upon the implied understanding that he would treat her as a lady, and abstain from any kind of improper conduct. If therefore it was a rape at all, it was a bad case; and the learned Judge might well feel that it was one deserving a heavy sentence. He might himself, perhaps, think that the sentence was somewhat severe; but still, what the Home Secretary was asked to do was to release Toomer before even nine months of his sentence had expired—a course which would be exhibiting as great a lenity as the non-remission of any part of the sentence would be a severity. The Home Secretary was under no necessity to consider the question of remitting the sentence until the time came when he might consider that Toomer had undergone sufficient imprisonment. The manner in which this case had been brought forward had shown a departure from the course usually adopted on such occasions. He did not believe that it was the duty of the Home Secretary to constitute himself a court of appeal, to all intents and purposes, against the sentences of Courts of Justice. If a Home Secretary felt convinced that he could conscientiously reverse, without hearing the evidence or observing the demeanour of witnesses, the verdict of a jury and the opinion of a Judge, he was, of course, justified in overruling the decision. But he apprehended that it was no part of the duty of a Home Secretary from the perusal of newspaper reports or even of a Judge's notes to place himself in that position. It would be a dangerous doctrine to lay down that on all occasions when the verdict of a jury was distasteful to some persons in the country or in the House, it was the duty of the Home Secretary to act as a court of appeal, and revise that verdict upon written documents to suit the current of popular feeling. After the explanation of the Home Secretary, he saw no reason to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman had departed from his duty. The right hon. Gentleman had told them fairly what had passed in his mind respecting the severity of the sentence; and he trusted that, after a certain period of time, the right hon. Gentleman would feel it consistent with his duty to recommend the clemency of the Crown to be extended. He must confess that he believed with his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Robert Collier) that an indictment for perjury would not lead to a settlement of the case, because he thought no light would thereby be thrown upon Toomer's guilt or innocence. The woman's mouth being shut every presumption would be raised in her favour; and, whether guilty or innocent, she would be acquitted almost as a matter of course. He thought, however, the case might be left safely in the hands of the Home Secretary.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I thought, Sir, this debate could hardly come to a conclusion without some hon.

Mr. Denman

Gentleman on the opposite Benches rising to vindicate the learned Judge from the cruel attack of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate). As the hon. and learned Member appears for so long a time to have been in communication with Mr. Toomer's friends, I should have thought that he would have taken some other means of bringing into question the conduct of the learned Judge. The hon. and learned Gentleman has taken no such course; and now, sitting here in judgment on the conduct of the learned Judge, he says that his decision was a disgrace to the system of administration of justice in this country. [Mr. NEATE: What I said was that such a decision might justify the interference of the House.] I should, at all events, have thought that the hon. and learned Member would have adopted some other method of raising the question of the learned Judge's conduct instead of attacking him in this House, where he can offer no explanation or defence. I will, however, pass that by, and proceed to make a few observations upon what has fallen from my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Robert Collier). The question, as I apprehend it, is, was the Home Secretary wrong in not pardoning Toomer at the time the application was made for his pardon? Now, this offence charged against Toomer was deliberately sworn to. But my hon. and learned Friend suggests that the jury were hungered down, and were thus induced to return a verdict against the prisoner, which is by no means probable. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford, who appears to have almost confined his conversation on this subject to Toomer's family and friends, says that he has heard nothing but disapproval of the verdict and the sentence; but the hon. Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) states that he has met with expressions of approval as well as of disapproval. You have the verdict of the jury and the opinion of the learned Judge who heard the whole of the evidence—not merely so much of it as my hon. and learned Friend has laid before the House to-night. The learned Judge, upon the calmest reconsideration of the evidence, states his belief that the verdict is a justifiable one, and that it is one from which he cannot dissent. What course was the Home Secretary to take under these circumstances? My hon. and learned Friend says that the Home Secretary may listen to the opinion of the Judge; but that he is not to be guided by that opinion. So that, although the Judge is convinced of the justice of the verdict, the Home Secretary is to take upon himself to say that that verdict is wrong; he is to set it aside, and to act upon his own opinion. That, I think, would be a very dangerous doctrine. My hon. and learned Friend might have told the House, what perhaps legal Members only are aware of, that when a case which has been tried at Nisi Prius, and a motion is made to disturb the verdict, if the learned Judge who tried the case assures the four Judges before whom it comes afresh that he is not dissatisfied with the verdict, it is allowed to stand, although the evidence may appear to preponderate against the decision of the jury. But my hon. and learned Friend says, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury and the opinion of the learned Judge, that the Home Secretary should take upon himself to say, "I think this a case in which no crime has been committed, and I at once recommend Her Majesty to exercise mercy and order the immediate release of the man." The suggestion made by the Home Secretary was a very fair one. It was open to the friends of Toomer to prosecute his accuser on the charge of perjury; and it is no answer to that suggestion to say that it would have been impossible to obtain a conviction. I pass by the question of possibility of conviction and offer another more important consideration. It is perfectly clear that from the time the Home Secretary suggested the prosecution of Toomer's accuser on the charge of perjury no answer has been made to the suggestion, nor has any mention been made of the difficulties in Toomer's way as a prosecutor on that charge, nor, indeed, has any further application been made to the Home Secretary in the case. The first position taken up by Toomer and his friends was that he was not guilty. The Home Secretary says in reply that he cannot act on that assertion; and I think he was right. If you can prove Toomer not guilty, do so; but, while the jury's verdict stands, and the Judge himself thinks the conviction can well be supported, I think the Home Secretary would have exceeded his duty if he had set all that aside, and had advised Her Majesty to grant a pardon. The question of a modification of a severe sentence is a very different one, and such as may be properly entertained. I cannot help thinking that when the facts are brought before him, the Home Secretary will find ample ground for considering whether a portion of the sentence may not be remitted. With respect to the sentence of Mr. Baron Bramwell at Kingston, I think the remarks made upon it to-night have arisen from a misapprehension of the facts. The hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) suggested that the increase of punishment awarded in the case was possibly ascribable to a personal feeling on the part of the Judge with reference to the conduct of the prisoners. If he will look at the reports of the case, he will find that it was nothing of the sort. The men made a murderous attack on the Governor of the prison, and the learned Judge told the prisoners that it was not because of any abuse of him or of their violence in the dock, but because he saw from their manner that they were men of cruel and fierce dispositions, that he passed a severe sentence.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that what he had stated was that there was a difference of opinion among the inhabitants of Reading in the Toomer case.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he questioned the allegation of the Solicitor General that if Toomer's case could have come before the Judges in banco they would have adopted the opinion of the Judge who tried him, and have confirmed the verdict. He desired nothing more than that the case should be considered as if it were a civil action, for if a verdict in a civil action were against evidence it would be set aside by the Judges in banco, even though they had to override the opinion of their colleague who tried it. He was a stranger to this case, except that he had read in Ireland a report of the trial, and when he did so it struck him, as it had other lawyers, that the verdict was bad, and ought to be condemned. The circumstances showed that the sentence could not be supported, but must be reformed. The Solicitor General had asserted that a rape had been sworn against Toomer on the trial; but he (Mr. Sullivan) denied that. There was a line between what was and what was not rape. If a woman committed an indiscretion, it could not be rape, and in this case the jury said that the prosecutrix had been guilty of indiscretion. This was a case where the dispute was not about the facts, but about the intention, and therefore no prosecution could be instituted. In Hatch's case the simple question was whether the witnesses for the prosecution were truthful, because, if so, the charge was indubitably proved ; but here the evidence for the Crown was consistent with there having been no rape at all, and this would be Miss Partridge's defence if she were prosecuted. He thought the Home Secretary had approached the question that night in a very fair spirit, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman in mitigating the sentence would substantially reverse it. He would thus take from the administration of the law one of the severest reproaches it had ever incurred.

MR. BAGGALLAY said, that he might be disposed to come to the conclusion that though Toomer was technically guilty the sentence pronounced upon him was more severe than necessary ; but he must remind the House that there was another person besides Toomer who might be said to be now on her trial, and that was the unfortunate prosecutrix. If the right hon. Gentleman were to consent to the appeal now made to him, and at once to grant a free pardon to Toomer, how could he do that without branding Miss Partridge as a harlot and a perjurer, though she had undergone the ordeal of a public trial and been subjected to cross-examination. He put it to the House whether that would be either fair or just. He had listened with great attention to the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Sullivan), who said he wished to treat this question as substantially a new trial. But his right hon. Friend had taken that very course of obtaining for him a new trial when he gave him an opportunity of instituting a trial for perjury. It was objected to this that there was a probability the prosecution would not be successful. That might be so ; but if it were not, still his right hon. Friend would have another opportunity of knowing the demeanour of Toomer and the other witnesses on both sides when they were brought into court and subjected to cross-examination. He thought the course which his right hon. Friend proposed was the only real test of the truth.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, his hon. and learned Friend was an eminent member of the Equity Bar ; but it was evident he had been too busily engaged in his own courts ever to set his foot inside a criminal court, for he was entirely unacquainted with their mode of procedure. There could be no prosecution for perjury instituted in this case, because there was no dispute as to the facts. All that the prosecutrix had sworn might be true ; but the crime did not consist in the facts, in the mere thing done, but in its being done in spite of the most resolute opposition and by the forcible overpowering of that opposition. He submitted to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole), whose intense anxiety to do right was admitted on all sides, that there had been in this case a miscarriage of justice ; because, when the jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy on the ground that the prosecutrix had been indiscreet, there was an obvious attempt to make a compromise between guilt and innocence where no such compromise was possible. The question whether the act was committed against the will of the prosecutrix was eminently one for the jury to determine ; but the verdict was not justified by the evidence. The counsel for the prisoner exercised a wise discretion in not calling witnesses, for he was entitled to argue that upon the evidence for the Crown the balance of probability even was against the commission of a rape, and that there was therefore no case for a conviction. There was no technicality involved ; the whole point at issue was whether what was done was done, not in the face of modesty, reluctance, and some kind of resistance, but whether it was done forcibly, feloniously, and against the final will of the party complaining. That forcible connection was rape, and nothing else was. The difference between Toomer's case and that of Hatch was, that in the latter case it was possible to prove that what the girls alleged to have occurred could not have taken place at the times and places and under the circumstances to which they swore ; but not so in the present case, where nothing was in issue but the force. He did not complain of the sentence on the supposition that the verdict had been justified by the facts, for then it would, no doubt, have been a very aggravated case, and one calling for severe punishment, for the prosecutrix was under the prisoner's roof in an honourable capacity, and entitled to his respect and protection ; and criminal violence under such circumstances would have been more than ordinarily atrocious, and deserving of more than ordinary punishment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must remind the House that they were pursuing an argument that was utterly irrelevant, and one that could lead to no useful end, inasmuch as there were no papers on the table of the House. Some hon. Gentlemen had read the trial in the newspapers ; others, including himself, had not done so, and they had no means of judging of the guilt or innocence of Toomer. But the facts of the case, as admitted in the discussion, appeared to be these—Toomer had a fair trial in open court, before a jury of his countrymen; was convicted to the satisfaction of the learned Judge who tried him, and received a heavy sentence. There must have been something in the demeanour of the witnesses, and the manner in which their evidence was given, to impress the learned Judge. Without discrediting anything which his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Robert Collier) asserted of his own knowledge, he certainly could not accept as accurate the narrative which he had given, from the report of others, of what occurred in court. It was irreconcilable with the sentence.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, that in absence of the best evidence he had procured the best within his power.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was not able to follow in the wake of his hon. and learned Friend. Even if he had enjoyed the opportunity of reading the newspapers on this subject, he should not have taken upon himself to represent to the House that what he had there seen amounted to a narrative of facts. It had been admitted, after all that had taken place, and after the public mind had been excited by discussion, that opinion in the town of Reading was even now divided upon the point. The conduct of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) accordingly was entirely vindicated. Had he yielded to the prayer urged upon him in the first instance, to declare the innocence of Toomer, and entirely to remit the sentence, he would have been guilty of neglect of duty. At the same time, the matter was one in which the right hon. Gentleman would be justified in giving, as he had promised to give, his careful consideration to the question of the propriety of mitigating the severity of the sentence. It should be borne in mind that while it was important that the Secretary of State should not neglect the duty of advising the Crown in the exercise of the prerogative of mercy vested in the Crown, it was not less important that he should vindicate the law, and uphold, instead of treating as nullities, the verdicts of juries, and the decisions of Judges. To say that the Secretary of State for the Home Department was to be considered for all purposes, and to all intents, an appellate tribunal in every case in which discussions might be raised as to the guilt or innocence of a prisoner, was to introduce a most dangerous doctrine. Nothing more calculated to bring into disrespect the administration of justice could be imagined than the creation of such an appellate jurisdiction without a single incident essential to the due administration of such functions. No doubt, it was of great importance that the Royal prerogative of mercy should exist and be administered with judgment and moderation; but it was of equal importance that the interests of justice should be upheld. A year or nine months had elapsed without any application being made for a modification of the sentence. At first, Mr. Toomer and his friends would accept nothing less than a declaration of innocence. His right hon. Friend had expressed his entire willingness to receive and consider any application which might be made to him; but it certainly was not for his right hon. Friend to review and to reverse the whole of the previous solemn proceedings. Had he taken upon himself to adopt any such line of action under the circumstances of this case, he would have committed a mistake greater than any which had yet been imputed to him.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he wished to explain. His hon. Friends the Attorney General and the Solicitor General appeared to have understood him as saying that the Secretary for the Home Department ought to disregard the opinion of the Judge. But he had never intended to make any such statement. On the contrary, he had expressed his belief that the opinion of the Judge ought to have great weight in such cases, while it ought not to be considered conclusive.

MR. REARDEN said, that the circumstances of the present inquiry afforded the strongest proof of the necessity for establishing a court of appeal before the close of the Session.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he thought the House of Commons was going beyond its province in re-trying a case which had been already heard before a Judge and jury. He submitted that was not one of their functions. They had not the proper materials on which to found their judgment, but merely newspaper reports. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Baggallay) had truly remarked that they were not merely trying Toomer, but also Miss Partridge, who had gone before a jury and subjected herself to a rigid cross-examination, after which the jury convicted the man whom she accused. The re-trying the case really meant that the House questioned the rectitude of trial by jury, and the propriety of decisions of juries when they were contrary to the notions of hon. Gentlemen. They had been trying this unfortunate woman, and saying that she was guilty of perjury. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might cry out "No, no!" if they pleased; but, in point of fact, the House had been trying this woman in her absence and making the most severe animadversions upon her. He repeated his opinion that the House had gone a little beyond its province in discussing the propriety of granting a new trial in this case. If they were to act as a court of appeal from the decisions of the Secretary of State in cases of that description their labours would be interminable, and they could have no certainty that they would be enabled properly to discharge that new duty.

MR. LOWTHER said, there was one portion of the reply of the Secretary of State which appeared to him to require some remark. The right hon. Gentleman had drawn attention to the precedent of the case of Hatch. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman were in search of a precedent to guide him in the course to be pursued in regard to Toomer, another case of more recent date might be taken—namely, the conviction for rape last year at Derby, which was tried by the same Judge, and by him referred to the right hon. Gentleman for consideration. The right hon. Gentleman, in his answer to Toomer's memorial, stated, as a reason why he could not reverse the sentence, that he could not take upon himself to say that the prosecutrix had been guilty of perjury. Now, such being the case, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman to inform the House, how he was able to acquit the prisoners convicted at Derby?

MR. WALPOLE said, no notice had been given to him of the intention of the hon. Gentleman to bring the case just referred to under the attention of the House. He must say he thought it was somewhat unfair for the hon. Gentleman to bring any charge against him with reference to his decision in that case, because the hon. Gentleman must be perfectly aware that every one of these cases turned upon its own special circumstances. The special circumstances in the case at Derby were totally different from those surrounding the case of Toomer, and he thought it was not right of the hon. Gentleman to bring forward the matter in the way he had done.

MR. LOWTHER said, he had in the course of the evening called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the case in question.

MR. WALPOLE said, that just as he was going out of the House the hon. Gentleman had mentioned the matter to him.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he thought the case ought not to be discussed any further. He protested against the doctrine laid down by some hon. Members that the House was exceeding its province in dealing with questions of that description. He hoped that whenever there might exist what could fairly be regarded as a grievance the House would not refuse to take it into its consideration. Every one who knew what these cases were must be aware that a discretionary power of dealing with them must be left to the Home Secretary. It was impossible to judge of such cases without full and correct information; and as he himself had not the minutes of evidence before him, he felt precluded from going into the merits of the question. He felt assured that the result of this discussion would be to entirely clear the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State from any imputation of having acted otherwise than with a sincere desire to do impartial justice. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman should now think fit to mitigate the sentence, he would be acting in a manner which could reflect no discredit whatever upon him.

COMPENSATION TO OWNERS OF SLAUGHTERED CATTLE.

QUESTION.

MR. FORDYCE : Sir, the Question to which I have to call the attention of the House is one of great importance, not only to my own constituency, but to several others who happen to be placed in a similar position. I have to ask the Vice President of the Council, On what grounds it has been decided to exclude Aberdeenshire from participation in the Grant of £35,000, voted by this House, for the purpose of compensating the Owners of Cattle slaughtered under compulsory Orders in Council? It will be in the recollection of the House that during the cattle plague in this country in 1865, an Order was issued by the Privy Council, according to which owners of cattle affected by rinderpest were obliged to kill and bury them without compensation. That Order in Council continued in force from August, 1865, until the middle of November in the same year. In consequence of that Order a great number of cattle, both in England and Scotland, were slaughtered. Of course, the Order was very unpopular at the time. To apply the case to Aberdeenshire—it will be in the recollection of the House that in the course of the present Session a Vote of £35,000 was granted to compensate owners of cattle which had been slaughtered in accordance with this Order in Council. During the whole period of the operation of that Order, the people of Aberdeenshire had acted on the principle which has been sanctioned by the House. Owners of cattle, occupiers of farms, and the landlords in that county, had met together and agreed to form an association for the purpose of assessing themselves voluntarily, to compensate for the slaughter of their cattle. That was the main feature of the society which had been formed in Aberdeenshire—a principle which was carried out in such a way as commended it to the gratitude and imitation of the whole country. In the course of the present Session, Parliament resolved to compensate owners of cattle slaughtered under the compulsory slaughtering clauses of the Order in Council of 1865; and out of the grant voted, a sum of £900 would have fallen to the share of Aberdeenshire. But Aberdeenshire was in the position that the owners had already been paid, or, rather, had paid themselves by means of the Rinderpest Association. Accordingly, that Association presented a humble memorial to the Privy Council, praying for its share of the grant; but it received a refusal, for which no reason was assigned. The consequence will be that Aberdeenshire will have no participation whatever in the grant for compensation. I believe there is a sum of £20 which will be received by one man—a man who by his very recklessness in refraining from giving the association support is to receive this compensation. Such is the position in which the decision of the Privy Council has placed Aberdeenshire, and all places which acted in the way that county did with respect to compensation. The House of Commons, by making this grant of £35,000, has affirmed the principle on which Aberdeenshire acted; but the Privy Council, by its allocation of the grant, denies the reward Aberdeenshire is entitled to for having given a good example to the country. This is a decision which was not expected by the farmers of Aberdeenshire in their simplicity. They do not understand this sort of compensation. It seems to them to be a tax on forethought and energy, and a premium upon apathy and indifference. Their argument is this, and I think there is logic in it—that if it is a sound principle that owners of property taken by the State for State purposes should be compensated by the State, there should be no exceptions, but wherever the case applies the owners should have compensation; and they think that, in the cases where the owners of cattle have been compensated by the landlords or by voluntary associations, the principle still holds good that the State should pay. All that is required in the present instance is, that a little more trouble should be taken by the Privy Council Office; and that trouble surely is nothing compared with the satisfaction of undoubted justice which Aberdeenshire claims.

COLONEL SYKES said, that he had also to complain of Aberdeenshire being excluded from the benefit of the national fund. That county was the first to set a good example; its policy of compensation had been adopted by England, and it was only just that those who had displayed prudence, resolution, and disinterestedness should be compensated as their neighbours were. In England compensation had been given by the State to farmers placed in the same position as those to whom it was denied in Scotland. The conduct of Government was a remarkable instance of one-sidedness.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the Order in Council for the slaughter of diseased cattle was made on the 26th of August, 1865. It was an Order for the slaughter of cattle not by the owners, but by inspectors appointed by Government. That Order remained in force till the 23rd of November, when it was rescinded by another Order in Council. The money voted by the House was to pay for the cattle slaughtered by the inspectors during the period which intervened between these two Orders. The sum was calculated upon the returns made, at the time, by the Government Inspectors, of the cattle which they slaughtered and of the value of the cattle at the time of slaughter. In December, 1866, another Order was made as to the distribution of the money. It runs thus—

"That the amount to be awarded for cattle slaughtered, shall be according to the same rate as is provided by 29 Vic. c. 2, with regard to animals slaughtered under such Act, having previously deducted all compensation received from Local Rate, Insurance, Sale of Carcases, and any other sources."

The Rinderpest Association of Aberdeenshire was not "an association for the relief of the sufferers under that Order." The people of Aberdeen had shown a great deal of public spirit. They had been before the rest of the country in endeavouring to stamp out the plague by slaughtering the diseased cattle; and they formed an association to pay each other for the cattle killed by themselves with that laudable object. This they did for their own good. They knew that by this means they would be subject to less loss. In time the whole nation followed in their steps, and by similar means, stamped out the plague throughout the whole country. The Privy Council had killed no cattle in Aberdeenshire except in the one case referred to by the hon. Member who had put the Question, and he had been paid by the loss which he had suffered under the Orders of the Privy Council. The £35,000 granted by the House was apportioned in accordance with the returns, made by the inspectors, of the cattle killed by them under the Order in Council. But in Aberdeenshire, with one exception, no cattle had been killed by the inspectors under that Order. How, then, were the Government to know the value of the cattle killed? The ipse dixit of the owner must be taken; but this would be out of the question. Again, an enormous inconvenience would result if this matter were re-opened. We stepped in when the plague was over; the people had settled down. Some had suffered total loss; others had since been satisfied. Some of the farmers who had lost their cattle had been re-imbursed by their landlords; others by the county Association; and if the Government were to say that they would compensate in these cases, claims would pour in by thousands, not from Aberdeenshire only, but from places all over the country. The class of claimants also would be different; it would not be the farmers who would claim; but the landlords or associations who had recompensed them. But the hon. Member thinks that "Associations have a right to claim compensation." What is an Association? A certain number of persons banded themselves together; and, if they could estimate the probable loss in the year, they divided it between them, and each paid his quota; so that the many paid a small sum, and the few sufferers were recouped. But, if you paid compensation to the Association, the money would not go into the pockets of those who had lost their cattle, but into the pockets of those who had not. As the farmers had already been compensated by the Association or by the landlords, the compensation awarded would really go to the two last; in other words, the State was to compensate persons who had not lost their cattle. Again, an association is not limited as to size. If you are to compensate one association you must compensate another. Now, suppose that Sir James Shuttleworth's plan of a National Assurance Association had been carried out. Then every one who lost cattle would have been compensated out of a general rate on land; and the landowners might have claimed to be re-imbursed out of the Consolidated Fund. This would be absurd; but it rests on the same argument as the claim of the hon. Member. If the hon. Member thought he had a good case, his proper course was to bring it before the House of Commons and try to get an additional grant to compensate the Aberdeen Rinderpest Association.

THE BURLINGTON HOUSE SITE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LAYARD said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the buildings now in course of erection on the site of Burlington House, especially with reference to the pledge given to Parliament last year. The late Government desired that the Burlington House site should be appropriated to a building for the reception of the national pictures; but, chiefly through the influence of the present First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners), the Vote proposed for that purpose was negatived and the scheme thrown out. For the interests of Art no more disastrous Vote ever passed the House. If a National Gallery had been erected on this spot a most important question affecting Art would have been settled; the national pictures would have been rescued from injury; and an admirable building, of which the plans and elevation were submitted to the House, would have been provided for their reception. It would now take many years to settle the question, if it were settled at all. The scheme of the late Government having being rejected, it was decided to appropriate the site for the purposes of the Royal Academy, the London University, the Royal Society, and other learned bodies. Certain hon. Members, admiring the architecture of Burlington House, thought that it ought not to be interfered with. The house was a handsome gentleman's residence, and a very fair specimen of domestic architecture, but he did not attach the value to it which was attached by many persons; and if, as he was told, no living English architect could hope to rival it, this country must be very badly off for architects. The principal merit of Burlington House was the tout ensemble formed by the main building, the wings, the colonnade, and other parts of the structure. Owing to the feeling he had mentioned, it was decided that Burlington House should be kept standing. The question then arose how the building should be turned to account, because to keep up the wings, colonnade, and the screen or frontage in Piccadilly would be to sacrifice a large extent of valuable ground. At length certain plans were proposed, and were originally accepted by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper). It was determined that Burlington House should be utilized by being gutted and made a portico, as it were, through which access should be had to buildings to be erected behind it. The Royal Society and the other learned societies were to be accommodated in front. Burlington House was to be made the centre of two wings, which were to be carried out at right angles to it to Piccadilly, and there united by a sort of façade, in the centre of which was to be a grand triumphal arch leading to the court-yard in which Burlington House stood. Behind Burlington House was to be erected the Royal Academy, and behind the Royal Academy, again, a building for the accommodation of the London University. By following the plan proposed, an important feature in the house, its colonnade, would altogether disappear, and therefore one of the reasons for keeping it up would disappear also; and, again, to raise new and lofty buildings round about it was like marrying a little short man to a very stout woman who would be smothered in her embraces. The absurdity of this being apparent to everybody, another story was now to be added to Burlington House; and to give it strength at the base an arcade or portico was to be erected, uniting the two ends of the building. Thus Burlington House would lose its distinctive character altogether, and the reason for sacrificing so much valuable ground in order to preserve the original building would no longer exist. Now, considering that the buildings now to be erected would form one group, it was natural to suppose that one leading mind would superintend the erection of the whole. However, this was not thought right; and as on the French stage we often saw one play written by two authors, so here this group of buildings was handed over to three architects. Burlington House was to be transformed by Mr. Smirke, the new wings and façade were intrusted to Messrs. Banks and Barry, and Mr. Pennethorne was charged with the erection of the London University behind. The natural presumption was that the buildings behind Burlington House should follow the style of that building—the Palladian or Classic Italian. Accordingly, Mr. Pennethorne proposed a plan in this style for the London University. Meanwhile, however, a change had taken place in the Government, and the noble Lord became Chief Commissioner of Works. Unfortunately, the noble Lord had a certain attachment for the Gothic style; and Mr. Pennethorne, abandoning his Palladian plan after having submitted it to the noble Lord, sent in an Italian-Gothic elevation; whether by the direction of the noble Lord or not it appeared doubtful; but the noble Lord accepted the new designs. The hon. Member for Roscommon asked the noble Lord the other night to say what Italian-Gothic was; and well he might. He (Mr. Layard) was puzzled to know what was meant by Italian-Gothic. Was it the chaste, early Gothic so generally used by the Franciscan order in their churches, or the ornate style of Milan Cathedral, or what? Mr. Pennethorne retained the original interior plan of the building, but converted the exterior elevation from Classic into Italian-Gothic, which was an anomaly, because the interior arrangements that would suit a Palladian building would probably not suit a Gothic building. The face of a building could not be changed without a corresponding change of the interior. Already fourteen feet of the building had been erected, but the London University Committee appeared not to have been consulted in the matter. When they found they had got this Italian-Gothic building, on the 22nd of February they adopted the following resolution:—

favourably of the elevation. They are, however, fully sensible of the disadvantage under which the architect has laboured in putting a Gothic casing upon an edifice planned for the adoption of an entirely different (and, indeed, antagonistic) style. Believing that ornament should be subservient to structural expression, they would gladly see the whole series of spires and pinnacles done away with. The sub-Committee also feel that the concealment of the roofs of the wings produces a want of harmony in the general effect, the centre having a high-pitched roof which is really picturesque. The design of the windows in the wings also seems to them capable of improvement; and they dislike the present aspect of the arcade at the entrance. They also cannot but regret that the principal range of windows should light a series of small or moderate-sized apartments, and thus give a certain character of unreality to the design; but this has been in a great measure the result of adopting a Gothic elevation without recasting the plan of the building."

The building, it would appear, was one which had all manner of spires and pinnacles. Having made several attempts to induce the noble Lord to withdraw the Italian-Gothic façade, on the 25th of March the Committee of the London University passed this resolution—

"That, having reference to the style of the adjoining buildings and to the character and purposes of the University of London, it is the opinion of this Committee that the modern style of architecture would be preferable either to the mediæval or to the Italian-Gothic, for the elevation of the new building. That in case the Senate feel precluded by the communication from Lord John Manners from proposing any such fundamental change as that implied in the preceding resolution, the Committee would think it desirable to have some conference with Mr. Pennethorne on various modifications of the Italian-Gothic elevation now before them, which would not interfere with the early and economical completion of the building."

He understood that the answer they got was to the effect that they were to mind their own business; they had to live in the house, but had nothing to do with the building of it, and that the design was to be carried out as a whole. Such was the history of this Italian-Gothic building to be raised behind Burlington House. He had seen the elevation for the additional story to Burlington House, and for the wings and façade in Piccadilly, and he admitted that they were very handsome, and that Mr. Smirke had done all he could to adapt that building to its object and to the surrounding edifices. On the whole, the grand entrance in Piccadilly, and the lofty ornamental buildings in the Palladian style for the wings, did great credit to Messrs. Banks and Barry; and he trusted that when Members saw the plans, as he hoped they would do, in the Library of the House, they would meet their approval. But the noble Lord had not only sinned against taste, but against the House of Commons. Last year they were called upon to vote £20,000 on account of buildings to be erected on the Burlington House site. The House objected to vote the sum without having an idea of the class of building to be erected, and a distinct pledge was given that the House should not be called upon to vote any more money until the plans and elevations had been submitted for the inspection of its Members. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said—

"The great question related to the frontages to the north and south. . . . He should like the Committee to pass this vote. But he accompanied that with this arrangement. His right hon. Friend had already the ground plan prepared, and there would be no difficulty in immediately proceeding with the preparation of the designs, so as to give hon. Gentlemen what opportunities for criticism they might desire before any step was taken in the erection of the building.—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 190-1.]

The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper) said—

"He could assure the House that the plans would be completed before any of the work was commenced, and he would promise to place them within the reach of hon. Members, so as to show the portion that would be occupied by the Royal Academy on the southern side, that occupied by the London University at the northern end, and the intermediate space, which would accommodate the learned societies. The plan might be executed at different times, but the whole would be settled before any part was commenced. The Royal Academy building would be designed by their own architect, subject to the approval of the Board of Works, and care would be taken that it harmonized in character and general arrangements with the University building. They need not be identical in style, but all the buildings that would cover the site would be viewed as one composition."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 192.]

That was a distinct pledge to submit the designs to the House. The present First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners) was reported to have said—

"He was of opinion that before this Vote was agreed to the House should be in possession of some general scheme for occupying the ground facing Piccadilly and the gardens behind. He thought it would be desirable for the Government to postpone the Vote for the present."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 189.]

The noble Lord was then in Opposition; but since he had come into office he had violated every pledge that had been given, and the buildings had been commenced without any plans or elevations being placed within the reach of hon. Members. Notwithstanding the fact that the House voted the £20,000 on the understanding that no further demand should be made upon them until the House had seen the plans and elevations, the noble Lord, he understood, now put forward the extraordinary doctrine that the head of a Department was not bound by any pledges made by his predecessors in office. That was a most mischievous and dangerous doctrine, which, if carried out, would result in a general want of confidence in the heads of Departments, who might be changed at any time, and whose pledges would not be binding on their successors. Unless some distinct explanation should be given which would show a good reason for the course which had been pursued, he should move, when the next Vote on the subject was proposed to the House, that it should be rejected, and that the works should be stopped until the House had had an opportunity of inspecting and approving the plans for the whole group of buildings.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that there would be no objection to produce the Correspondence which had taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the London University during the entire period the negotiations had been in progress. The miseries of private gentlemen who engaged in building were proverbial; but they were nothing to what were suffered in similar cases by the head of a public Department. It was now nine years since the House had first commenced discussing this subject, and the hon. Member blamed it for having at last decided that the National Gallery was to be in Trafalgar Square, and the Royal Academy in Burlington House. He put it to the House that if, by any action on their part, they were to prevent that great scheme which had been decided on two or three years ago, by which Trafalgar Square was to be reserved for the National Gallery, and the Royal Academy was to be placed in Burlington Gardens, from being carried out, very great inconvenience must be the result. The hon. Gentleman, in the opening of his speech, had found great fault with him with reference to the design adopted for the building of the London University in Burlington Gardens, and also for the manner in which, according to the hon. Gentleman, he had not fulfilled certain pledges given to the House by his predecessor. With regard to the first point, he really felt a difficulty in approaching once more the old worn-out question of "the battle of the styles." The history which the hon. Gentleman had given—founded on what authority he could not even pretend to guess—as to the manner in which this particular design was formed was erroneous from beginning to end. He begged leave to state, in the most emphatic manner, that he never directed Mr. Pennethorne to form the design in Palladian, Gothic, Italian-Gothic, Byzantine, or any other style. When he succeeded to the office which he had now the honour to hold, he found that the House of Commons had voted £20,000 for the erection of a building for the London University, and that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), on the 30th of April last, had told the House that it was of the utmost importance that not a moment should be lost, that the Vote should be taken without delay, and the work at once commenced. When he found that such was the state of things, and that his predecessor before leaving office had commissioned Mr. Pennethorne to prepare specifications for the foundations of the building, he felt it to be clearly his duty not to stop the work, but to take the necessary steps to carry that work to completion. He therefore instructed Mr. Pennethorne to prepare a design; but he begged leave to deny, in the most emphatic manner, that in giving those instructions he expressed any preference whatever for one style of architecture over another. The result showed it. For how did Mr. Pennethorne fulfil those instructions? The hon. Gentleman said, and said truly, that he had sent in what the hon. Gentleman rightly or wrongly called a Palladian design. The hon. Gentleman also said that his charge must be well founded, because it was founded on documents received from the London University. He begged to say that such was not the fact. Mr. Pennethorne of his own free will proposed two alternative designs. What became of the charge that he had shown a complete indifference to the wishes of the London University, who were to inhabit the building? What did he do? He requested the authorities of the London University to come down and examine the designs to see which of the two they preferred. The Chancellor was not in London at the time, nor he believed the Vice Chancellor; but Dr. Carpenter, the Registrar, came to his office, and he (Lord John Manners) begged that he, in conjunction with Mr. Pennethorne, should examine the designs and report which they preferred. The result was that, without expressing any very decided preference for one or the other, both Dr. Carpenter and Mr. Pennethorne said they rather preferred that the Italian-Gothic design should be adopted. They went carefully into the question how all the requirements of the London University would be met, and Dr. Carpenter seemed quite satisfied that ample provision would be made for them. And that was the whole of this tremendous affair of these two alternatives. He had no more notion of forcing Mr. Pennethorne or the London University to adopt a design which they did not like than the hon. Gentleman himself. Then the hon. Gentleman went into a matter very difficult to discuss in Parliament—the question of taste. That was a question which had been brought forward on many occasions. The hon. Gentleman thought that what he called the front and back of buildings ought to be in the same style of architecture. He entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman; but the whole question was, what was the front and what the back? The hon. Gentleman said that any building erected behind Burlington House on the north side must be in the same style of architecture as the building on the south side. Now, in what style of architecture were the authorities of the Royal Academy going to carry out those works which had met with approval of the hon. Member, and which were to be erected at the rear of Burlington House at their own expense? Were they to be in the Palladian style? [Mr. LAYARD: I hope so.] They were to be in the plainest possible style—they were to be architecturally adapted for galleries for pictures. The house with which the new building would be brought into immediate contact was that which belonged to General Cavendish, and he would challenge the hon. Gentleman to tell what was the style of architecture of that house? He should like further to know from him whether he thought the new building ought to be in that style. For his own part, he had not expressed an opinion in favour of one style of architecture over another. But the hon. Gentleman had referred to what had been said by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) on the 30th of April last, and also to what had fallen from himself on that occasion. It was quite true that he had then observed that, if it were in the power of the Government to do so, it would be well to place before the House a general plan, and to show how the whole of the piece of ground in question was to be appropriated. But the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking after him, and he believed in answer to him, said—

“It was necessary to take this Vote because the case of the University of London was urgent in point of time. If they were not allowed to take a Vote until they could produce a plan for the appropriation of the whole site, there would be a loss of a whole year, and even then the object in view would not be attained. The Royal Academy was going to build out of its own funds, and it would require a good deal of time to settle the mode of filling up the intermediate portion of the site.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 190.]

Now, he was not disposed to be unreasonable, and that answer of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer to him was, he thought, a sound one. The House took the same view, because the Vote, after considerable discussion, was allowed to pass without a division. The hon. Gentleman, however, accused him of breach of faith, because he had not produced those plans which could not be produced last year. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), it was true, on that occasion said—

“He could assure the House that the plans would be completed before any of the work was commenced, and he would promise to place them within the reach of hon. Members, so as to show the portion that would be occupied by the Royal Academy on the southern side, that occupied by the London University at the northern end, and the intermediate space, which would accommodate the learned societies.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 192.]

But he gathered from that statement that it referred to the plans for the distribution of the ground, and not to the elevations and designs, which were things perfectly distinct. In answer to a Question which had been put to him on July 31 by his hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope), he said—

“It is impossible for me to exhibit the design referred to by the hon. Member, as it is not in my possession.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 1762.]

And that was the fact, because, although the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), after the Vote had passed, gave instructions to Mr. Pennethorne to prepare specifications for the foundations of the work, he issued no instructions for the preparation of designs so long as he remained in office. As soon as the plans for the appropriation of the ground could be prepared, he (Lord John Manners) was perfectly willing and ready and anxious that they should be placed in the Library for the inspection of hon. Members. There was necessarily great delay in dealing with the various bodies concerned. Arrangements had to be made with no less than six learned societies, and accommodation to be provided for the Royal Academy, as well as a new building for the London University. Those arrangements were now concluded, and the plans would be immediately placed before the House. Before any fresh Vote was asked for, the complete appropriation of the whole site of Burlington House and Burlington Gardens would be distinctly shown. Hon. Members would, when they saw the accommodation which was to be provided for the Royal Academy and for the different learned societies, and the new building for the London University, admit that the appropriation of the property at Burlington House was such as was originally contemplated by the nation, when the purchase of that property was made. It was such as would satisfy those who set a value on the objects which those great learned and artistic societies had in view. He understood from those who had seen some of the designs for the Royal Academy and the accommodation of the other societies that they met with general approbation. Nothing, he could assure the House, could be further from his intention than to treat it with the slightest disrespect, or to depart in the least degree from any pledge which might have been given. He had always, in the discharge of his duty, endeavoured to take the House fully into his confidence, and he hoped that in the present instance it would find that the Government had come to a wise and satisfactory decision.

MR. CARDWELL said, he could assure the noble Lord that the London University with which he had the honour to be connected as a Member of the Senate, so far from making any complaint of him, were very sensible of the courtesy which they had received at his hands in reference to their new building. He might also say that, having for a long time sat in that House with the noble Lord, he should be the last person to charge him with violating any pledge he had given. Through the kindness of the noble Lord he had been enabled within the last few days to see the elevations in accordance with which the building was to be erected. Without entering into a discussion on a matter of taste, on which he did not feel that he was an authority, he might state it to be his belief, as a matter of fact, that if the elevation which it was proposed to erect in Burlington Gardens for the purposes of the London University had been exhibited in the Library of the House before the Vote was taken for it, not a single shilling would have been voted for carrying out such a plan. The extracts from the speech of the right hon. Member (Mr. Cowper) contained a statement that the plan would be submitted as a whole, and that the House of Commons would have the opportunity of declaring whether the buildings should be made consistent and harmonious with one another. But the noble Lord seemed to think it very absurd to suppose that because the Royal Academy was constructed in accordance with one style of architecture, the London University, on the same piece of ground, might not be built in a style entirely different. It appeared to him that the House would very likely be of an entirely different opinion, and if Burlington House was to be preserved, and other buildings were to be erected on the grounds, and to be parcels of the same block, the House would probably think that all the buildings should be in harmony one with another. It was very desirable that a large sum should not be voted and expended on buildings which instead of being an ornament, would be a disfigurement to the metropolis, until the House of Commons had had the opportunity of forming a judgment with respect to them. As the noble Lord proposed to place the design of the elevation in the Library in a few days, hon. Members would be able to pronounce an opinion in respect to it. He knew that the Senate of the London University was of one mind in thinking that the building would be not an ornament but a disfigurement to the metropolis. He had been under the apprehension that the noble Lord, having a great liking for that particular style of architecture, had in this case yielded to his predilection. He was relieved from that apprehension, for it appeared that the noble Lord only desired Mr. Pennethorne to make two elevations, that those elevations were submitted to Dr. Carpenter, and that the two, in a few minutes, determined on the design without consulting the noble Lord. No doubt Dr. Carpenter supposed that his opinion was asked upon the convenience of the arrangements of the plan for the London University, and never for one moment believed that there was vested in him authority to speak for the Chancellor and Senate of the London University, and give their opinion as to the elevation to be erected. However, it was not for the London University, much less for Dr. Carpenter, to decide the question how public money was to be spent in ornamenting or disfiguring the metropolis. That was a question for the House of Commons, and it could not be decided without the House seeing the plan of the elevation. One duty the London University had to discharge, and that was to express their opinion on the subject. He bore testimony to the courtesy with which the noble Lord had treated the London University. He should like to know what amount of smart money the country would have to pay if this elevation were got rid of and another substituted for it. He hoped that a third elevation, preferable to either of the other two, might be adopted by the House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought that the present discussion showed how ill-advised the last Parliament was under the advice of those now in power in throwing over the scheme for building the National Gallery on Burlington Gardens, and erecting there one uniform and harmonious structure. The House would recollect how he had been supported by his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark on his Motion last Session to reverse this decision, and what little support he had received. All he had realized was saving Burlington House at the loss, however, of its best portion, its picturesque colonnade, which he hoped might be erected elsewhere. In the conversation which took place on the 30th of April in last year he clearly understood the right hon. Member for Hertford to promise that all the plans and elevations of the new buildings should be submitted to the House. Several hon. Members were taken aback at the suddenness with which the idea of putting the London University in Burlington Gardens had been produced full fledged; but a distinct promise was given by the then Commissioner of Works that the elevations and designs should be produced, and though a change of Government took place, he could not have thought that that promise would have been so entirely neglected. Under the old scheme there would have been one grand harmonious palace erected on the ground, with a direct through communication and two façades saving withal Burlington House. So much did he admire the scheme that he waived in favour of it his personal preference for Gothic. But this had been given up, and the ground was to be cut up and frittered away partly between the Royal Academy and the London University. Each building would now have its own entrance front, and neither of them would have any intercommunication, nor back nor sides, but simple blank walls, except the façades. Moreover, there could not conceivably be two structures which it would be more impossible to comprehend in the same coup d'œil, except from a balloon, than the Royal Academy looking down upon Piccadilly, and the London University up Cork Street. Accordingly, the unity of structure which had to be maintained in the days when the National Gallery was to cover the whole space no longer existed. The question whether Mr. Pennethorne's design was good or bad should be tested by its own merits—if good, let it be adopted; if bad, corrected, for a bad Gothic design would raise a prejudice against its style. The good scheme that would cover Burlington Gardens with one building was passed and gone. It was to be covered with two buildings totally distinct in their objects. Let them be dealt with on their own merits. Let them forget that there was a Royal Academy to the south, and deal with the London University merely with a view to Burlington Gardens. Take it in hand—make it as commodious and picturesque as possible, and if it could be made a new starting point for metropolitan architecture, so much the better. The time had come when the revolt was sounded against that monotonous repetition of Italian architecture in stucco and compo which had too long defaced our streets. Men were beginning to appreciate the picturesque forms of the Middle Ages so well adapted to the purposes of our present life. A Gothic club-house was rising in St. James' Street. A Gothic Insurance Office of great beauty had been planted within Temple Bar; a Gothic warehouse of great originality had been erected in Thames Street, while of all Members whom he felt sure would most warmly hail this happy change he would name the Member for Southwark, whose labours of love in the Arundel Society had done so much to impress our minds with the beauties of the mediæval art of Italy.

MR. TITE said, he thought that there was one building in London which was admirably adapted for all practical purposes, and that was Somerset House. He felt that they were all much obliged to the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) for the candid manner in which he had acted and for the candid explanations he had given, by which he had liberated himself from all accusation. He had himself strongly urged getting the London University out of the rooms in which they were at present so inconveniently placed ; but he certainly understood that before anything was undertaken they would have not only the plans but the elevation of the buildings. He would humbly suggest to the noble Lord that he should at once produce the plans. After the emphatic denunciation they had heard they ought to look carefully at this design before going further. The "battle of the styles" had been ill-fought on the present occasion. The same foundation would avail for a classical and a Gothic building. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) asked what amount of smart-money they would have to pay ? He did not think it would be very much. The main thing was that the noble Lord should stay further progress in order to produce the design, and within a week they might come to a determination whether the judgment of the London University was right, and the judgment of the architect was wrong. If the feeling of the House was in favour of a Gothic design, no one could carry it out better than Mr. Pennethorne. With the opening from Piccadilly through the University buildings, he thought the three distinct styles of Burlington House, the Royal Academy, and the University building would in some sort or another be united. He understood that there was to be a way through the Burlington House galleries into the University building, and it would be very objectionable if the galleries were in one style and the new building in another. He could not conceive that with such a variety of style a result satisfactory to the nation could be carried out. This debate might well stand adjourned till they saw Mr. Pennethorne's design.

MR. BENTINCK said, he gave his noble Friend (Lord John Manners) every credit for the great frankness with which he had made his statement. At the same time, there was one important point to which he had not adverted—namely, that Mr. Pennethorne's first design was in harmony with Burlington House, and that it was only on second thoughts that he furnished the present design. He quite agreed that they ought to endeavour to blend in one design the two buildings. As to any supposed breach of faith towards the House, he might say that having listened to the debate of last year, his opinion was that what was said by the right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. Gladstone and

Mr. Cowper) had been carried into effect. It was a question of accommodating three bodies—the Royal Academy, the Learned Societies, and the London University. He (Mr. Bentinck) took objection to the multitude of architects, and the answer he received was that they should work together. The whole depended on the Royal Academy agreeing to go to Burlington House. What happened after that ? Sir Francis Grant declined, and would not go there till lately. Now he heard for the first time that the Royal Academy was going to Burlington House. He hoped that his noble Friend would throw aside any prejudice he might have, and comply with the request that had been made to him by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Until the Estimates were brought forward, which he assumed they would be at no very distant day, he would suggest to his noble Friend that directions should be given to stop any artistic work which had been commenced, and that the designs should be exhibited in the Library or in some other convenient place. When there had been an opportunity of taking the opinion of the House, no doubt a building would be erected which would be a credit to the metropolis.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished, after what had fallen from the hon. Member (Mr. Tite), to offer a practical suggestion—namely, that the work in this case should be stopped until the designs had been laid before Parliament, and the House enabled to form an opinion upon them. Some years ago the advocates of the Gothic style for the new Foreign Office were defeated ; but he thought the result must have rather shaken the faith of those who had voted in favour of the style recommended by Lord Palmerston. As to the building now in question, it was to be regretted that the back of it would not correspond more with the front. In order to fulfil the understanding which was apparently come to by his predecessor in office, his noble Friend (Lord John Manners) should lay the plans before Parliament previous to proceeding with the building ; otherwise, if they should see reason to object to what was done, they might be met with the answer that it was too late to make any change.

MR. COWPER said, that when in April last the Vote was proposed to the House and carried it was the intention of the then Government to place the Royal Academy on the south side of the Burlington House site, and that the north side of the site should remain open for the purposes of the London University. At that time many hon. Members were much afraid that the building would be erected without any reference to a general scheme and to that proper harmony which ought to mark all the buildings on the Burlington House site. He remembered that the first in pressing that view upon the House was the noble Lord (Lord John Manners). To such a degree, indeed, did the noble Lord push it that he proposed to postpone the Vote because he feared there was not a complete and harmonious scheme for disposing of the whole of the site. He himself at once met that objection by saying that although it was not for the advantage of public business then to postpone that particular Vote, yet he was quite prepared, on behalf of the then Government, to state that they would satisfy the House that the whole of the ground was laid out with a general intention and a harmonious design, and that they were quite ready to let the House see the plans on which they meant to proceed, though these plans were not at that moment prepared. Therefore, the noble Lord must have been quite aware of the engagement into which the late Government had entered; and he was surprised that the noble Lord had not thought fit to act upon that understanding. There certainly was an understanding on the part of the late Government that the House should have information as to the plans for the building, though the elevation was not specially mentioned. At that time he had not caused any elevation to be prepared, for the very reason that he never intended that the London University should be a distinct portion of the building which was to occupy the site of Burlington House. He thought it should be in harmony with the other buildings which the Royal Academy were prepared to erect on the southern side; and until the architects employed by the Royal Academy could begin to consider what elevation they should propose for the assent of the First Commissioner of Works, he had not thought it right that any elevation should be prepared for the London University. Italian-Gothic was a style in which beauty and variety might be successfully combined with grandeur of effect; but that style was not appropriate to the position or the purpose of the building in question.

GRAND DUCHY OF LUXEMBOURG.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I can hardly expect the House at this late hour (twelve o'clock) to give its attention to the subject which stands on the paper with my name attached to it. At the same time, I venture to crave its indulgence for a few moments, while I refer to that topic. I was quite willing, Sir, to give way to my hon. Friend (Mr. Tite), because I always regard him as a patron saint of architecture. He so impressed me to-night with the idea of wings and structures without rears or fronts, that I am inclined to look on Italian-Gothic, as if I may so describe it, the Cherubim style. Having made that passing allusion to my hon. Friend, I am anxious to refer to the Question of which I have given notice, and which is one of great importance. Judging merely from the small superficial area involved, it may, perhaps, be viewed as of very limited moment, compared with the great territorial adjustments which have been taking place on the Continent. But, at the same time, it affects considerations which in my humble judgment are most important in their bearing upon the interests of Europe, and which, unless the negotiations are conducted in a spirit of fairness and of conciliation between the two principal Powers concerned, will, I am afraid, involve Europe in a very grave crisis. We have not yet heard anything from the Government upon this subject, though, no doubt, this morning's papers have informed us that the negotiations for the transfer of Luxembourg to France was at an end. I hope that may be the case; though, of course, until we hear what remarks the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) may make upon the subject, we shall be in the dark upon the point. But I am afraid that, even if this be the case, it will only tend to increase the perplexities of France, and will only tend to make still more patent the evils of that harassing policy which has placed her in so humiliating a position in the eyes of Europe. This morning's papers have stated that the negotiations for the annexation or the cession of Luxembourg to France are at an end. But it was only the other day that we were informed that Ministers, or at least ex-Ministers, do not read the newspapers. If I recollect right, it was only the other day that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) informed us that he had not seen in the newspapers an account, which occupied two or three columns of The Times, of a meeting which all the world was talking about, which he held at his own house, with some advanced Reformers; I do not know who. [A laugh.] At any rate, then, we hear that ex-Ministers do not read the newspapers. I therefore now ask the noble Lord to give us some information as to whether or not it is the case that there has been a proposal emanating either from France or from Holland—I presume it did not emanate from Prussia—to sell about 200,000 inhabitants of Luxembourg—180,000 of whom are Germans—to France, at the rate of 500 francs, or about £20 per head. That is part of the policy of the Emperor of the French. That policy has failed for the last seven or eight years. It is impossible to understand what he aims at. I cannot for a moment conceive that he tries to humble France in the eyes of Europe—such an idea would be absurd. Twice during a very short time he has told Europe of the gratification with which he has attempted to upset the treaty of Vienna. From the very moment when having deceived Lord Cowley and all Europe, he stood with Victor Emmanuel on the summit of the Alps, and proclaimed the annexation of the two Provinces of Savoy and Nice, he has committed a series of blunders, which have involved him in the perplexing position in which he now stands. I do not know whether the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) will be able to give us any explanation as to the negotiations that have taken place in this matter, and as to the frankness of France in such negotiations. I, in common with the House generally, have every confidence in the ability of the noble Lord, and in the course he may think fit to adopt in his administration of our Foreign Affairs at this moment. I heard a high compliment paid him the other evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would have sounded better had it come from some other person than a Colleague. Still, I fully endorse that expression of esteem. But I wish to impress upon the noble Lord that for some years he and the party with which he was acting were constantly saying that the policy of Lord Palmerston and of Lord Russell was more and more isolating this country from the affairs of Europe. I do not wish to see this country indiscreetly meddling upon every occasion in European affairs; but sometimes I think that it is scarcely wise that we should be isolating ourselves to the degree which I fear is becoming so conspicuous in regard to our relations with foreign nations. I hope that the noble Lord, in the debate that we shall certainly have in the course of next week, when the whole question of our foreign policy must be brought before the House and the country in reference to the dispute with Spain—will give us some better assurance upon this point than we received the other day in “another place.” The country was then informed by a noble Duke that upon notice having been given of a Motion to be made in this House he had telegraphed two hours before the debate took place to St. Petersburg to know whether it was true that Russia had ceded an extent of territory, amounting to 300,000 square miles, to the United States. The Government of the day and the Minister for Foreign affairs knew nothing about it. That circumstance shows how much our policy of isolation has tended to disassociate this country from the nations of Europe. I hope the noble Lord will not accuse me of taking a liberty in pointing this out to him, because I think nothing can be worse and nothing more injurious than that this system of our standing apart from other European nations should be carried out to too great an extent. I have made these observations with the view of eliciting from the noble Lord whether the breaking off of the negotiations for the annexation of Luxembourg by France is owing to any representations which have been made by Her Majesty’s Government. I hope that such is the case. I hope sincerely that the noble Lord, with that excellent good sense that distinguishes him, has pointed out to the Emperor of the French and to the King of Holland—to the latter particularly—that this shabby trafficking in the sale of people will not do. I hope the noble Lord has pointed this out to them, and that he will be able to tell us that he has recommended them to let the matter drop through. Not that it will drop through altogether, I am afraid. I cannot conceive any question more likely to involve Europe, and certainly England, in a war than the question of a cession of this kind, which is one to which certainly Prussia would never willingly agree. Although we are sometimes indifferent to certain rectifications of frontiers, we should, nevertheless, scarcely be likely to assent to a transfer of territory that will affect Belgium and other States of Europe. Is it likely that Russia, as one of the five parties to the Treaty of 1831, that separated Belgium from Holland, would view this annexation with indifference. There is, however, no doubt whatever that this barter—this sale—was contemplated. The noble Lord admitted the other day, in his reply to an hon. Gentleman below the gangway, that there was no doubt communications had passed between the Governments of France and Holland with reference to the possible transfer of this territory. But the matter does not rest solely upon the statement of the noble Lord. By a singular coincidence, on the same day that the noble Lord made that statement in this House, Count Bismarck, in the North German Parliament, in reply to a question, stated, that so far back as October last, the subject had been raised. The King of Holland had at that time questioned the Prussian Ambassador, whether his country would be prepared to yield the occupation of Luxembourg. Count Bismarck further stated that while he was willing to respect the susceptibilities of France, Holland must take upon itself the entire responsibility of every transaction in the matter. That is the only answer we should have expected from Count Bismarck. There, however, appears officially in the Constitutionnel a statement that clearly shows the aim of the Government of France in making this demand. Only a short time after the battle of Sadowa, France asked for an enlargement of territory. That demand was peremptorily refused, to the evident annoyance of the Emperor of the French, though he bore it with an appearance of chivalrous disregard. But, now that he asks the King of Prussia to consent to this cession, an article appears in the Constitutionnel, the official journal of France, and which is therefore supposed to have been inserted by authority. It says—

“ France has no desire to threaten the interests of Germany, or to bring her honour into question. France has no warlike tendencies, but has solely a deep sense of what is just and equitable. Now, it would be neither just nor equitable that Prussia, after having achieved her great conquests without obstacles, should watch jealously the smallest acquisition that may be desired by her neighbours—not in the interest of ambition but of security.”

We know well enough what the Emperor of the French had in view, or, perhaps, I should rather say, what the writer of the article had in view, when he says that he tried to get Luxembourg, “ not in the interest of ambition, but of security.” It is this. During the Revolution of France one of the greatest men—perhaps the greatest military man in the early period of that revolution, Carnot, was intrusted with the drawing up of the military arrangements on that side of the Moselle. He says, in his memoirs, that the holding of Luxembourg is a matter of vital importance to France. Carnot says—

Therefore we have the authority of Carnot, which has evidently influenced the Emperor, that the holding of Luxembourg is a matter of the first importance for France for defensive or offensive operations against Germany. When this proposed cession was mentioned, it caused even greater dissatisfaction to Europe than that of Savoy and Nice. That there have been strong manifestations in Germany cannot be denied. Even Bavaria has strongly protested against this threatened action on the part of Holland. In the official journal of Prussia it was stated that in the event of war on account of Luxembourg Italy and Prussia would act together, and the King of Italy would look forward to that war in order to recover Savoy and Nice. When statements like these are made in official and semi-official journals of Prussia and France, there is evidently some deep-laid scheme at the bottom, which I hope the noble Lord will bear in mind so as to prevent serious convulsions in the state of Europe. If the noble Lord will look to the Treaty of Vienna in 1815 and the Treaty of 1831, he will find it laid down that when by the Treaty of 1815 Luxembourg was ceded to Holland, it was in exchange for some part of Nassau, but on the distinct understanding that Luxembourg should be continued as part of the Germanic Confederation. When in 1831 Lord Palmerston and, I think, Talleyrand, and other statesmen were engaged in drawing up the treaty, it was distinctly laid down that Luxembourg should not go to Belgium, but should remain with Holland, and continue part of the Germanic Confederation. If hon. Members will read the admirable memoir of Earl Grey and the correspondence on the Reform question of 1831 they will find this question alluded to. In the first speech of the King of the Belgians on opening the Chambers in 1831 he expressed the dissatisfaction which he and the Belgian people felt at not having Luxembourg. Earl Grey resented that speech, and an intimation was sent to the King of the Belgians that he must withdraw any expectations as to the occupation of Luxembourg by Belgium. This is a matter of the deepest and most pressing moment to the peace of Europe. If the attempts of France are in any way encouraged or connived at by the Government of this country, it will lead to serious complications into which we shall most undoubtedly be drawn. I trust that the Government of Her Majesty have endeavoured to impress upon the Governments of Holland and France the inexpediency and the danger of pressing forward questions of this kind, knowing, as they must do, that Prussia, with all its power, and with one of the most capable Ministers that ever guided the destinies of a people at its head, will resent that irruption into a pure German population. Of course, this country has no direct interest in trifling territorial adjustment. We only want to see France great in the power of her arts and commerce. But it is this continuous agitation—this disregard of treaties, which is the primary cause of the uneasiness that exists in Europe. I hope that the reply of the noble Lord has been such as to enhance the position and influence of this country abroad.

LORD STANLEY: Although this question of Luxembourg may be in its ultimate result one of great importance; and although the mere stirring of it up during the last ten days has agitated Europe in no inconsiderable degree, yet the facts, which the right hon. Gentleman has accurately stated, lie in a very narrow compass. And, although he has made some remarks to which I cannot agree, and said one or two things which I regret were said, still I am glad he has given me the opportunity of stating, so far as I am able, what has passed in this matter. Every one knows that the French Government have desired to possess this territory of Luxembourg. It is also pretty generally known that the King of Holland was ready to part, on certain conditions, with the interest he had in it. I must remind the House that this is a matter for the King of Holland rather than for the Dutch Government. The territory is detached from that Government, and it is only connected with Holland by the tie of a common Sovereign. I am bound to say, in the interest of truth, that, so far as I am aware, the Dutch Government and the Dutch people do not regard this outlying territory as of any importance to them, or as adding to the strength, security, and prosperity of their country. But it is not the fact that the King of Holland was ever ready to part with this territory unconditionally. As I am informed there were various stipulations which he proposed, and on which he insisted as indispensable to the transfer, if it took place. One of them was, that he should receive certain compensation; but whether that compensation was intended to take a direct pecuniary form I have no information. Another stipulation which I feel bound to mention after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, on which the King of Holland insisted, was, that the wishes of the people of Luxembourg should be consulted. The third, and, for practical purposes, the most important of all, was, that the consent of the Great Powers should be obtained—and especially the consent of Prussia. Now, Sir, Prussia, as the House is aware, possesses and claims to possess by special treaty the right of garrison in the fortress of Luxembourg; and both on that account and as a neighbour—and particularly as the head of the Confederated States of Germany—Prussia has a deeper and closer interest in this matter than any other European Power. When the matter came to the knowledge of the Prussian Government a communication was made by it to the other Powers which signed the Treaty of April, 1839. That treaty regulates the relations of Belgium and Holland, and guarantees Luxembourg to the King of Holland. One of these communications was addressed to Baron Beust, and another to Her Majesty's Government; and the latter was received by me on Sunday last. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of this negotiation as of an old date. [SIR ROBERT PEEL: Last October.] I do not know what may have passed in secret; but all I can say is that no information reached Her Majesty's Government as to the transfer being in contemplation until about ten days ago. The Questions that were put to me by the Prussian Government were in substance two. One was, whether the British Government would endeavour to dissuade the King of Holland from going on with the negotiations supposed to be in progress; and the other was, what construction was put by the British Government upon the guarantee contained in the Treaty of 1839. As to the second of these Questions, I could not undertake to give a definite reply at once, for this reason—that it was obviously very desirable, if any representation or action were required to be taken on the Treaty of 1839, that such representation should not be the act of any single Power, but should be made in concert with the other Powers by whom that treaty was signed, and who equally with us were responsible. But I did not conceal a doubt (and I might use a stronger word) which existed in my mind as to whether the guarantee given by that Treaty of 1839 was one of a character to apply to the present case. And for this reason. That guarantee was undoubtedly intended to defend the interest of the King of Holland in his capacity of Grand Duke of Luxembourg, and to maintain the integrity of the territory. But, of course, if the King of Holland voluntarily surrendered his interest in Luxembourg, and was a consenting party to the arrangements made, his interest as contemplated by the guarantee ceased to be in question, and the matter which remained was a totally different one, between France on the one hand and Germany on the other. Now, neither by that treaty nor at any other time were we pledged to defend the integrity of the German Empire. Germany united, as she is now, and I am glad that she is so—united to an extent which has never before occurred, is perfectly capable of providing for her own defence. I do not think it would be easy to argue, although the right hon. Baronet's reasoning seems to point in that direction, that it is the duty of England to interfere to prevent a transaction which might result in some small aggrandizement on the part of France, when the Government and the people of this country have seen with entire acquiescence, and even, I believe, with approval, the enormous aggrandizement which has accrued to Germany, or rather to Prussia, as the head of the German States, within the last twelve months as the result of the late war. As regards the question whether we should dissuade the King of Holland from proceeding with this negotiation, my answer was that we had been informed—and subsequent intelligence has verified the presumption on which I acted—that the consent of the King of Holland was from the first made conditional on the consent of Prussia and on that of the people of Luxembourg. What may be the feeling of the people of Luxembourg I cannot undertake to say. But from the first I had a strong idea that the consent of Prussia would never be obtained. If these conditions were not fulfilled, the transaction fell to the ground. If the people of Luxembourg offered no objection, and if Prussia—the Power most interested in the proposal—gave her consent, it cannot be said that it was the duty of the British Government to interpose. That is the answer I gave provisionally on the part of Her Majesty's Government. There was no time for more detailed consideration, and there was no need for further expression of opinion on my part. As the House knows, yesterday information was received, not indeed at the time of an official or of an absolutely certain character, but which, nevertheless, bore marks of authenticity, and which I believed to be true, stating that the cession of Luxembourg had been relinquished by the King of Holland. I have had that statement confirmed by the representative of the King of the Netherlands, who called upon me this afternoon and authorized me to make that statement as coming from his Government. I think that is the end of the question as far as Holland is concerned. Whether or not it will put a final end to other questions which may arise out of it is impossible to say. If, however, they should be revived, they will be revived in a different form and under entirely different circumstances. It was in the late case supposed that the King of Holland was a consenting party to the transfer. That state of things is now entirely altered, and I do not, of course, pretend to say what will arise out of the new state of things which has arisen in consequence of his refusal. I have now related all the material facts, and I have done so more in detail than I otherwise should have done because every communication which I have received on the subject having been confidential, I am unable to lay the documents upon the table. But the House may rely upon it that I have given the whole facts of the case as they came before me. Further consideration has confirmed me in the conviction—a conviction in which the House will, I think, share—that we were right in declining to involve ourselves further in a transaction which might be, and still may be, productive of very serious consequences. No interest of ours was either directly or indirectly involved, and we stood absolutely free and unfettered. Sir, that is the whole case as far as it has gone. Something was said by the right hon. Baronet as to the security of Belgium. The security of Belgium is an entirely different matter. Upon that question we are involved in a guarantee solemnly and deliberately entered into. But the question as to the security of Belgium did not in the slightest degree arise during the course of the present transactions. I dealt with the subject as it arose, and I do not think that it is worth our while to go out of our way to anticipate difficulties which have not arisen and which probably never will arise.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The noble Lord has omitted to answer one Question I put. I asked whether the relinquishment of the cession of Luxembourg was in any way owing to the representations of Her Majesty's Government. The noble Lord said that the Powers had agreed to make some joint representation. [Lord STANLEY: No, no!] Pardon me. Russia has made a representation to the Government of France. I wish to know from the noble Lord whether Her Majesty's Government have made any representation to France or to Holland, with a view of inducing either or both of those Powers to relinquish this projected cession?

LORD STANLEY: I thought I had already answered that Question. With regard to any Russian protest against the transaction in question, I heard of it for the first time from the right hon. Baronet. No information has reached the Foreign Office of any action of that kind having been taken by the Russian Government. As to the abandonment of the cession of this province being due to any remonstrance on the part of the British Government, I thought I had stated that considering the cession proposed by the King of Holland was conditional, both upon the consent of the people of Luxembourg and of Prussia, and considering from the first that that consent on the part of Prussia was not given, and did not seem likely to be given, I did not feel myself called upon to make any remonstrance on the part of the British Government. The abandonment, therefore, of the project, if it be abandoned, is certainly not due to any action on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Corry.)

MR. CORRY moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that the Government proposed that it should be considered in Committee on Monday, when the clause relating to flogging would be amended, so as to agree with the Bill relating to the army. The House would then be asked to pass the Bill through all its stages, that it might be disposed of before Easter. According to the Returns received that morning, there had, in the last year, been only two cases of corporal punishment amongst the 9,000 Marines serving on shore in England.

MR. OTWAY said, he should offer no objection at the present stage, because he understood that clauses to which he objected were to be amended in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON moved the second reading of this Bill. He disclaimed all responsibility on the part of the Government in respect of the fortifications referred to by the Bill. They had been projected entirely by the late Government, and it now became the duty of Ministers to see that the works were not left in an unfinished state. The progress which had been made in the science of defence had caused some additional and unforeseen expense to be incurred. No one, for instance, could have anticipated the necessity for plating the works at Portsmouth with iron, which was now considered advisable. £500,000 was required for this plating, and he was sorry to add that the Estimates had been exceeded by upwards of £100,000. Some purchases of land also were necessary. In order to cover this extra expenditure of nearly £700,000, it was proposed to abandon works at Chatham to the extent of £500,000, and at the central arsenal at Cannock Chase to the extent of £150,000. The Bill did not ask for any fresh money, but simply authorized the re-appropriation of this money, and he hoped there would be no unnecessary delay in passing it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Pakington.)

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped the Motion would not be pressed. The right hon. Gentleman had very fairly described the Bill; but his description showed that it dealt with matters of great importance, which demanded more attention than could be devoted to them at five minutes to one o'clock.

MR. HUNT said, the only principle involved in the Bill was as to whether the money which it had been already agreed to raise for certain fortifications should be distributed in a different manner from what was originally intended. The money had already been voted. It was only now proposed to re-distribute it. That question could be easily decided, and he hoped the House would understand how exceedingly inconvenient it would be if the Bill were not passed before Easter.

SIR MORTON PETO moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that if any discussion were desired it might take place in Committee. It was impossible for the Government to proceed with the works if the Bill were not passed. The Government inherited this Bill from their predecessors.

MR. CHILDERS said, that although the Government might have inherited the works from their predecessors, they had not inherited the changes, and it was the new proposals which the House wished to discuss. He did not see how the Bill could be passed before Easter.

ARREST FOR DEBT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Bill to abolish Arrest for Debt on Mesne and Final Process except in certain cases, and to amend the Law of Debtor and Creditor in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN and Mr. BLAKE.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BRUCE, Bill to provide for the Education of the poorer classes in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUCE, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, and Mr. ALGERNON EGERTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 111.]

House adjourned at a quarter
after One o'clock, till Monday next.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."

POSTPONEMENT OF NOTICE.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, my noble Friend the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Clanricarde) having given notice of his intention to call the attention of your Lordships to the case of the Tornado, I would ask him whether it would not be better, if it should not be inconvenient to himself and to the House, to postpone the discussion of that question until after the Easter recess. My reason for offering this suggestion is that, as your Lordships are aware, additional Papers with respect to our relations with Spain, which have recently been laid upon the table, show that those relations have assumed a more serious and a more complicated character than that which they had previously presented. I allude, of course, to the papers with respect to the case of the Victoria, which appears to me to be of infinitely more importance than those which relate to the Tornado. In that case a British sailing vessel was seized by the Spanish authorities some fourteen or fifteen miles from the coast, and was then taken to Cadiz and ordered to be there broken up. Now, whatever may be said—and there may perhaps be arguments advanced upon both sides—with regard to the Tornado, it appears to Her Majesty's Government that there can be no palliation or excuse for what has been done with reference to the Victoria. It was a more than common outrage, because it was an outrage to a British vessel upon the high seas; and if such an insult was offered to the British flag the fact would be one of so serious a character that, as your Lordships will see from the papers, Her Majesty's Government have thought it necessary to take the gravest notice of it. No answer has as yet been received from the Spanish Government to the despatch of Lord Stanley upon the subject. In that despatch Lord Stanley has asked, as your Lordships must be aware, for compensation to the full amount for the loss sustained by the owners of the vessel, and for an apology to this country for the outrage offered to our flag. But as that demand has not yet been answered, I should be glad if the noble Marquess would not now raise that other question of the Tornado, to which he has given notice that he proposes to direct your Lordships' attention. I must add that when I remember the proverbial sense of honour which the Spaniards feel with respect to their own national rights, and when I bear in mind that if such an outrage had been committed on a Spanish vessel in the Channel, a cry of indignant remonstrance would have been raised from Cadiz to the Pyrenees, I am convinced that the Spanish Government, when they take the facts into their consideration, will not hesitate to afford that compensation and that apology which we have demanded, and will not throw the shield of their protection over the subordinate officers who have been engaged in this transaction. With this belief—and, indeed, I may almost say with this conviction—I trust that after the Easter recess we shall be able to state that the affair has assumed a less serious and less menacing aspect; while I should be afraid that if the noble Marquess were to raise any discussion at this moment in your Lordships' House, it would rather be prejudicial than beneficial to the negotiations which are taking place.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE : Of course, when my noble Friend, speaking as a Minister of the Crown, says that it would be better upon public grounds not now to enter into a discussion with respect to our relations with Spain, I cannot refuse to accede to his request for postponement. At the same time, I wish it to be clearly understood that I do so under protest that those British subjects who are concerned in the question which I wish to bring before your Lordships shall not be made to suffer by reason of that postponement. If their case is made out, as I believe it eventually will be, and the Spanish Government shall find that its officers have been in the wrong, I claim that every British seaman who has been wronged, and the owners of the British ship which has been detained, shall be indemnified up to the last hour and to the full extent of the injury inflicted upon them. I can only express my satisfaction at the news we have all heard to day—namely, that the Mediterranean fleet has received orders to move from Malta.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON : I am happy to find that my noble Friend the noble Marquess has thought it consistent with his duty to comply with the request addressed to him by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury); and I should be extremely glad if the result of the discussion which is to take place after the Easter recess should be to clear the owners of the Tornado of the suspicion that now attaches to them. There are so many facilities in this country for evading the law, and so many persons entertain so little scruple in resorting to those evasions, that I think the opinion with respect to their proceedings cannot be too strongly expressed, and that it cannot be too clearly known that those who, for their own private gain, disregard the Queen's proclamation, and violate the neutrality of this country in order to aid and abet one foreign Power at war with another, but with both of which England is at peace, do so at their own risk of being treated as belligerents by the State against which they are acting; and that as they thereby forfeit all claim to the protection of their own Government, so assuredly they will not receive it except in as far as may be necessary for the vindication of the principles of strict justice and of International Law. I will not at this moment and without any discussion of the question, affirm that the owners of the Tornado are in this position; but I think that if I were to enter into the case I should be able to show that great suspicion attaches to that vessel. With regard to the other case—the case of the Victoria—which is of a far graver and more serious character, I do not believe that there has existed any intentional hostility towards this country on the part of the Spanish Government. There seems no reason for believing it, for I have never known that Government to act in a hostile manner towards this country; and I have no doubt therefore that when the facts of the case become known to them, the satisfaction which we are entitled to claim will not be withheld. But, at the same time, I cannot help expressing my regret that the peremptory despatch written by my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office—a despatch which is, I think, perfectly justified by the circumstances of the case—I cannot help expressing my regret that as soon as that despatch was written it should have been published. Knowing as I do the susceptibility of the Spanish people, and the spirit by which they are animated, I am afraid that if it should be suspected that that publication was intended to threaten and coerce them, it may be difficult for the Spanish Government to give a satisfactory answer to the despatch.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE : I wish to give notice that I will bring the case of the Tornado under the notice of your Lordships on the first day of the meeting of the House after the Easter recess. I must say I do not think it was quite fair on the part of my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Clarendon) before he has heard what there is to be said upon the matter, to state anything either for or against the owners of that vessel. He says that a suspicion attaches to them of having violated or evaded the law. Anybody who looks through the documents will see that they have had no fair trial, that our Foreign office has declared so, and that not one scrap of evidence has been given on that side of the question. But, more than that, I ask the noble Earl whether it is upon suspicion that British sailors are to be put in irons and ill-treated; whether it is upon suspicion that a British ship is to be seized upon the high seas, and British shipowners are to be branded in the way in which the noble Earl has almost branded them? If our Foreign Enlistment Act is defective, let it be made stronger, should that be deemed wise; but as long as British seamen and British shipowners obey the law and act honestly, no foreign Government should be suffered to treat them with cruelty or injustice.

EARL RUSSELL: I do not wish to give any decided opinion upon this occasion with regard to the case of the Tornado. But my noble Friend the noble Marquess and the House must see that there are two entirely different questions with respect to that vessel. One is the case of the owners of the ship—whether they were engaged in a lawful or in an unlawful trade; and the other is with respect to the treatment of the master and of the crew after her seizure by the Spanish authorities. With respect to the first case, I have no doubt that we shall hereafter hear from my noble Friend arguments in support of the views he has stated upon the question; and I reserve my opinion upon it. With respect to the case of the Victoria, I participate in the regret my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Clarendon) has expressed that Lord Stanley should have published his despatch within two or three days of the date which it bears. But that despatch having been published—and as I suppose with the consent of Her Majesty's Ministers—and the Spanish Government having had time to reply to it, I think that no delay should now take place in the decision of the question. As the facts appear, it is a case of great wrong against a British ship and against the British flag; and I trust that the Spanish Government will grant the redress which we demand of them. But if they do not, it is desirable that no time should be lost in deciding upon the course which it may be necessary to adopt for the vindication of the honour of the country.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON, in explanation, said, he was sorry to have excited the anger of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde), and he could assure him that he had confounded two distinct things. He had not said that the Spanish Government had behaved well to these English sailors. He thought there was no justification for the great cruelty exhibited towards them in keeping them in irons and detaining them in custody, as had been done. He had said nothing whatever about that. His allusion was to the owners of the vessel, who, acting for their private gain, might get this country into trouble.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— METROPOLITAN BOROUGHES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved an humble Address to Her Majesty for—

“A Return stating separately for each Borough within the metropolis the following particulars:—

1. The Estimated Adult Male Population:
2. The Number of Adult Male Householders:
3. The estimated Adult Male Population who are not Householders:
4. Reports from the Overseer of each Parish stating, so far as can be ascertained, the Proportion of Lodgers who pay for unfurnished Rooms 4s. a Week or upwards, and the Proportion who pay less than 4s. a Week:
5. Such Reports also to state the lowest weekly Amount per Lodger paid by any considerable Number of Lodgers within such Parish.”

The noble Earl said, the Reform Bill would add something like 400,000 voters to the metropolitan constituency, and it was therefore very desirable to have such Returns as those he moved for.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, the Returns under the three first heads, could be easily made; but the remaining Returns could not possibly be obtained with any degree of accuracy within a reasonable time. He therefore suggested that the last two paragraphs of the Motion should be omitted.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he would be content with the information proposed.

Motion amended and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the system of marking proposed to be adopted by the Civil Service Commissioners at the Examination of Candidates for the Civil Service of India at the examination commencing on the 9th instant; and whether it has been proposed by the Commissioners to deduct a certain number of marks; and, if so, what number of marks on each subject before a Candidate can be allowed to count any marks to his credit?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, no new rule would be adopted in the examination for the Civil Service of India, commencing on the 9th instant.

The rules were the same as those adopted on the last occasion, stated in the Eleventh Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, and that was already in the hands of Members. The system of deduction was this—that 125 marks would be deducted from the marks of every candidate—except in mathematics, in which no deduction whatever was made—who did not in any branch of the examination attain the requisite number to allow them to count.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS— DEAN AND CHAPTER OF WESTMINSTER.

QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the Judge Advocate General, Whether he will, in accordance with the undertaking of the late Home Secretary, lay upon the table the scheme showing the terms upon which the Dean and Chapter of Westminster have transferred their Capitular Estates to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners?

MR. MOWBRAY said, in reply, that the scheme to which his hon. Friend had referred was not yet so complete as to enable him to lay it on the table. If moved for he should have no objection to its production, and he would give his hon. Friend private notice when the scheme was in a proper state to be laid on the table.

DISTRESS IN POPLAR.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been officially called to the great and exceptional distress now existing in the Poplar Union; and, whether any Communication or Memorial has been received by him from the Guardians of the Poor of that Union or by the members of the Board of Works for the Poplar district; and, if so, whether he would have any objection to lay such Papers upon the table of the House, together with any replies that may have been sent by him to such Memorials or Communications?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply to the Question of the noble Lord, he had to state that his attention had been called by the guardians of the Poplar Union to the great distress existing in the district, and the weight of rates with which they were burdened. They had also stated that a memorial on the subject would be presented. He had not yet received that memorial; but when he did the Papers connected with the subject would readily be laid on the table.

MONUMENT TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, When the statue of the late Duke of Wellington, for the erection of which in St. Paul's Cathedral the sum of £20,000 was voted in 1858, is likely to be finished and put in its place?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that it was a monument to the Duke of Wellington, not a statue of the Duke of Wellington which was to be erected in St. Paul's Cathedral. He had every reason to hope that the monument, which was one of the largest that had been erected in any church in England during the present century, would be completed in about two years from this time. He might state that in consequence of what had fallen on Friday evening from the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite) and others, and the suggestions they had offered to him with reference to the buildings for the London University in Burlington Gardens, he had communicated with Mr. Pennethorne on Saturday morning, and requested him to make arrangements with the contractors, that the progress of the works be stayed for two weeks, so that the question of style should be further prejudged. He might further state that he understood the probable extra cost of changing the style of building would be between £7,000 and £8,000.

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN. QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any official communication has been received by telegram or despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid relative to the seizure of the vessel Queen Victoria by the Spanish authorities; and, if the Spanish Government has complied with the terms demanded by the Foreign Secretary in his letter to Sir John Crampton of 30th March 1867?

LORD STANLEY: No, Sir; I have not received the answer of the Spanish Government.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, with reference to the answer which had just been given by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he would beg to ask, whether it is true that the Mediteranean squadron has proceeded with sealed instructions, it is to be presumed, to the coast of Spain?

LORD STANLEY: If the hon. Gentleman had asked me what were the orders given to particular vessels in the Mediterranean, I do not know that it would be my duty to answer him. I will only state that Gibraltar, being within the ordinary cruising-ground of the Mediterranean squadron, there is nothing unusual in the fact of one or two vessels being sent there.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the proposed continuance of certain Trusts which were scheduled last year, he will introduce the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill in sufficient time to allow a discussion as to the expediency of such continuance?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, matters would be expedited so as to enable the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill to be laid on the table by the end of May.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM — REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL— [BILL 79.]—COMMITTEE.

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.)

INSTRUCTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LOCKE: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Order of the Day for the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) has given notice of moving an Instruction to the Committee "that they have power to alter the law of rating." That was the first branch of the Instruction. Then it went on—

"And to provide that, in every Parliamentary Borough, the occupiers of tenements below a given rateable value be relieved from liability to personal rating, with a view to fix a line for the Borough Franchise at and above which all occupiers shall be entered on the rate book, and shall have equal facilities for the enjoyment of such Franchise, as a residential occupation Franchise."

The Question I wish to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer is whether, if the words after the word "rating" in the third line of the Instruction be withdrawn, he would be willing to accede to the proposal of the Instruction to the Committee that they have power to alter the law of rating.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think that, as a general rule, it is very inconvenient to reply to hypothetical questions. Therefore, I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to ask him whether he has any authority to state that the latter part of the Instruction has been withdrawn.

MR. LOCKE: I think, Sir, I may say that that is the case. On that understanding I understood that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to assent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I conclude now, Sir, that the latter part of the Instruction is withdrawn. I am sure that a Gentlemen of the hon. and learned Member's position would not make that statement without authority. Yet I think it would have been more Parliamentary if the author of the Instruction had put the Question, as he could have told us what were his intentions. But as I think that on an occasion like the present we should be precise, I will first read to the House the proposed Instruction that there may be no misapprehension or misconstruction as to my views. The hon. and learned Member for Exeter gave notice of his intention to move the following Resolution:—

And then it goes on—

"And to provide that, in every Parliamentary Borough, the occupiers of tenements below a given rateable value be relieved from liability to personal rating, with a view to fix a line for the Borough Franchise at and above which all occupiers shall be entered on the rate book, and shall have equal facilities for the enjoyment of such Franchise, as a residential occupation Franchise."

Now, Sir, I must observe, with regard to the second and more considerable part of this proposed Instruction—that is to say, the portion of it after the word "rating," which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Locke) has informed the House has been withdrawn—that I must regret, for my own individual sake, that we are to be deprived of the advantage of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter upon the subject; because, although I have devoted no inconsiderable time to that part of the Instruction, I have hitherto been unable to put any definite meaning upon it. However, as it has ceased to exist, I will not pursue the subject. With regard to the first portion of the Instruction—

I must inform the House that Her Majesty's Government, although they were no doubt in error, were under the impression that the Committee had power to take the subject of rating into consideration without any Instruction from the House. The noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor), who takes so much interest in this question, must have been under the same misapprehension, or he would not have given notice of his intention to move the Amendments that stand on the paper in his name. Therefore, on this point it is unnecessary for me—it requires no "pressure," however "gentle," to say that I think it will be for the convenience of the Committee if the first part of the Instruction be adopted. Perhaps now that I am on my legs, I may state, for the convenience of the House generally, and for that of the Irish Members in particular, that on the sitting of the House on Friday next, I will move that the House upon that day adjourn until Monday, the 29th instant.

MR. COLERIDGE: With regard to the latter part of the proposed Instruction to the Committee, which stands upon the paper in my name, and which the right hon. Gentleman states, that after having devoted much time to it he is unable to understand, I trust that, had it been necessary for me to have gone into the subject, I should, without the expenditure of much time or trouble, have had little difficulty in explaining it to the right hon. Gentleman. It was from no desire on my part to be otherwise than frank in my dealings with the House that I did not withdraw the second part of the Instruction myself, but simply from a misunderstanding of the forms of the House, and because the hon. and learned Member for Southwark asked a Question of the right hon. Gentleman without an understanding with me. [Mr. Locke: That I deny.] Understanding from those ordinary means of information which Members of the House possess, that the right hon. Gentleman and those who act with him were willing to accept the first part of the Instruction, I have agreed to withdraw the second part of it. I may say that I never had it in my mind to disturb the peace of the Government or to oppose them in the passing of this measure. I have no desire to change the side of the House upon which we are so comfortably seated. Hon. Gentlemen may understand that when I say that I should regard it as a great misfortune if the Bill did not pass this Session. I say that with the most entire sincerity. As I understand that there will be ample opportunity in Committee to give effect if we choose—that is to say, if we can—to the latter part of the proposed Instruction, I have not the slightest difficulty in withdrawing that portion of it. I therefore now beg to withdraw that part, on the understanding that something to its effect will be introduced and fully discussed in Committee. I now ask leave to move the first part of the Instruction.

MR. LOCKE: I wish to make one observation with regard to the statement that has been made by the hon. and learned Member. He says that I had no communication with him with regard to the Question I put to the right hon. Gentleman. All I can say is I asked him whether he would like to put it, or whether I should. I may further say that the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand) went out of the House to bring the hon. and learned Member in to hear me put the Question and to give an explanation upon it. I hope that the hon. and learned Member will acquit me, under these peculiar circumstances, of having acted toward him in any way which was unfair or not according to the rules of the House.

MR. COLERIDGE: The hon. and learned Gentleman has misunderstood me. I never meant to say that he had acted in any way unfairly, or not according to the rules of the House. I was surprised at the expression of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) in reference to my not having personally withdrawn the second part of the Instruction. All I meant to say was that I had no message from the hon. Gentleman; I did not understand what his question to me referred to; and I did not think there was any arrangement on the subject between us.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY: I wish, Sir, to move an addition to the Instruction of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I wish to move that the Committee have power to make a provision against bribery and corruption. In 1860 the House of Commons affirmed that the question of bribery and corruption should be dealt with simultaneously with any measure for the reform of the House of Commons. Last year the House, by a majority of 10 in a full House, affirmed that principle. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice at the commencement of the Session that he would deal with this question, though not in the same Bill. We have now nearly reached the Easter recess, but no such Bill has been laid upon the table. I wish that the question should not be shelved, and if we are to have the question of Reform dealt with, I trust that measures will be taken for the excision of this black spot.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out the position in which the House is now placed. The hon. Baronet will do better to move his Instruction as a distinct Instruction. The Question before the House is, that it be an Instruction to the Committee to alter the law of rating.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I only wish to say, in reply to the observation of my hon. Friend (Sir Rainald Knightley), that the Bill of the Government relating to bribery and corruption is prepared. I should have brought it forward to-night had it not been that I did not regard it as desirable to interpose any Government business which might delay the discussion on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Exeter. I will, however, now arrange to bring forward the Bill on Thursday next.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I trust I shall be excused if I express a hope that the Instruction of the hon. Baronet—

SIR GEORGE GREY: I rise to order. The hon. Gentleman is under a misconception. The Instruction has not been moved.

Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to alter the law of rating.—(Mr. Coleridge.)

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY: I rise to move that the Committee have power to make provision to prevent bribery and corruption at elections.

MR. OSBORNE: I rise to second the Motion. I do so because in the course of last Session when a similar Motion was made by the hon. Baronet, and hon. Members before me sat on the other side of the House, I took the same course. I so acted because I am seriously impressed with the importance of the question, and think that some Bill should be introduced for the further prevention of bribery and corruption. Since I am upon my legs, and as this may possibly be the last time on which the House will have the opportunity of discussing the principle of this Bill, I will, with the leave of the House, make a few observations upon it.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman rose to second the Instruction; and if it be accepted or rejected, then there will remain a Motion that I do leave the Chair, upon which the whole subject will be open for discussion, and that will be the time for the hon. Gentleman to make any observations.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I am obliged. I will content myself by merely urging the hon. Baronet to persevere with the Instruction which he has moved, and I will reserve what I have to say till the proper time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to make provision for the prevention of bribery and corruption at Elections."—(Sir Rainald Knightley.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. Member, by giving notice of this Instruction, has vindicated the course he pursued last Session as well as the course which those hon. Members took who voted with him. It has been said that the Motion was factious; but I am sure that I myself, and the Members who sit near me, voted bona fide upon that Motion. If the Government think it best to bring in a separate Bill upon the subject, when we have seen that Bill we shall be able to form an opinion of the adequacy of the provisions to remedy that which has become a blame and discredit to our whole Parliamentary system. But another subject has arisen to-night, and arisen out of the Report of a Committee with respect to the result of an election in Ireland; and I think that when the general question of bribery and corruption is considered, it will be well also that the subject of intimidation should be taken into consideration. I have represented a popular constituency for many years, and I have been in various conflicts, and although I never knew my friends to be intimidated, I have known attempts made to intimidate them. But if attempts should be carried to such lengths as they have been in the county of Waterford, so that voters have to defend their franchise at the risk of their lives, many will no doubt forbear to exercise their privilege. It is idle to suppose that the people of this country or of Ireland value their franchises less because they have been long able to exercise them peaceably. If a measure for an extended suffrage should pass this and the other House of Parliament, as it will not extend to manhood suffrage, it will be of the utmost importance that the non-electors should be satisfied that the electors are free to exercise the privilege and trust with which they have been endowed for the benefit of the whole community. It is important, particularly in reference to the non-electors, that it should be known that electors exercise the franchise free from intimidation, and also from those baser influences against the exercise of which the Instruction of the hon. Baronet is so well directed.

MR. ESMONDE: I should not have ventured to address the House on this occasion; but the allusion that the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) has so unexpectedly made to the Waterford election has prevented me from remaining silent. I think that it would have been more respectful to the House, and that the hon. Member would have shown more fair play, if he had had—I was going to say the decency—but as perhaps that would not be quite a Parliamentary expression, I will say the courtesy to wait until the evidence taken before the Committee was in the hands of hon. Members. I challenge the hon. Member, when that evidence is in the hands of Members, to bring forward a Motion upon the subject. My able Colleague did not go into his defence at all. We had not a fair opportunity of making out our case because the hon. Gentleman who claimed the seat "funked the fight," and thus we were precluded from defence. I can tell the hon. Member that intimidation on the part of the people will not be the only sort of intimidation which we shall bring before the House if he will bring forward a Motion upon the subject. And not only intimidation, but perhaps we may also bring forward cases that may be included within the Bill that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to lay upon the table on Thursday night.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Baronet (Sir Rainald Knightley) and also my hon. Friend (Mr. Osborne) have acted with perfect consistency upon this occasion. I may venture to call to the mind of the hon. Baronet that when he made a similar Motion last year I did not use any expression that was otherwise than consistent with my belief of the full integrity and singleness of purpose with which he was actuated. He has shown this again upon the present occasion; but I find myself under the necessity of pursuing the same course that I then pursued, and for the same reason that I then urged. I conceive that nothing can be more clear than the double proposition that the question of bribery and corruption is associated with that of Parliamentary Reform; and that though naturally and closely associated with it, it is more politic and convenient to treat the two questions in separate Bills. The proof of this is very simple. What we seek to gain in reference to Parliamentary Reform is of vast importance; and although it is desirable that we should be able to consider it free from party feeling, it is not practically easy to attain that object. Passion and prejudice will of necessity mix to a great extent with the discussions upon the Reform Bill; but in reference to bribery and corruption, we may hope to adopt some measure without party feeling. Upon this matter we have a general community of interest, and that being so, it is far better that we should treat the question by itself than attempt to pass a measure upon it in association with another subject, in regard to which the House will certainly be strongly excited. It is not therefore any indifference to entertain the subject, it is, on the contrary, my deep conviction of the importance of the subject, and of dealing with it speedily and effectively, that leads me to adhere to the course that the Government propose, that of dealing with it by a separate Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer at the commencement of the Session, when he proposed another Reform Bill, stated that he would include in it a clause in reference to bribery and corruption. I heard that announcement not with the least intention of opposing it, but with the belief that it would be wiser to have a separation between the two questions. I fully coincide with the Government in the belief that it will be best to have separate Bills, and therefore I cannot vote for the course proposed by the hon. Baronet.

MR. DILLWYN: I hope that in one shape or another bribery and corruption will be dealt with by the House. I hope that the subject of intimidation will also be dealt with. I will even go further, and say that—though in what form I do not say—I want to see some provisions to protect the voter in exercising his franchise, apart from the question of intimidation. I should not have risen on this occasion but that I was a member of the Waterford Committee, the proceedings of which have been, I think, improperly introduced on this occasion. I am of opinion that it would have been more proper to wait until the evidence was before the House. I have only risen now to say that I cordially agree with the Resolution proposed, though I hope that it will on a future occasion take a wider scope. I hope that some definite steps will be taken to protect the voter in exercising his franchise. I do not say whether or not this should be done by the ballot, though I myself believe that this would be the most effectual mode of doing it, and I should be glad if the House took the same view.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In deciding to separate the subject of bribery and corrupt practices from that of Parliamentary Reform, Her Majesty's Government were under the impression that they were following the general wish of the House. The manner in which the matter should be approached they did not consider to be very important. I may remind the House that when I have brought in a Bill to deal with bribery and corruption, if they consent to read it a second time, it will then be in the power of the House to refer it to the Committee in connection with the Bill as to Parliamentary Reform. The only question is whether the matter being one that is deserving of serious consideration it would be better to deal with it separately. Still, the House can refer it to the Committee upon Parliamentary Reform if they think it necessary.

MR. BARROW: I hope that we shall have full opportunity of considering what are the provisions for the prevention of bribery, corruption, and intimidation. I have the strongest wish that the question shall be decided, and also that we should know, before we pass the Reform Bill, what powers will be given for the suppression of these evils.

MR. CLAY: It will be in the recollection of the hon. Baronet that when he last year proposed an Instruction similar to that which he now proposes I voted with him. I never regretted that vote, and I think that no Reform Bill will much improve our representation unless we can contrive to secure an approach to the absence at elections of that which every gentleman sincerely regrets. We have now a promise of a Bill upon the subject on Thursday next, and it is clear that the subject can be dealt with separately, at least as well as by treating it in the Committee upon the Reform Bill. At the same time, I must say that last year there was not only no Bill, but there seemed no way of bringing the subject under discussion except that proposed by the hon. Baronet. Under the circumstances, I urge him not to give the House the trouble of dividing on the present occasion, but to withdraw his Instruction, recollecting, after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Bill to be proposed may be referred to the Committee on the Reform Bill.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY: Understanding that the right hon. Gentleman will bring in his Bill on Thursday, and that after it has been read a second time it may, if necessary, be referred to the Committee on the Reform Bill, I will withdraw my Motion.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, he would not have troubled the House on that occasion were it not for the observations made in reference to the late Waterford and Tipperary elections. But observations having been made of a character most injurious to the people of the county, with which he was connected, he thought it his duty to tell the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) that he had acted in a most unfair and improper manner in bringing that question before the House without knowing anything whatever of the merits of the case. The hon. Gentleman had talked of intimidation and coercion as having been practised at those elections. He (Sir Henry Winston-Barron) could tell him that there were two species of intimidation and two species of coercion. The one had provoked the other. It would come out when the evidence was published that men were dragged to the polling places by the orders of their landlords under military force, military coercion, military intimidation, aye, and police intimidation. Electors were thus dragged to the voting places against their will, their convictions, and their honest opinions, and some of them swore to those facts before the Committee. The whole evidence would soon be published, and then the House would see what the facts really were. He again told the hon. Member that he knew nothing whatever of the case. He no doubt took his opinions from The Times newspaper, for instance. He could tell the hon. Gentleman further, that a more garbled, a more offensive, and a more untrue statement never went before the public than that which had been published by the paper he alluded to. He felt that he would not be doing his duty to the House or the country if he did not denounce it as a tissue of calumnies and misrepresentations. He repeated that there were two species of coercion. When they had the evidence before the House it would be seen that the first and most material coercion was that which was practised in the attempt to dragoon the unfortunate voters into voting contrary to their consciences and convictions.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he should not think it necessary to trouble the House on that occasion with any observations; but he had placed a notice on the paper a few days ago to call attention to the late elections for Waterford and Tipperary. He had not as yet fixed any day for his Motion. Though asked to bring forward the question before Easter, he had no wish to do so, first, because he was anxious that the evidence taken before the Select Committees should be published and in the hands of hon. Members; and secondly, because it appeared to him that the subject could be more fairly and impartially considered when the passions and feelings of parties in reference to this matter had had time to subside and cool down. He could assure the House that when he introduced the subject he would endeavour to treat it in such a manner as would afford an opportunity for a fair discussion on all sides, and a calm consideration of all the facts. He simply wished to invite the House of Commons to express its opinion upon the manner in which elections should be conducted in Ireland as well as in England.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CAPTAIN HAYTER said, he rose to move that—

"All Parliamentary Boroughs having a less population than 10,000 persons, according to the Census of 1861, and from which the second seat be taken, shall be increased by adding either from the immediately surrounding district, or from one or more neighbouring Boroughs or Towns, a sufficient number of inhabitants to give every such Parliamentary Borough a population of not less than 10,000 persons."

He should not have ventured to bring forward this Amendment, but that he felt himself fortified by the opinions pronounced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech upon the Re-distribution Bill of last year, as well as by the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and the more distinguished of his Colleagues who took part with the Ministry of 1852 in bringing forward the scheme upon which this Motion was based. His object was to get rid of nomination boroughs, or of those which might be said to be represented by the nominees of great landed proprietors, whether Peers or Commoners. Now, that principle once admitted, he was willing to assent to whatever mode might be suggested as the best for carrying it out. Many hon. Members thought that the best way of carrying out this principle was by uniting unrepresented towns to existing centres of representation; whilst others thought that it would be better to divide them into purely agricultural districts. As to what boroughs should be augmented in size, and whence the electors for augmenting them should be obtained, were matters of detail which could be arranged by a Royal Commission. It became, however, his duty to call the most serious attention of the House to the fact that already out of twenty-three constituencies affected by the Government Bill, twelve would be converted into as pure pocket boroughs as the single seats unaffected by the Bill of Calne, Arundel, Wilton, and Eye. The twelve were Honiton, Thetford, Wells, Marlborough, Richmond, Leominster, Ludlow, Ripon, Huntingdon, Cirencester, Great Marlow, and Lichfield. Five of them would be the property of great Peers or Commoners holding Liberal opinions, and seven of Conservative. They were all, in addition to the single and pure pocket seats, unaffected by the Bill. If the disfranchising process were carried sufficiently high to make this a satisfactory scheme—say to the limit of 10,000 population—forty-five seats would be placed at the disposal of the Government. Among the fifteen double seats lying between the limits of 7,000 and 10,000 population he found the following constituencies, which would certainly become pocket boroughs:—Bridgnorth, Chichester, Chippenham, Malton, Poole, Stamford, Tavistock, and Wycombe; five of these would be the property of Liberal and three of Conservative Peers or Commoners. The total result was curious, since it told equally on either side; ten of the seats would remain in the hands of the Liberal and ten of the Conservative interest. But could that be justly called an improvement of the representation of the people which surrendered the Parliamentary representation of those boroughs to landed proprietors who already possessed, perhaps not unjustly, an overwhelming influence in them? It might be urged that the reduction of the franchise would work a change in these small constituencies not unfavourable to the growth of freedom of election. But the noble Earl, lately at the head of the Colonial Department, and his noble Friend (the Member for Stamford), had concluded that in these small constituencies household suffrage would be the universal rule, and that the new voters would altogether outnumber the old. In rural districts the compounder was unknown; and personal payment of rates everywhere prevailed. But could any one reasonably maintain that any alteration would counteract the influence of a landlord who owned the ground rents of half a borough, and who was not unjustly endeared to his tenants and neighbours? They were unacquainted with the actual state and condition of the compound-householders in these boroughs; but from such information as they had as to household suffrage pure and simple, the newly enfranchised constituency would outnumber and swamp the present. Peers or rich Commoners by the working of this Bill would engross to themselves the representation of twenty-four seats, which was a matter of serious and grave consideration, and unless steps were taken in time discredit would be thrown on what he considered the the best and wisest principle of re-distribution which had been proposed to that House. Upon this subject he would read to the House the opinions expressed last year by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in dealing with the system of grouping. The right hon. Gentleman contrasted the plan of grouping unrepresented towns with the plan of grouping represented. And he said—

“Am I therefore an opponent of the system of grouping? Far from it. I think it is one that well deserves the earnest consideration of the House: it is a powerful and an efficient instrument if used with vigour and discretion. But where I think it might be of great advantage would be if we were to leave the present boroughs alone, and yet avail ourselves of their redundant representation, applying the principle of grouping to our unrepresented boroughs. . . . By grouping in this way I think you would obtain a very considerable accession to the constituency; and I believe that if you dealt with the question in such a manner, you would have the friendly co-operation of the old boroughs themselves.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 888.]

He endorsed those sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman. He well knew, from various sources, many unrepresented towns which might well be associated with those ancient boroughs which, as centres of representation, had held their place in the political system for 500 years. Some occurred to him at that moment—Newhaven to Lewes; Witham to Maldon; Workington to Cockermouth; Shepton and Glastonbury to Wells. All these had a natural affinity, as either the port of the small township, or the natural extension of municipal limits. In conclusion, he would call the attention of the House to the real value of those small boroughs, when so invigorated, to the better representation of the people. Many voices more eloquent than his had been raised to save them from reckless destruction. But those who could judge of the working of the legislative assembly of the nation knew well that unless the existing avenues by which men of distinction in every profession—in law, in arms, in our vast Colonial Empire were preserved, we should soon see that House, not the mirror and reflex of every opinion throughout our land, but separated into hostile camps and marching under rival banners, not to the improvement of legislation, but to everything that tended to hamper and impede the public business of our day. The small boroughs preserved this balance between parties, the two great parties, of the State, the one of which represented the agricultural, the other the manufacturing and commercial interests of our vast community. In conclusion, he appealed to the other side of the House as to whether such a system of natural grouping as he had described would not shield the small boroughs, for at least a generation, from ceaseless agitation and democratic attack. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to rise above the tumults of party faction and the strife of the passing hour; and if he found in this method a means of settling the representation of the people upon a more satisfactory basis, and bringing the agitation upon Reform to a close, he would earn for himself and for his Colleagues a not undistinguished place in the brilliant roll of English statesmen whose names, for many generations yet to come, we should well know how both to cherish and to revere.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "all Parliamentary Boroughs having a less population than 10,000 persons, according to the Census of 1861, and from which the second seat be taken, shall be increased by adding either from the immediately surrounding district, or from one or more neighbouring Boroughs or Towns, a sufficient number of inhabitants to give to every such Parliamentary Borough a population of not less than 10,000 persons,"—(Captain Hayter,) —instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Question which my hon. and gallant Friend has brought before the House is one, I can assure him, that has not escaped our notice. It is, in fact, one that deserves consideration; but there are objections to it which have induced us not to adopt the scheme. I do not understand whether my hon. and gallant Friend intends one Member to be taken from each of the fifteen seats which would rank under the description of places with less than 10,000 inhabitants.

CAPTAIN HAYTER: I do not. The principle is equally applicable whether 7,000 or 10,000 population be the limit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I should not be prepared to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; because I do not think it can be adopted without its being pressed to a much greater extent, and that would lead, I fear, in the result to electoral districts. That I wish to avoid, if I possibly can, and to retain the ancient and distinctive character that still prevails, and which, even with all our changes, may be cherished in our representative system. I hope my hon. and gallant Friend will not ask us to divide on his Amendment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has put it before the House, and no doubt hon. Members will consider it, and when in Committee on the Re-distribution of Seats, we can argue it more fully than now. The question has not escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government; but, so far as we are advised, it is not a scheme that could be adopted with general advantage to the country.

MR. YORKE said, that considering the important question that was nominally before the House, it was not expected that the House would be called on so early in the evening to discuss the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. It would be a pity for the discussion on this Amendment to close without the important principle which was involved being fully discussed. It appeared to him that without the proposed change the representatives of such small boroughs as survived the Reform Bill were likely to become more important persons than they had hitherto been in the representation of the people. If the cumulative vote, which appeared to receive the support of hon. Members opposite, should be carried, the result would be that the three-cornered constituencies would almost balance one another. Where there were two Members the minority would have equal weight with the majority. When any great question was before the country, the decision would virtually rest with the boroughs returning one Member. Supposing that scheme to be carried, he thought a very great addition should be made in the number of Members who sit for small boroughs. It was never intended to take more from the small boroughs than was required for the large towns which absolutely called for representation. The position of the Members for small boroughs was at present somewhat anomalous in the House. They appeared to exist by sufferance. Their position, if recognised and re-asserted by the passing of a Reform Bill, would be on a different footing to what it was before. If they wished to guard against the tide of popular agitation setting in after this Bill had passed against the small borough representation, the best way to secure themselves from such an attack would be to add to their number and position. Having an unpleasant recollection of the grouping scheme of last year of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), he had no wish to refer to that part of the question. The addition to the numbers and respectability of the present constituencies would have a very great effect in securing them against the besetting vices of which they were accused. There would be less corruption, bribery, and intimidation. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) that there was a residuum that ought to be excluded. If they could not apportion more in accordance with justice the representation of counties and boroughs, the next best thing would be to extend the boundaries of the small boroughs, in order to give them a more independent class of population. This Amendment, which had been introduced by the hon. and gallant Member, had been included in the plan suggested in two schemes which had been brought before the House. He had not felt the necessity for the settlement of this question in the present year as strongly as many hon. Members. He had never been alarmed at the agitation which there was now such a desire to stop, and he feared in their haste they would be apt to settle many things besides this question, unsatisfactorily. He thought that the course which was recommended by the hon. and gallant

Member was a step in the direction of a settlement. He knew no handle that was more easily used by agitators, or would be more likely to cause a renewal of the agitation after the passing of the Bill, than the numerical inequality that existed in small boroughs. He urged the Government to entertain the proposal contained in the Amendment.

MR. SANDFORD said, this proposal was entitled to a much more serious consideration, on the part of the Government, than it seemed to be likely to receive. The President of the Poor Law Board told them that the Bill was founded on the Resolutions. But those Resolutions stated that they would only give an extended suffrage in connection with a plurality of votes, to prevent the undue preponderance of a class. The dual vote was now given up. Plurality of voting was not even thought of. Where, then, were the checks and counterpoises? The only way now of introducing them was by adding to the boundaries of small boroughs. He did not entirely agree with the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member, because it involved the principle of grouping; but he thought it most desirable to add to the boundaries of small boroughs, as by this means bribery and corruption had been stopped. Shoreham and Retford were notorious for their corruption; but that state of things had been put an end to by giving them a widely extended area. There was also another argument in favour of extending the area of these boroughs, as it tended to remove the inequality of towns and counties. For these reasons, though he could not support the Amendment, he hoped the subject would receive further consideration.

MR. LAING said, he merely rose to suggest to the hon. and gallant Member that he should withdraw his Motion. In the present state of the House, and after what had occurred, it was apparent that there was no chance of having the important principles involved in the Amendment properly discussed and decided by the House. He should support the Motion; but he would suggest to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the interest of the cause he sought to serve, that he should withdraw the Amendment, and introduce the subject at a suitable time in Committee.

MR. WYLD said, he thought it would be very difficult to carry out the principle of the Amendment universally. In many of the southern agricultural districts in England it would be found inapplicable. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there were many instances in which these ancient and peculiar boroughs should be preserved. The Reports of Commissions and Committees showed that large boroughs were as liable to intimidations as small ones. He hoped that when the Bill was in Committee the question of distribution of seats would be considered.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he wished to know if this was the time at which he should propose the Motion standing in his name.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is, that I leave the Chair. Since that Motion, an Amendment has been moved, and the hon. Gentleman cannot introduce the new Question of which he has given notice into this Resolution.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he wished to ask, was not the Resolution withdrawn?

CAPTAIN HAYTER said, before withdrawing his Amendment, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would consider the matter in Committee? If so, he would withdraw his Question.

MR. WALPOLE said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already stated that the Question was no doubt a very proper one to be considered in Committee.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Original Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he rose—

MR. SPEAKER: I have to point out to the hon. Gentleman that there is now no room to raise his Question. An Amendment has been negatived; and upon the Motion that I do now leave the Chair, no other Amendment can be proposed. But the hon. Gentleman can speak to that Motion.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he believed he could put himself in order by moving the adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE said, the hon. Member would be in order in addressing himself to his Question.

MR. ROEBUCK: Yes, if he makes no Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is at liberty to address the House, as I have already stated; but he cannot move an Amendment.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, his Amendment appeared on the Notice Paper in this form—

"That it is expedient, by amendment of the Small Tenements Acts, or otherwise, to provide that the occupiers of houses under pounds annual value be wholly exempted from the payment of rates, and that those householders in Parliamentary Boroughs who occupy houses above that value shall alone be entitled to be registered as voters under this Bill; and such persons shall be so entitled, whether they are rated in person or that the rates in respect of the houses occupied by them be levied from the owners under the Small Tenements or any other Act."

He agreed with the Government Bill to the extent that he desired to see the establishment of a rating franchise. But there was a provision in the Bill to which he could not assent; he meant that by which the rating was to be a "personal rating." He did not see what object was to be gained by insisting on a personal rating. What was the distinction between a payment by one's own hand and a payment through the hands of the landlord? He could not recognise any distinction; much less could he see any constitutional principle. It appeared to him to be a distinction without a difference. If he took a house and agreed to pay the rates himself he paid a certain sum for rent. But if the landlord agreed to pay the rates for him, as was a usual practice, he paid a higher rent. Was there, then, any reasonable ground for saying that he was less fitted for exercising the privilege of voting for a Member of Parliament if he paid the rates through the landlord than he would be if he paid them to the collector himself? That the occupier of a compound house did pay the rates through his landlord was admitted on both sides. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had framed a clause for the purpose of giving the compound tenant who had paid his rates through his landlord the power of deducting the amount from his next rent. He had been a Reformer all his life; but another question arose as to whether it was not desirable to eliminate from the electoral roll under the Bill that lower stratum of occupiers who were very little above those actually in the receipt of parochial relief, and who generally were not, either from education or otherwise, fitted for the franchise. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would admit this class in all cases where the occupiers paid the rates themselves. In forty-four boroughs this would give an overwhelming majority to this lower class. There would be a partial preponderance in the same direction in ninety-eight other boroughs. The best means of preventing this evil would, in his judgment, be to introduce a clause to the effect that the occupiers of houses under a certain annual value should be wholly exempted from the payment of rates, and that those householders in Parliamentary boroughs who occupied houses above that value should alone be entitled to be registered as voters, whether they paid their rates personally or not. He believed that unless the Resolution he now proposed were adopted, the agitation for reform would continue and increase until it ended in universal suffrage. The only safe and satisfactory mode of settling the question was by granting the exemption which he proposed; and he especially commended it to the favour and support of hon. Gentlemen opposite, as a Conservative measure which ought to meet with encouragement at the hands of all who were opposed to universal suffrage. He also commended it to hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were sometimes called, or called themselves, the peculiar friends of the poor, as a plan by which they might relieve the poor from a tax which weighed heavily upon them, and at the same time settle the franchise on a safe, substantial, and satisfactory basis.

MR. BERKELEY said, he rose, in accordance with the Notice he had placed on the paper, to "Bring under the consideration of the House the state of demoralization in which the Electors of Great Britain and Ireland are plunged by corruption and the exercise of undue influence."

He might almost address the House as "beloved brethren," so united did all appear on Reform. Thirty years ago, when he first entered upon political life, he supported household suffrage and the ballot. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had now proposed the first; and he therefore was in hope that the time was not far distant when they would also have the second. All he desired on the present occasion was to bring under the notice of the House the grievances under which constituencies now laboured through the corruption and intimidation that prevailed. It was for Her Majesty's Ministers to provide a remedy. He thought no one would deny that among the first principles of our Constitution was this—that every man should vote freely and indifferently—that he should neither be rewarded nor punished for doing so. Having discharged that function the elector did all that was required of him. Blackstone, Lord Chief Justice Holt, Sir Edward Coke, Walpole, Burke, Macaulay, and many other great lawyers and statesmen concurred in the sanctity of the vote and the necessity of protecting the elector in the discharge of his duty. No hon. Member would oppose those leading principles. Then it followed that if the elector could not properly discharge this duty no Reform Bill should be brought into the House which did not recognise the duties of the elector and protect him in the discharge of his electoral functions. It might be said with regard to corruption that a Bill was promised on the subject. No doubt a Bill might be brought in. But suppose the Government were defeated on any part of the Reform Bill and went to the country, as it was called—were they to go to the country on the present system, and with the present defective law, which protected the intimidator and briber, and encouraged corrupt practices? It appeared from various reports that from forty to fifty boroughs had been convicted of malversation of the franchise. There could be no doubt that in all these boroughs corruption was rife. If, then, these boroughs were in this state of corruption—if corruption by bribery was an evil, how much greater an evil was undue influence? Undue influence carried with it the essence of bribery, the principle of rewards and punishments. It had been said by Lord Derby that if you take a number of the counties and the leading noblemen and gentlemen residing in them, it will be easy to say what the politics of the Members will be. That was an admission that the noblemen and gentlemen in counties dictated to the electors, and that the electors did not vote according to their own free will. They were sent to discharge a duty at the poll, and they did not do so because they were under the dominion of the landlord and were liable to be turned out of their tenancies. He hardly thought that that state of things could be desired by any honest man. It was not an exceptional matter, it was the rule. If evidence was wanted on that point let the House look at that taken before Mr. Grote's Committee, which sat to inquire into the abuses which had crept into our electoral system. Mr. Grote proved that the landlords of the country took infinite pains to degrade their tenants, and to deprive them of all inclination to assert their independence in political matters. Mr. Grote considered the intimidation and punishment of electors the giant malady of our electoral constitution, and Mr. Macaulay stated that he considered the master evil of our electoral institutions was undue influence. It had been shown in the case of an estate, which changed hands three times, that when it belonged to a Tory the tenants voted for a Tory candidate, that when it belonged to a Whig the tenants voted for a Whig candidate, and that when it returned to a Tory the voters again voted for a Tory. Take the case of the Duke of Newcastle, who turned seventy men out for voting against his wishes. The noble Duke on that occasion said that every man had a right to do what he liked with his own. No doubt that was the case, and if the tenant had been landed property he might have disposed of him as he liked. If the vote of the tenant were to be the landlord's property, it would be infinitely better that he should possess it actually than that it should be given to the tenant. Let the House look at a more recent case—that of the Duke of Somerset. A more gross instance of undue influence had never been brought to light than that which had been reported by the Totnes Commission. The excuse of the noble Duke in that case was that whilst he was busily employed in building ships and making guns he knew nothing of the proceedings of his agents. One of the Commissioners asked the noble Duke whether he had not purchased a certain estate, and whether that did not give him a certain accession of power? His reply was that the fields which had voted one way before had, when purchased by him, voted another way, showing that, in his opinion, the electors had nothing more to do with their votes than the clods of the field. What had been done by the Duke of Somerset as to interference at elections had been done by a great many other Peers. No Reform Bill would be satisfactory which did not contain provisions to protect the voter in the exercise of his just right. He admitted it might be difficult to legislate against undue influence. The late Sir Robert Peel and Lord Macaulay had admitted the difficulty; but he hoped the majority of the House would, notwithstanding, endeavour to find a remedy, since the present law was a complete failure. He was satisfied that the voters in England required protection. But if the electors of this country required protection, those of Ireland stood in need of it still more. He did not believe that bribery prevailed there to the same extent as here; but undue influence was exercised to a degree perfectly frightful. Between the landlords and the priests the electors of Ireland were in a miserable condition. Scotland was better off in both respects than either England or Ireland. He earnestly pressed upon the Government to give the people of England some relief in this matter.

MR. GORST said, that the sudden collapse of the debate, which had been expected to last till Easter, had taken most Members by surprise, and he thought he was only doing his duty in moving the adjournment of this debate. Hon. Members, he thought, would admit that the subject on which the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and several other subjects which had been brought before the House, had not been debated with that earnestness and attention which their importance called for. Several hon. Members had given notices of important Questions on the Speaker leaving the Chair. This was the last opportunity hon. Members would have of discussing the whole question of Reform; and he thought that the present debate ought to be adjourned to another night, in order to give Members an opportunity of expressing their views. He believed that the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne), and others, had come down with the intention of addressing the House; and if the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair should be forced on the House, those hon. Members would not have an opportunity of making their opinions heard. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in that Motion. I freely admit that there has not been that general and sufficient discussion upon a question so important as Parliamentary Reform that I, myself, could have wished; but that has been occasioned by a variety of circumstances upon which it is now unnecessary to dwell, and which it is more easy to regret than to remedy. If this Motion for the adjournment is carried, you, Sir, will not be able to leave the Chair, and we shall not be able to make that first step in advance which is desirable. I must, Sir, take this opportunity of expressing to the House the deep gratification experienced by the Government and their gratitude for the generous and candid manner in which they have been treated by the House to-night. It shows that the House is resolved to support the Government in carrying this Bill through, subject, of course, to those Amendments which the House may think proper to adopt. I am convinced, after the encouragement we have received this evening, our discussions will terminate in the passing of a Bill that will command the respect and confidence of the country. On the part of the Government, I wish distinctly to express their sense of the generous candour with which they have been treated by the House.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I feel very sensible of the great disadvantage under which I rise to address the House on the present occasion. It is one of the pleasures of belonging to a united party that you should be informed only at the eleventh hour, on the eve of discussing a great question, that the political Epicureans of that party, who are tired and sick of the clamour and strife caused by a Reform Bill, are ready to pass any measure so that they may have a quiet life. But I think it rather an extraordinary thing that those enthusiastic Reformers should have waited until Monday, knowing well on the Friday what was to be brought forward, and that they should have suddenly turned tail when they heard that a dissolution was in view. The position is a most peculiar one. We are now to go into Committee on a Bill, the policy and principle of which have hardly been discussed in the House. The House will recollect that the second reading was shuffled through pro forma, with the understanding that a discussion should take place upon the principle of the Bill before you, Sir, left the Chair. I ask hon. Gentlemen—let them agree with me or not—whether they are satisfied with the position in which this Bill stands at present; whether they are so eager as to pass a measure of any kind in hot haste without knowing or discussing the principles of that measure? There are many principles in the Bill which the House is entitled to question; nor have the difficulties of the subject been smoothed by the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government have displayed as much vacillation as the House has displayed forbearance. What was the course taken by Her Majesty's Ministers on the opening of Parliament? We know that there was a paragraph on the subject of Reform in what is called "Her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech." But Her Majesty's Government were not prepared with any definite scheme or plan. What happened? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer came down to the House and made a long voluminous speech. Nothing came of that, but a week after was produced a bundle of Resolutions. What happened to those Resolutions? That litter of Resolutions, as I may call them, were ushered in with as much pomp and circumstance as they were abandoned with celerity and confusion. In what position do we stand, now that two months of the Session have expired? We have had this bundle of Resolutions and two Reform Bills brought under our notice. It is not necessary for me to refer to Reform Bill No. 1, because the circumstances attending its birth and sudden extinction were graphically related by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) to his constituents at Droitwich. That Bill shared the fate of the thirteen Resolutions. It followed them to the mausoleum of defunct Government schemes. And now the Government have recurred, and with great success, to what is called "their original policy." The House has been induced to give a second reading to a Bill which no Gentleman on either side approves. However much the Conservative party as a body dislike it, the Liberal party distrust it as much. And all this because the right hon. Gentleman was so profuse in his promises that he was ready to amend the Bill and to bow to any suggestions that might be made in Committee. Hon. Members on this side left the House under the idea that they had gained a great victory, and such was the dazzling pyrotechnical display of eloquence on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, that hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House were under the impression that they had gained a great victory too. And what is the consequence? Parliament has been bamboozled, and we are going into Committee on a Bill which no ten Members in their secret hearts like. Sir, I humbly think that in the grave position in which we are placed we ought to seize this opportunity, however late, to come to some understanding as to the principles on which this Bill is based. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has lately given an answer in Downing Street to a chosen few, which he expressly refused to give in this House. He was questioned by hon. Members on this side of the House, and also by a noble Lord, his late Colleague (Viscount Cranbourne), on the other, as to what were the vital points of his measure. He refused to give an answer, and the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) also refused. On Saturday last, however, waited upon by a crowd of admirers from Manchester and the districts in Lancashire, the right hon. Gentleman disclosed the vital points of this measure. We all know now what they are. The vital points of the Government Bill are personal rating, and I suppose residence. Everything may be given up but personal rating and two years' residence. Sir, I was not inclined to take what is called a factious course when the Bill was introduced. Indeed, I recommended that it should be read a second time. I am ready to do penance for having given such foolish advice. What is this Bill, which since it was printed has proved, I am sorry to say, like many of my acquaintance, for the more I know of it the less I like it? It is a Bill founded altogether on false pretences. Pretending to extend the suffrage in one direction, it effectually restricts the suffrage. It is an attempt, and a very successful attempt, to throw dust in the eyes of the Liberal party, and it is a Bill which, as we have seen to-night, has put salt on the tails of forty-eight Liberal Members. What are the provisions of this Bill? I find that they contemplate what is now called by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench an extension of the franchise, but what when in Opposition last year they termed a degradation of the franchise. They provide also for voting papers. Last of all, though it is now struck out, this Bill contained that unfortunate blunder founded on the fatal fifth Resolution. I mean the dual vote, which, like the fifth proposition of Euclid, has proved the pons asinorum of the Treasury Bench. And what are the clauses? I am prepared to show what they are, and I will not trespass long, for the House, I am aware, is not in the humour to listen. Almost every one of these clauses has been denounced and ridiculed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues. On the 26th of March, 1852, Mr. Hume proposed a lodger franchise, one year's residence, payment of rates, and household suffrage, and how was that Bill treated? The Chancellor of the Exchequer stigmatised that proposal as a "revolutionary recommendation." That was, then, his alliterative mode of describing household suffrage. In the year 1867 part of that scheme has become a "Conservative construction," and hon. Gentlemen opposite, like the "Dupes" of the French Revolution, have hailed this "revolutionary recommendation"—as it was called in 1852—as a great Conservative measure. But was the Chancellor of the Exchequer peculiar in that view? There is a right hon. Gentleman who was absent the other night when it was alluded to, and therefore I may as well take the opportunity of refreshing his memory now he is here—a right hon. Gentleman who has lately been promoted to the Secretaryship of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote), and what was his opinion in 1866 of the scheme which is now brought in? It was quoted the other night; but, unfortunately, it was in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, and perhaps, since it is very short, the House will allow me to read it again, for it is well to read these things when we have this recent penitence before us. Here is the deliberate opinion of the right hon. Gentleman upon this "Conservative construction"—

"He was obliged with the utmost sharpness and definiteness to say that he thought to descend to household suffrage at once or at any time, with any safeguards whatever—"

"with any safeguards whatever," and there was no dual vote proposed then, for this was on the educational franchise of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay)—

"would be a most mischievous and reckless innovation of the Constitution."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1584.]

[SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Hear, hear!] Is it possible? Has the right hon. Gentleman arrived at such a frame of mind that he can say "Hear, hear!" to this? Well, after this there is really no telling what a Member for Devonshire and a Secretary for India may not do under these circumstances. Well, Sir, we have also a proposal for taking votes by voting papers. Now, I remember a discussion in this House in 1852. I have the paper in my pocket; but I will keep it until we get to that part of the Bill in Committee.

This proposal was then denounced by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) as a project which would increase bribery and corruption. But there is a recent adherent and convert to the Government; and if the House will allow me I will read what I call a choice specimen of personal rating on the part of a noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu), who about four weeks ago, from the opposite corner, put some very awkward questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but who has now gone through the glorification of being transferred as Vice President of the Council to the Treasury Bench. Here is what the noble Lord said last year, and they are so pat one would almost think he was addressing the present instead of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer—

“It would seem as if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had set himself down to contrive a plan for swamping the agricultural constituencies. . . . Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer suppose that by lowering the franchise he would increase the check which the House of Commons now exercised in the administration of affairs? . . . Did the right hon. Gentleman think he would check bribery by lowering the franchise in boroughs?”—[3 Hansard, clxxxii. 74.]

“Men faithless once are ever faithless men,
Give them but scope, they soon will turn again.”
But that is not all. The noble Lord concluded an animated speech—though it was not so much appreciated as it ought to have been, for I remember that there was barely a House, but the oratory of the noble Lord always enchains me—he concluded thus—

“The Government having before abandoned their character in order to gain their power would not now part with their power in order to regain their character.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxii. 1283.]

These, Sir, are the sentiments of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who opposed tooth and nail a Bill which was offered by their opponents, and who now come down to the House with a Bill of their own, and talk of patriotism and ask for forbearance. I give them credit, at least the higher members of the party, for patriotism; but I cannot think they are entitled to that forbearance which the House, it seems to me, has been rather lavish in the bestowal of. The Chancellor of the Exchequer at the beginning of the Session disclaimed the idea that in bringing forward his Resolutions as a tentative process he was angling for a policy. Now,

Mr. Osborne

I take it that angling for a policy is to some extent a tentative process, though it may be a fair and legitimate Parliamentary practice. But there is a species of fishing which is neither fair, sportsman-like, nor legitimate. My hon. Friend (Mr. Bright) is, I believe, a salmon fisher, and knows to what I allude. There is what is called cross fishing, where a line is used with different coloured flies, and where both sides of the stream are swept. Now, the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleague the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) have lately been employed in this unsportsmanlike transaction. They have been fishing both sides of the Parliamentary river, and we all know with what success they did so the other evening. The President of the Poor Law Board skilfully threw his flies over the head of the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope). He threw the dual vote, the two years' residence, and the counterpoises, and declared that this is a Conservative Bill. That declaration secured the hon. Member. This solitary fish rose on the occasion and was safely gaffed and landed. Then there came the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who threw the fly—not a real fly, but a false fly—of household suffrage down below the gangway on this side of the House, and immediately the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) gorged the bait and was safely landed in the Ministerial basket. Such has been the process which has been going on, and now, forsooth, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given up the use of the rod and has taken to the net, in which he has caught forty-eight ultra-Reformers on this side. This is the way in which the House of Commons and the constituencies of the country have been bamboozled by the Government in their endeavour to pass a Reform Bill which nobody approves, with which nobody is content, and which everybody would like to throw out. How is it that those forty-eight Gentlemen to whom I have referred have been caught? It is because they are afraid of their seats, and dare not face their constituents. I know that it is not a pleasant process to be obliged to vacate one's seat; but, at the same time, I would much sooner be turned out of my seat for an honest and straightforward course of action, than continue to hold it by resorting to subterfuges. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that this Bill is supplementary to the Act of 1832. If it be, why not stick to the old form and model of the Act of 1832—to rental, which was made the basis of the franchise in 1832? Instead of that, the right hon. Gentleman, in his supplementary Bill, introduces a totally new principle—that of personal rating. This question has never been discussed in the House, though it seems to have been received by Reformers generally, and by the forty-eight ultra Reformers in particular, with a sort of placid content. They have accepted what was called the “unerring instinct” displayed by the House last year, and not a word has been said for rental. Nevertheless, I believe that there are a considerable body of Members anxious to take a division on the question between rating and rental, and they are not content to see introduced, in a Bill described as supplementary to the Act of 1832, which based the franchise on rental, the new theory of rating. But we are told that the House itself arrived in the course of last year at the principle of rating by “unerring instinct?” Now, what was the whole history of this “unerring instinct?” It was nothing more or less than the instinct of a majority of 11 on an Amendment moved by an Irish Member, the noble Member for Galway (Lord Dunkellin). Some timid Liberals and bolder Tories succeeded in turning the Government out. The question as between rating and rental was never discussed, not even by the President of the India Board (Sir Stafford Northcote), who can give such strong opinions when he pleases. Not one of the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench opposite—for they were too wise in their generation—spoke on the subject. They were content to see their work done by the noble Lord the Member for Galway, and by another noble Lord—a Scotch noble Lord (Lord Elcho). Seeing their work done by a Scotch and Irish contingent, not a word did they say; and so the “unerring instinct” of accepting rating was simply the instinct to throw out the Government, and seat themselves in their places. I therefore maintain that there has been no satisfactory discussion as to whether rental or rating should be the basis of the franchise. I wish to see the franchise based on rental, and rental alone. And why do I wish it so to be based? If I want arguments in my favour I can easily procure them from the armoury of the Gentlemen who sit upon the opposite Benches. And what were the arguments always adduced with respect to rating? The arguments against basing the franchise on rating are that it is impossible to have an equal assessment all through the country, and that there would be danger from rating of placing the franchise at the mercy of political associations and of parochial authorities, who may or may not be political partisans. I will give you the high authority of one who has studied this particular question, and who in 1859 said—

“There is a wish—I would once have said a very general wish—that instead of the household suffrage being founded on value, it should be founded by preference on rating. . . . I confess that I was always much biased in favour of that idea. It appears to me if you could make—to use a common phrase—the rate book the register, you would very much simplify the business of election. But when you come to examine this matter in detail in order to see how it will act, you will find it is involved in difficulties—great, all acknowledge, and, I am sorry to be obliged to confess, to my mind insurmountable. For the purpose of securing the advantage of having the rate book the register, you must, of course, leave perfect discretion to the overseer. The overseer has an interest in raising rates people may say, or he may be a very hot political partisan. Are you prepared to leave to the overseer the absolute discretion of appointing those who are to exercise the suffrage? . . . Unless you permitted the overseer to be unchallenged, you could not make the rate book the register.”—[3 Hansard, clii. 982.]

That was the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1859, and I think that his arguments go very far to justify the remarks I am making as between rating and rental. But we are told that certain new clauses have been brought up. I must say that I never saw a Bill so badly drawn; and what is the effect of these new clauses, which were only laid on the table on Saturday last? They have no effect at all. They will only influence those boroughs which are under the Small Tenements Act, or some local Acts, and they will infallibly give occasion to the creation of a multitude of fagot votes. This Bill, in fact, promotes the predominance of wealth, and paupers will be put on the register by wealthy men and political associations. Hon. Gentlemen would admit this if they examined the blue book so largely quoted from last Session, containing the evidence given before a Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the probable increase of electors from a reduction of the elective franchise. Mr. Sidney Smith, secretary to the Registration Society, was summoned before that Committee, and he stated—

tical associations by making any provision by which individuals would have to take trouble to keep themselves on the register, and would pro tanto disturb the natural expression of public opinion.

Such is the tendency of this Bill, and alter it in Committee as you may, it will still give a powerful impetus to bribery, corruption, and intimidation. In my mind, there are only two modes of dealing with the Bill. One way, which, perhaps, would be more agreeable to the hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, would be to strike out the ratepaying clauses, and come to household suffrage pure and simple. ["Hear, hear!" from some Opposition Members sitting below the gangway.] Well, I do not complain of that; probably, I might even support those hon. Members who are sure to be in a minority; for neither the country nor the House of Commons would stand these extreme doctrines. There are Gentlemen who are sufficiently enthusiastic even to figure in minorities, but I hope they will remain there. The other way has already been suggested by my hon. Friend (Mr. Poulett Scrope), and is well worthy the consideration of the House. The "Instruction" has gone to keep company with the dual vote, and I can say nothing about it. But I believe that if the figure named in it had been £5, it would have let in 200,000 more voters than the Government Bill, and if £4 had been the figure, double that number would have been admitted. However, that is gone. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. But what is now the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer? When we last debated this question he was, with suavity and condescension, ready to accept hints from anybody. Suddenly, however, he boils up on Saturday at his private meeting with a public reporter, and says that he will die in the last ditch for personal rating. He pledges the existence of his Bill and the Government together on that ground. This declaration was never made to the House of Commons—grateful as the right hon. Gentleman has expressed himself to the House of Commons—and I think he has a great deal to be grateful for. Why was not that declaration made in the House of Commons? That announcement was reserved for his uproarious supporters from Manchester. But I want to know what has been the origin of this? Has he discovered or has he not that any Instruction such as was going to be offered to-night is not for the interest of the Conservative party? I am in possession of a very curious paper; I do not know whether I should read it to the House. ["Read, read!"] Oh, if you press me, of course I must. But I must tell you, Sir, and the House in general, that it is a confidential communication—not given to me confidentially, but given to me by a Conservative Friend who does not altogether agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he says he is a Democrat. The communication is dated, very appropriately, "April 1, 1867," and headed "confidential," and addressed to the agent of a certain borough in the North of England—a Tory agent, of course—at least, I do not know what he is, for it is very difficult in these times, when my hon. Friend below me is actually appearing, to a certain extent, in Conservative colours, to say who's who and what's what. But here is this confidential communication. I will read it for the benefit of the country Gentlemen on this side of the House. It is as follows:—

"6, Victoria Street, Westminster Abbey, S.W.
My dear Sir,—You are aware that the Reform Bill of the Government proposes to give the franchise to all occupiers for two years of dwelling-houses (only) in boroughs who personally pay the full tenements rate (not the compounded rate), and without reducing the Small Tenements Act. Notice has been given in the House of Commons by Lord Grosvenor of a proposal to reduce the limit of the Small Tenements Act from £6 to £5, and to give the franchise only to occupiers at or above a £5 rating. It is probable that such a qualification would not be limited to dwelling-houses only, but extend to shops and buildings with land, as in the Act of 1832.

"I should be exceedingly obliged if you would let me know by Friday morning which of these two proposals would work most favourably in the Conservative interest in your borough, and which, in your opinion, would be the most likely basis of a permanent settlement.—I am, dear Sir, yours very faithfully,
W. SPORFORTH."

[Ministerial cheers, and laughter.] Yes; but you will mark the words—"in the Conservative interest." I think that was a mistake of the right hon. Gentleman in drawing that letter—for I have no doubt that he has drawn it, because it is signed by the confidential agent of the Conservative party. But I want to know, has the right hon. Gentleman made that declaration that personal rating is the vital point of this Bill with two years' residence because he thinks it is for the interest of the Conservative party, and will form "the most likely basis of a permanent settlement?" Sir, I do not know what the interest of the Conservative party is as opposed to that which we hold on this side of the House; but I feel convinced of this—that this Bill, with personal rating and two years' residence, cannot, and will not, form a permanent basis, and instead of settling and fixing the franchise will only renew agitation. For this reason, I am opposed to going into Committee on this Bill. I know it is no use saying so; but I must be allowed, having a strong opinion on this Bill, and not being frightened at the threat of a dissolution, to express that opinion. I am aware there is a section of this House amiable, intelligent, and confiding—men who spent a great deal of money on their last election, who are somewhat dazzled by the ignis fatuus presented to their eye in the shape of household suffrage. They are now, alas! cajoled into thinking that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the Veiled Prophet of Democracy. Therefore, they are ready to follow him into that "Serbian bog"—as he described it—a Committee of this House, in the hope that they will find a secure resting-place for their foot in household suffrage. But they will not get the better of the right hon. Gentleman. He will make use of them for his own purpose, and these Gentlemen, forty-eight in number, will be treated as the thirteen Resolutions were treated. When they are done with they will be put aside. But I must say that it is not creditable to the great parties in this House, whether they sit on this side or that, that we should be cajoled into passing a Bill which we well know offers no settlement of the question. Sir, great forbearance has been shown. But I shall ever regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) did not test us to see what his party are made of. For my part, I would sooner have been in a miserable minority than be reckoned among a party who never know their own mind and are cajoled into passing a measure, not because they think it a good measure—not because they think it will lead to a settlement of the question, but merely to put off the evil day. Sir, however anxious I may be to pass a Reform Bill this Session, I, for one, would much sooner see the Bill, if a bad one, postponed to another Session than pass an imperfect and incomplete measure. Sir, I have taken the liberty of making these observations before you leave the Chair. I repeat, I have a strong opinion on the subject; but I hope

I have not expressed myself in stronger terms than the occasion warrants.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I should certainly not have ventured to intrude myself on the attention of the House but for the personal notice I have had from the hon. Gentleman in the course of the somewhat amusing speech he has addressed to the House. I saw it reported that when I was absent the other day from indisposition an hon. Gentleman referred to the speech I made last year, and to which the hon. Gentleman has just recurred. The hon. Gentleman refers to me as one of the most recent penitents on the subject of Reform. If I were a recent penitent or a penitent at all, I hope I should have the candour to avow it. But, Sir, the opinions I held and expressed last year I hold and am ready to express now. I in no degree depart from the principles I then held by supporting the present Bill. I will take the very speech to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, and I will ask him, not to pick out a few words or a single sentence, but to examine the whole argument. The argument of the speech I made on the second reading of the Bill for establishing an educational franchise, introduced by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), was this—that if you desired to extend the franchise in boroughs and to include, as I admitted it was desirable to include, a number of persons now excluded, you must consider by what means you are to do that. I was comparing the Bill then proposed with that for the reduction of the rental franchise in boroughs from £10 to the limit of £7. I said, if you are going on the principle of reducing the rental occupation franchise from £10 to any other figure—you cannot stop at any limit until you come to household suffrage, and I said I am not prepared now, or at any other time, with or without safeguards, to adopt household suffrage. I took my stand on the occupation franchise fixed by the Act of 1832, which has become consecrated by time; below which I thought it unsafe and unwise to reduce the rental occupation franchise. That was the view which the Conservative Government took in 1859, and they take it now. But holding that view the question presented itself how we should admit those whom it was desirable to enfranchise. There was at that time no other mode of doing that than by proposing other franchises, which should be collateral to the borough rental occupation franchise; and by means of this franchise

we hoped we should be able to admit a considerable number of working men. In 1859 our ideas were not so extended as they are at present. In 1859 it was proposed to admit what was thought a considerable number of working men under the savings bank franchise, under the educational franchise, and under various others. In 1867 we go beyond that. We propose to add to the £10 occupation franchise a rate-paying franchise and a taxpaying franchise, and, with these additions to the existing rental franchise, we believe a very large number of persons will be admitted whom it is desirable to enfranchise. The rate-paying franchise is in no sense a substitute for the rental occupation franchise. It is an addition to, not a substitution for, that franchise. No one will understand the intention and meaning of the Government measure, or the position which Conservatives take in supporting that measure, who insists upon regarding the ratepaying franchise as a substitute for the rental qualification. When hon. Members make objections of this kind—that our franchise is bad because the terms on which it is given are different from those on which the existing franchise is given—it shows that they entirely misunderstand the spirit in which we propose the rating franchise, and they are making an absurd and a preposterous allegation when they state that we ought to put the ratepaying voters on the same footing as the £10 householders. That is the argument I should have proposed to you had the Motion of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Coleridge) been brought before us, because that Motion would have raised the question and brought into prominent view the difference between the two franchises. I now come to the objection that has been raised that we are going to put the ratepayers, whom we are going to admit to the franchise, to the trouble of making the claim to be placed upon the register, that we are going to mulct them to some extent by making them pay rates upon less favourable conditions than other ratepayers, and that we are going to put them to other inconveniences to which £10 householders are not subjected. This was precisely the objection which was taken last year to the educational franchise by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) who said he objected to that franchise, on the ground that it would be putting a man to trouble in order to obtain the vote it was proposed to give him, and that the principle which should be adopted was that if the franchise were conceded at all, it should be given free from any such conditions. The objection, however, serves the useful purpose of pointing out clearly the difference between the principle upon which we are proceeding and the principle upon which Gentlemen opposite, or at least those who represent what are called advanced Liberal opinions, are proceeding. I can quite understand hon. Gentlemen opposite saying that if a man was going to have the franchise he should have it upon the same terms as any other voter. Their principle, as I understand it, is that by nature every man has a prima facie right to the suffrage, and that it is only owing to considerations which it is difficult to understand, but which appear to be satisfactory to them, that they think themselves justified in excluding a large number of persons from the exercise of this right. But that is not the view we take of the matter. We regard the franchise as being not a right, but a trust. In our opinion this House should be so constituted as to form an assembly that shall truly represent the public opinion of the country—that shall truly represent all classes and interests, and that in it all questions and opinions shall be brought to the test of fair discussion. But, even assuming that the view of Gentlemen opposite is correct, the question resolves itself at last into one of selection. Even they admit that they must use some means by which the best men may be selected for exercising this right or this trust. Well, it is this principle of selection that is at the bottom of all those franchises which hon. Gentlemen opposite are pleased to laugh at, and to call “fancy franchises.” We do not say, “We will not give a vote to persons under a particular class,” but we say, “We will open the franchise to every person who may think it worth his while to take some slight trouble to obtain it.” And that is the principle of all Conservative Reform Bills. The governing power in this country is public opinion which will in the end prevail, whatever be the constitution of this House. I am free to state that, in my opinion, this House as at present constituted represents very fairly the public opinion of the country, although I might admit that its constitution as a representative assembly is not perfect, and that it might be benefited by the infusion into the franchise of a larger proportion of the working classes. Now we think we can provide for the satisfactory representation of the working classes by some principle such as that which was contained in the Bill of 1859, and which in a much larger measure is contained in the present Bill. That is the principle I have already referred to that persons may be selected—or, rather, may select themselves—from among the working classes, who, by taking some little trouble, will show that they desire to have, and that they are qualified to obtain, the franchise. Sir, I am very anxious to explain my views upon this point, because I felt that anything which we might state upon this question is liable to be misconstrued, and that the motives that have induced us to take the course we have adopted are liable to be misrepresented. I do not think that we have had a word said against us of which we have any right to complain. We were perfectly aware, when we undertook the task of dealing with the Reform question, that we were exposing ourselves to taunts and to insinuations which it is not pleasant to sit still and listen to. For my own part, when I had once made up my mind to deal with the Reform question, I determined to harden my heart and to close my ears against all taunts, and against all insinuations which I did not feel in my own conscience to be justified. I felt that if I could not justify to myself the course proposed to be followed it would be my duty to abandon the position I held. But, endeavouring to look at the matter as fairly as I can, endeavouring to divest myself of all personal considerations, I am convinced, as far as I am able to form a judgment, that I am in no degree improperly departing from the opinions I expressed last year. Nor do I feel embarrassed respecting any expression taken in its fair sense, and viewed in connection with other parts of the speech, I then made. Last year I expressed very much the same opinions that I have now uttered. I stated last year that I thought the introduction of a Reform Bill was unnecessary. Upon that point I admit that I have changed my opinion. I admit that last year I formed an erroneous judgment, although I at the same time contend that public opinion is fairly represented in this House as at present constituted. I said last year, and I repeat now, that I will not consent to an indiscriminate lowering of the £10 rental franchise which forms the present basis of the borough franchise. Hon. Gentlemen say that by proposing to extend the franchise to rated householders

we are reducing the franchise to something which they are pleased to call household suffrage. Now I contend that there could be no more inaccurate description of our scheme than that. It is perfectly true that if we were to strike out the latter part of the clause which imposes the restrictions of personal ratepaying and residence, we should be creating household suffrage. But you might as well say we are creating manhood suffrage; because if you struck out the restriction of having money in a savings bank from the savings bank franchise you would be creating manhood suffrage. We regard the conditions of personal ratepaying and of residence as being vital to our scheme, and I, for one, could be no party to passing the clause unless it included those restrictions. The challenge of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Coleridge) was on the Main Question, and we should have been perfectly disgraced if we could have accepted such an Instruction as that. We are perfectly prepared to consider with hon. Gentlemen opposite what are the terms on which the ratepaying franchise ought to be given; but if it is to be a ratepaying franchise at all it must have within it the element of personal payment of rates. That condition is essential, and from it it is not possible for us to swerve. I do not know in what form we are discussing this question. It seems to me that in his anxiety to deliver the speech he had prepared the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne) has been getting up a discussion after the proper time. He appeared to me to be like the soldier who fired off his gun after the review was over, not having had an opportunity of firing it off at the time, or who, having had an opportunity of doing so, failed to take advantage of it. We came down here prepared to justify the principle of our Bill, but we find that the "Instruction" which was to have been moved has been withdrawn. No Amendment is proposed to the Motion that you, Sir, leave the Chair, and during the discussion which has taken place this evening the principles of the Bill have not been challenged. We are prepared at any time to justify those principles. There is nothing in the Bill of which the Conservative party, as Conservatives, need be ashamed, and it is a Bill which, if we are fortunate enough to pass, will tend to the satisfaction of the country and to the public advantage.

MR. ALLEN: I think it very important that it should go forth to the country that the right hon. Baronet who has just sat down, in the course of the speech he has just made in favour of the Reform Bill introduced by the Government, of which he is a most distinguished Member, has made use of the very remarkable expression, "he would never consent to any general lowering of the borough franchise." [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I said of the rental franchise.] I thank the right hon. Baronet for correcting me, but I do not really think his correction makes much difference; but I do think his expression a most remarkable one, because it clearly shows what Her Majesty's Ministers think of the effect which will be produced in the borough franchise by their own Bill. Now, I confess that I am one of those who think that the Government Reform Bill is so objectionable in principle, that I believe the more manly and straightforward course for the Liberal party to have adopted would have been to have rejected it on the second reading; and I fear there is now great danger of the Liberal party in the House becoming divided, and losing that power which united action alone can secure to them. Now my objection to this Bill is, that the borough franchise it proposes to create is based on the personal payment of rates, a principle which I consider open to three fatal objections. My first objection to it is, that there will be no uniformity in the borough franchise, which it will create; but in one borough it will mean one thing, and in another borough something totally different. My second objection to it is, that it will make the borough franchise entirely dependent on the accident of whether the Small Tenements Acts, or other local rating Acts are in force or not; Acts which were never intended to have anything to do with the question of the franchise; and my third objection to it is, that it will be in the power of the local authorities of every borough, by putting into force the provisions of the Small Tenements Acts, or any other local rating Acts, or not, to raise or to lower the franchise at their pleasure. Now, these are the objections which I think may fairly be taken to the principle of this Bill. Now, to show the House how this Bill will operate in the different boroughs, I will take the case of the seven boroughs which are situated in the county in which I reside. In the borough of Stoke this Bill will create household suffrage, and add 15,000 electors to 3,400 on the register. In the borough of Newcastle-under-Lyne, which I have the honour to represent, it will also create household suffrage, and add about 1,800 new electors to the existing constituency. In the borough of Lichfield, on the other hand, it will only add three to the existing constituency of 764, and will exclude 945 householders. In the borough of Stafford, the present constituency is about 1,500, and to this it will add 1,555 householders, and exclude 114. In the borough of Wolverhampton the present constituency is 4,830, to which it will add 3,132, while it will exclude 18,369 householders. In Walsall it will add 739 to 1,296 existing electors, and will exclude 5,302; while, again, in Tamworth, where the present constituency is 532, it will add 495 to it, and will exclude 822 householders. Now this is a specimen of the inequalities which this franchise, based on the personal payment of rates, will create in the boroughs in a single county. But to take a broader view of the matter, how will it affect the country at large? In twenty-nine boroughs, in which neither the small Tenements Act, nor any other local rating Acts are in force, it will create household suffrage pure and simple, and will vastly increase the existing constituencies. In fifty-seven boroughs in which the Small Tenements Act is in force, by which owners instead of occupiers are rated for houses of £6 rateable value, it will establish a £6 rating franchise. In ninety-nine boroughs, in which the Small Tenements Act is in force in some parishes, and not in others, it will establish different franchises in the same borough. While in twenty-one boroughs, in which local Acts are in force by which owners are rated instead of occupiers at a rental of £10, it will actually disfranchise existing electors, and these twenty-one boroughs are, for the most part, the most important and populous in the kingdom. Now what possible argument can be used for basing the borough franchise on a principle which will produce such startling differences in the franchise in different boroughs, on what possible principle can you defend giving 15,000 new electors to the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent; while you only give fourteen new voters to the borough of Brighton. The fatal defect in this new borough franchise is, that it will be entirely destitute of the element of uniformity, and while in some boroughs it will add large numbers to the existing constituencies, in other boroughs of equal size and importance, it will scarcely add any at all. I fully grant that it is of vast importance that this question should be settled; but the House must remember that it is not the mere passing of a Reform Bill which will settle this question, but the passing of such a fair, just, and equitable measure as will give satisfaction to the people of this country. In its present shape, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe this a most unsatisfactory measure; but as I presume that it is now decided that we are to go into Committee upon it without a division, I sincerely trust that Her Majesty's Ministers may consent to such alterations and improvements being made in Committee on their Bill, as may make it at last such a fair and just measure, as it may be worthy of the Imperial Parliament to offer to the people of this great country.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought it was a matter of simple decency to accept the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. They all came down to the House that afternoon in the expectation that there would be a long discussion before the Motion for going into Committee was decided; but the first question collapsed, and other questions were got rid of by a dexterous stratagem on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, and the consequence was that they were going to be at once launched into Committee on the Reform Bill. The House had been entrapped into its present position by a species of thimble-rig playing with the notice paper; and now, after the candid but extraordinary statement of the right hon. Baronet, it was surely right that it should have some opportunity of calm reflection. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill was not one of household suffrage, and that it was scarcely even one of substantial reform; but that it was merely a string of epithets and adjectives bearing somehow upon the Bill of 1832, and that even the vaunted personal rating suffrage was nothing more than one of the fancy franchises. After this, the latest and strangest exposition he had heard of this ambiguous Bill, he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would allow the debate to stand over till Thursday. The House ought not to be forced into an immediate discussion in Committee, and he appealed to the Treasury Bench to consent to the adjournment, a resistance to which would give rise to evil remarks, and so to allow hon. Members to go home and ponder over what had occurred.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I was very much struck with the speech made by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India, because it was couched in language so new and strange to me, that I could scarcely believe it proceeded from a Gentleman whose speech on the same subject I heard last year. The right hon. Baronet appeared to me to say—and if I misunderstood him I hope he will correct me—that if the Bill of the present Government contemplated lowering the franchise, he would have nothing to do with it. [“No!”] At all events, so I understood him. He went on to argue that we retain the rating franchise and in so doing we retain everything. We allow men desirous of possessing the franchise to put themselves on the register, but beyond that we retain matters as they are, and I understood the right hon. Baronet to say that if that were not the case, he would be no party to the measure. He treated the notion of this Bill tending in any way to household suffrage with the greatest contempt; and, as I understood him, he said the question was as remote from household suffrage as it was before. That the Government Bill did not only not amount to household suffrage, in which he is perfectly right—but that it did not approximate to it. Hear what he said last year, and wonder what men can say at one time and what they can say at another. I am quoting from Hansard, May 30, 1866, in which I find the following speech of the right hon. Baronet:—

“He did not intend to go the length of saying that it was desirable to extend the franchise down to household suffrage; but he would agree that if it were the intention of the House to extend the franchise by going below the £10 limit for boroughs—”

(Of which he has not said one word to-night)—

“There was no point whatever short of household suffrage at which they could consistently stop.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1534.]

The right hon. Baronet is now a party to a Bill which does away with the £10 limit, and which does away with any figure at all, and yet he argues that if you adopt it, you will not have made the slightest approximation to household suffrage. But there is more of this speech. He says—

“Sooner or later under such circumstances—”

That is, circumstances of taking a £9 franchise even—

“They must come down to household suffrage, and he was prepared to say that if that were the point to which they must go, he was just as willing it should take place at once as that it should take place at a later date."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1534.]

He therefore last year believed that any lowering of the franchise must inevitably lead to household suffrage, and that household suffrage is preferable to any intermediate change, such, for instance, as that contemplated by the Bill of the present Government. The right hon. Gentleman says that no language has been employed towards the Government of which they had a right to complain. I should like to know, if hon. Gentlemen make such speeches as that one year and then in another year make such a speech as the one we have heard to-night, what language can we use within the bounds of Parliamentary decorum of which they have any right to complain? I have not been willing to embarrass this discussion with retrospects; but if right hon. Gentlemen will come forward and challenge us in this manner, it is quite impossible to forbear. It is quite true that every Gentleman is the judge of his own honour; that he carries within him a secret tribunal by whose decision he must stand or fall; and the right hon. Gentleman may be acquitted by that tribunal. But it is also true that no upright Judge allows his decision to be affected by a bribe, and when right hon. Gentlemen change in this extraordinary manner, that change ought not to be accompanied by office and preferment. It is painful to say these things; but when right hon. Gentlemen, rising from grade to grade in the public service, appeal to their conscience, it is right they should be told that they do not appeal to an unbiased and unprejudiced judge. So much for the right hon. Gentleman. I have now a word or two to say—I did not mean to speak, but as it seems we have nothing very particular to do to-night, I may be allowed to offer a few remarks—about the Bill under our consideration. This Bill has a double aspect, and that is the dexterity and mischief of it. If looked at by the light of what it will immediately effect, it is not a large measure of enfranchisement, or one that even a timid man need fear. But if we look upon it in its potentiality, keeping in view that to which it may lead, it is a measure of the very largest nature. It is by presenting those two aspects that the effect is produced of causing one side to regard it as a sweeping and the other as a moderate scheme of Reform. If the Bill were to stand where it is, and bore in it the elements of permanence, then it would be a Bill which, I at once admit, a Conservative Government need not be ashamed of proposing. But how does the matter stand? We must not only consider what is actually done, but we must not lose sight of what must inevitably follow. You broadly lay down that every man who lives in a house for which the rates are paid by any one is entitled to a vote if he only chooses to take the trouble to get it. But you say that you require the conditions of personal rating, and that is the mode in which you force him to assert his right. You, in the first place, distinctly say that the franchise is to belong to such a man of right, but then you impose upon him a burden, and by the last clauses which have been drawn up by the Chancellor of the Exchequer he is to be subjected to a fine before he can get it. You throw artificial obstructions in his way, and how long, let me ask you, do you think those artificial obstructions will last? How long do you imagine that men will bear to be told that the franchise is their right if they wish to have it, and not at all a matter of selection or fitness, and that they are the judges whether they are to have it, and yet submit to the pecuniary fines which you set up as a barrier to its possession? Do you believe that the state of things which will be produced by the passing of a measure such as this is likely to be permanent? How long will it be before the class you are thus tampering with will convert that option which you give them into a right and compel you to place them upon the register? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to a deputation the other day, laid down as the principle of a Reform Bill that every man who earnestly and eagerly desired the franchise was entitled to its possession. He might just as well have said that the right of property was that any one who earnestly and eagerly desired to take my purse ought to have it. The true principle—if we have not lost sight of all principle—of the franchise is that a man ought not to have it unless he is fit to exercise it, and that fitness certainly does not consist in the eagerness with which he may desire it. There are many reasons why a man may desire to have a vote. He might wish for it, for instance, because he thought he might make a good thing of it, because he sees the money is going at elections. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might deem that a reason why he should give it to him, although everybody else would be inclined to hold the contrary opinion. That is the Conservative principle of this Bill. The only thing to ascertain is, not whether a man possesses property or intelligence, but simply whether he lives in a house and is earnestly desirous of obtaining the franchise. I know of no more unsound or more unsafe principle. It is easy to create a desire where it does not exist, and to take away the condition, so that the desire of a person for the franchise will become the desire of others who wish to corrupt him, and the door will be opened to every species of evil. The principles involved in this Bill, however, would seem to be to some hon. Gentlemen so plainly and manifestly sound that they do not look upon them as worthy of preliminary discussion. The second reading goes as a matter of course, and the Committee follows without even that consideration which awaits the most ordinary measures which are brought under our notice. I think we are under a great obligation to the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne) for the courage he has displayed this evening in resisting this mode of proceeding. He has, in my opinion, done a public service by the way in which he has drawn attention to the matter. The position in which we find ourselves is one which no man, whatever his political opinions, who loves his country or who reveres her Constitution can look upon without dread. We are about to go into Committee upon a Bill in reference to which the only point upon which we are agreed is that in its present shape it ought not to pass. We are going into Committee, too, under the Leadership of a Gentleman who does not command a majority of the House or the unanimous support of his own party. In short, entering without pilot, chart, or compass into this vast and stormy ocean of Reform. The grounds on which I objected, and successfully objected, to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that they took the question out of the hands of the Government and placed it in the hands of the House—apply now. As things are at present, the Government have not the direction of their own measure. The House is to be called upon to frame a Bill, and the House knows nothing except that the Leader, neither on one side or the other, seems to have any command over his own party. To this lottery, to this chance-medley, it is that we are about to trust the Constitution of this country. I am not to-night arguing in favour of principles which it is well-known I hold. I am treading on ground which I occupy in common with almost every Gentleman whom I see around me. If you proceed in this way, can you, I ask, hope for anything but disgrace and failure? Not necessarily failure in passing this Bill—but failure worse than any interregnum or difficulty which may ensue as a consequence of its not passing? I hope, then, that others will follow the example of the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne), and that we shall have a little discussion on this question. The public will then know that the Conservative party have—whatever the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) may say—advanced beyond those who sit on these Benches in bidding for the support of Democracy. Not so much by what they actually do as by that to which they open the door, and which must be the inevitable consequence of the course they are pursuing. It astonishes me to see a deputation of gentlemen coming up from the country to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Conservative measure he has introduced, when they must know that—but for the small matter of personal payment of rates—it means household suffrage pure and simple. What a frail bulwark to rely upon to protect the Constitution of this country against the inroads of democracy. If it could be made clear to the public how this question stands; if it could be shown to them that the Conservative leaders are drawing those who have not hitherto been desirous of change into the support of a measure which places the Liberal party in the dilemma of assenting to a course which they know to be wrong and pernicious, rather than allow themselves to be beaten in the race for popular favour; much good would be accomplished. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite are about to carry out a policy which has not the slightest connection with that which they last year avowed and acknowledged. I should be sorry to be concerned in anything of the kind. It was not because the £7 rental franchise of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) did not, in our opinion, go low enough, that I and others on this side of the House lent our aid to displace the Government. It was because we looked upon it as a dangerous and hazardous experiment. That was the language which was held in private by those very Gentlemen who now seem to think that the late Government did not go far enough, who do away with the figure altogether, and repose on the principle of a rating franchise. Never was there tergiversation so complete as that which is now displayed by those who last year acted as I have said, and who yet have to-night the assurance to come forward and hold such language as that to which we have listened. Such conduct may fail or not; it may lead to the retention or the loss of office; but it merits alike the contempt of all honest men and the execration of posterity.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, that notwithstanding his admiration for the ability of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), he could not help saying that his object appeared to be to obstruct and impede all attempts at Reform. In every speech made by the right hon. Gentleman there was to be detected a considerable amount of false logic. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean by those speeches? Last year, when the late Government attempted to bring in a Reform Bill, the right hon. Gentleman did all he could to oppose and defeat it. In the present year, when the succeeding Government endeavoured to pass a measure of Reform, the right hon. Gentleman again met it with cavilling objections. The right hon. Gentleman charged the Members of the present Government with enunciating a principle which they last year repudiated. He (Mr. Montagu Chambers) did not care whether that were so or not. The community did not care. They wanted a Reform Bill, and it was of no importance to them whether it came from the present or any other Government. His notion was that they might get it now. If the House should go into Committee upon this Bill he was determined to act upon this principle—to accept of everything that was favourable to a settlement of this question of Reform; but he was not so sanguine as to imagine that this measure would be a final settlement. Therefore, his notion was that they should get as much as they could, and if it did not satisfy the community, they could go farther until they were satisfied. That, no doubt, was an unpopular statement for some hon. Members, but the impression out of doors was that complete Reform could only be accomplished by degrees. Lawyers and politicians appeared to labour under a mistake with regard to what was the meaning of household suffrage. He found from his- torical and legal research that household suffrage had always been accompanied with the payment of local rates. The voter by the old "scot and lot"—which was equivalent to household suffrage—had to pay parish or church rates. Their ancestors knew very little of household suffrage pure and simple. Therefore, when household suffrage was proposed as one of the leading principles of a new Reform Bill, every one acquainted with the subject said it must be accompanied with the payment of rates of one kind or another. Again, pot-wallopers—every man who boiled his own pot, or was able to find food and firing—in ancient times were no more nor less than lodgers, and they had votes. These were old principles, and they were going back to them. He himself was in favour of a rental franchise, and whether by this Bill or not, the time would come when they must adopt it. The arguments on both sides tended to that, and they already showed the difficulties and inconsistencies that must arise in endeavouring to establish a fair franchise by rating and payment of rates. His test of fitness would be a year's residence and a year's payment of rent. The compound-householder pays the rates of his house in the shape of rent, and it mattered not whether they were paid by him or his landlord. His landlord was his rate collector. The tenant who resided in a house and paid his rates through his landlord was a far more respectable and better man than the man who would have his rates paid for him by an election agent. That was the evil of this Bill. It was the interest of all true Reformers to assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer in carrying a real Reform Bill; but the proposed manner of putting a man on the register was a complicated piece of business, and could not be approved of. They should test a man by rental and occupation. Before many years they would have to adopt residential household suffrage, the payment of rent being the test of a man's respectability, and if the Government would adopt rental in Committee instead of rating, a large number of true Reformers would support them. He cared not which side produced a Reform Bill. If it was a good Bill he and many others on the opposition side would support it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) was sometimes a good logician and at other times a bad one; but, unfortunately, his logic dazzled a great many who did not understand it, and there was hardly one Member in that House who really knew what the right hon. Gentleman meant by the speech he had just delivered. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman last year which had been so much admired was a beautiful sort of University exercise; but there was not a Member in the House who could say what it meant. The Conservative party cheered the right hon. Gentleman last Session, believing that he was assisting them; but he had now turned round, and had said all he could against them. He (Mr. Montagu Chambers) should support the Motion for going into Committee. He was well satisfied at the result of the consultation that occurred before they met that evening. At the end of the proposed Instruction there was something very equivocal to true Reformers. They thought it restrictive. They had carried a point very useful as an Instruction, and he hoped when they went into Committee on it they would carry a Reform Bill that would be suitable to the wants of the country.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Gorst,) put, and negatived.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he understood it was not intended by the Government to proceed with the Bill in Committee to-night?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that was the understanding. He moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again on Thursday next.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Sir Graham Montgomery, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Hunt.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ELCHO said, he would suggest that, in deference to the wishes and convenience of the Scotch Members who had not expected the measure would come on that evening, the second reading should be deferred till after the Easter holidays. He also desired to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he proposed on Thursday to put the Committee of the Reform Bill or the Bill for the Suppression of Corruption and Bribery at Elections first on the Notice Paper? ["Order!"]

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he would consent to postpone the second reading of the Bill till after the Easter recess.

Second reading deferred till Thursday 2nd May.

IRELAND—LIMERICK HARBOUR. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask for some explanation of the intentions of the Government. Money had been lent upon insufficient security. Owing to the system of keeping accounts in the Government Departments, Irishmen were represented as debtors to the extent of £2,000,000, though they had honestly met such liabilities as were fairly chargeable to them.

MR. HUNT said, the object of the measure he sought leave to introduce was to compound a debt now due from the Limerick Harbour Trustees to the Treasury. The Government were in the position of mortgagees in possession for a debt of £173,000 and interest £56,000, amounting together to £230,000, a burden which completely weighed down the resources of the port, and rendered them incapable of development. The late Government had proposed conditions which the Harbour Commissioners found it impossible to comply with. In the Bill which he would ask leave to introduce provision would be made to compound a debt for an annuity extending over a long period.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to compound the Public Debt and Interest due by the Limerick Harbour Commissioners, and to make arrangements for the payment of the amount for which such Debt is to be compounded, and for the transfer of Wellesley Bridge, in the City of Limerick, to the Commissioners of Public Works.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which he intends to take first on Thursday, the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill, or the Bill of which he has given notice for dealing with bribery and corruption at elections. I am induced to put this Question because I believe many hon. Gentlemen feel that unless there is ground for supposing some progress will be made with the Representation Bill on Thursday it would be hardly worth while to take the Committee on it the day before the adjournment for the holydays. I hope it will not be imagined that, individually, I wish to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of proceeding in Committee with the Representation Bill. So far from that, if I had been called upon to record my vote to-night, I should have given it for going into Committee, because I think it is extremely desirable that this Reform Question should be settled in the present Session. The arrangements of hon. Members during the holydays depend upon the time of the adjournment of the House. We should be all willing to give up our holydays, if it were necessary to do so, in order to settle the question; still, unless it is supposed that we could make bond fide progress on Thursday, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether it might not be better to defer proceeding in Committee till after Easter. There is one other argument which I might use. A noble Friend of mine (Earl Grosvenor), for a reason in which every one sympathizes, is prevented from being present, and leave of absence for a week has been granted to him. I believe I am not wrong in saying that one of the most important, if not the most important Amendment to be proposed in Committee is that of my noble Friend, which stands early in the Paper. It would therefore, I think, meet his convenience, as well as that of the House generally, if the Committee were postponed till after the holydays.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is the duty of those who regulate the business of the House to defer, as far as possible, to the general feeling of the House. I have no other wish in regulating our business than to take that course which, on the whole, I think will be most conducive to the public interest, and also most convenient to hon.

Gentlemen. With respect to the questions alluded to, both are in a peculiar position. As regards the measure against bribery and corruption my personal engagement, I may say my personal honour, is pledged to its being brought forward before the holydays. It is a real, bond fide measure, prepared with great care, and I hope the House will receive it with favour, though the subject with which it deals requires considerable consideration. I might ask leave to introduce that Bill to-morrow; but, if I do so, of course I could not make a statement on it till the second reading. If I introduce it to-morrow and fix the second reading for Thursday, we could put down the Committee for the Representation of the People Bill for the same day, and the House could decide how they would proceed. As to whether the question of bribery and corruption at elections is one which requires and deserves their attention on Thursday it will be for them to decide. We must go into Committee on the Reform Bill on the second Government day the House meets after Easter. It would be inconvenient for us to go into a subject of very commanding interest on the first day. Moreover, I have promised that day to the Irish Members for the discussion of their Bill, and of course I must keep that promise. At present, I would suggest to the House that the best mode of procedure would be to place the second reading of the Bribery and Corruption Bill first on the Paper on Thursday, and if it meets with no opposition, the House may then go into Committee on the Representation of the People Bill. If, however, they should think it inconvenient to enter into the discussion of the latter Bill—and we should remember that the first clause is the most important—it will be in their power to express that opinion, and we should then fix it for consideration in Committee on the 2nd of May. The House will consider these matters; but at present I feel bound to move on Thursday the second reading of the Bribery and Corruption Bill, and I shall put that Bill upon the paper in accordance with the pledge which I have given to the House.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not wish to interfere with the Order of Business proposed by the Government; but I certainly understood that the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill would be the first Order for Thursday. At present, however, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to put the second reading of the Bribery and Corruption Bill, which has not yet been brought in and read a first time, for the first Order on that day. I think that the Bribery and Corruption Bill can hardly pass without some discussion, and that the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman amounts practically to postponing the Representation of the People Bill until after Easter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will leave the matter to the House.

MR. AYRTON said, that to place the Bribery Bill first on the Paper would be to compel the House to pass the second reading of a measure of great importance without discussion, in order that they might proceed with the Reform Bill. That was a course which the House could never sanction; and therefore, practically, the right hon. Gentleman did not leave the matter in the hands of the House, but prevented them from proceeding with the Representation of the People Bill, for the Bribery Bill would occupy the whole of the evening. There was no Bill more likely to occupy time, because it was one of those subjects about which so many Members knew more than they did about most other subjects, and they generally found that the discussion became much more comprehensive as there was a large amount of personal knowledge and experience on the part of hon. Members. If the right hon. Gentleman really meant to give the House the option of deciding as to the course they would take, he would put the Reform Bill first, and then when they got into Committee they could decide whether to proceed or to report Progress at once in order to take the second reading of the Bribery Bill.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, there was a great deal of inconvenience in leaving a matter of so much importance in vagueness and uncertainty. He spoke feelingly on the subject, as he had a Motion on the paper which would be the first Amendment on the Reform Bill when they got into Committee, and he was naturally anxious therefore to know whether the Bill would come on on Thursday. He was perfectly ready to bring forward his Motion on that day, or later if the House thought fit; but it was extremely important that he should know on what day he would be called upon to bring it forward.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I agree with what has fallen from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), and I will accordingly make the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill the first Order for Thursday, and then it will be for the House to decide on the course to be pursued. My only object is to consult the convenience of the House. I have been almost taunted by an hon. Baronet, a Member of this House, for having appeared to recede from an obligation which I accepted in its entirety and reality, and which I have laboured to fulfil. The measure I shall bring forward will at least prove the sincerity of my promise. I did not therefore feel myself perfectly free on the subject; but after what has occurred, I will put the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill first on the paper for Thursday, and the Bribery and Corruption Bill second. The House will then be in a position to determine which of them shall be first discussed.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

Bill to grant and alter certain Duties of Customs and Inland Revenue, and for other purposes relating thereto, presented, and read the first time. [Bill 113.]

NATIONAL DEBT ACTS BILL.

Resolution reported;

"That it is expedient to authorise the cancelling of the Charge on the Consolidated Fund for Savings Banks of Twenty-Four Millions, and the creation of equivalent Terminable Annuities for Savings Banks in lieu thereof, and to provide for the payment of such Terminable Annuities out of the Consolidated Fund."

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 114.]

House adjourned at Ten o'clock.

THE LONDON UNIVERSITY — BURLINGTON HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he wished to call the attention of the noble Duke opposite to the subject of the new building which it was proposed to erect for the London University. He understood that some explanation had been given in the other House by the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works on the subject; and he was gratified to learn that the noble Lord had stayed for a time the further progress of the building. The authorities of London University received an intimation from the present First Commissioner of Works that the Board of Works were alone responsible, and could not allow of any interference with regard to the elevation on the part of the London University. The representatives of the University had conveyed to Lord John Manners that they entertained the opinion, which he believed was held by the great majority of the people out of doors, that both the building for the London University and the other buildings on the same site should be in the same style and in keeping with each other. They had suggested that it was very possible that a building of a simple but substantial character, and in due harmony with the other buildings on the Burlington House site, might be erected at less expense than the proposed elevation, which was of a highly ornamental character, and could not be carried out satisfactorily except at great cost. He desired to state that the representatives of the University had received the utmost courtesy from the noble Lord throughout their communications with him; but they decidedly disapproved the design proposed for the elevation.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he could only confirm what had been already stated "in another place" by his noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works—namely, that the works at the Burlington House site would be suspended for a few weeks, so as to leave open the question of any modification or alteration of the plan and elevation which had been proposed for the buildings for the London University.

TENURE (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 23.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that as he had last Session submitted a similar Bill for their Lordships' consideration, he need not enter into any detailed description of its provisions. There was nothing compulsory in the measure. On the contrary, its main object and principle were, that all transactions in regard to land between landlord and tenant should rest upon voluntary contract. It was a mistake to suppose, as some persons appeared to do, that the small class of tenants in Ireland were not as much alive to the best mode of making a good bargain for themselves and as capable of understanding the engagements they entered into as any other persons whatever. When Parliament was legislating on the question, it ought to legislate in a comprehensive manner, and with a due regard to other classes of occupiers of land besides the peasant occupiers. In Ireland there were tenants paying rents not only as high as £500, but £5,000—and he believed even £10,000 a year. He trusted that the Government would allow the Bill to be read a second time; and he should be glad to see it referred to a Select Committee to which, if the Government desired it, the Bills on this subject, now in the House of Commons, might be remitted when they came up to their Lordships' House, so that they might be examined together, and, if possible, a satisfactory measure should be passed this Session.

—(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

LORD MONCK said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill, the main object of which commended itself to all, since it proposed to consolidate and simplify the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland; to provide for the formation of cheap and accessible tribunals for settling disputes, and to facilitate the granting of leases. So far the object of the Bill was admirable. Looking, however, to the intricacy of the subject, and the numerous difficult and professional questions which it involved, he was rather startled to find such a subject taken up by a private Member of Parliament; and he was therefore much relieved to find that the Bill was to be referred to the same Select Committee as the Government Bills, where it would undergo professional scrutiny by the responsible Advisers of the Crown. The Bill also professed to deal with the compensation to tenants for improvements, and also with the manner in which land for the future should be held in Ireland. These were subjects which had for many years excited the attention of the farming class in Ireland, and had created a great deal of excitement among other classes. Like all other subjects which became matters of public interest, this was liable to be, and had been from time to time, prostituted for party or personal objects. Making every allowance, however, for those feelings, he believed there existed among Irish tenant farmers a strong and well-founded sense of grievance in reference to their position. He believed that the people entertained a great desire for legislation on this subject; and he believed he should be able to show their Lordships that the demands of the people were not unreasonable, and might be satisfied without an invasion of the rights of property. Various measures had been introduced into Parliament; but, though some of them had become law, they had failed to set the agitation at rest; and, with one exception, none of those measures having the slightest chance of success had received the approbation of those who represented the tenant farmers. The reason for the failure which had attended every attempt at legislation he believed to be this—that they had dealt merely with the symptoms which appeared on the surface of the body politic, and had not probed the causes of those symptoms. They had not ascertained the real grievances of the tenant farmers, and therefore the remedies they had attempted to supply had been insufficient. Attention had been directed to the question of compensation to tenants for improvements, when the real secret of the discontent which prevailed was the unsatisfactory condition under which land was generally held by Irish farmers. Those who were old enough—as he unfortunately was—to recollect when the question first gained prominence among Irish political topics would remember that it bore the character of a claim for fixity of tenure. That idea had never been abandoned by the Irish farmers; and he (Lord Monck) believed that demand was not unreasonable, and might be carried out without any invasion of the rights of property. The Bill introduced last year by his right hon. Friend Mr. Chichester Fortescue, and which he had reason to know would have been accepted by those who represented the tenant farmers of Ireland as a fair settlement, proposed, no doubt, to give very stringent rights to tenants with respect to compensation for improvements; but only as an alternative to a lease, or a lease for less than thirty-one years, and every landlord who might grant a lease for that period freed himself from all claims for compensation. The effect of that measure would have been to compel landlords in their own defence to give leases; and it only provided such a certainty of tenure as would be required by any farmer in Scotland as a security for the investment of his capital and labour. In his opinion, the Bill of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) involved precisely the same principle. The third section of it enacted that all contracts respecting land should be in writing; and this obviously implied a lease, for no landlord would be at the trouble of a written agreement with each one of his tenants every year. The Bill also proposed that landlords who gave no leases should not have the benefit of that cheap court for the settlement of disputes which it provided in other cases—thus driving them to an action in the Superior Courts. It required them, too, to give a twelvemonth's notice to quit before bringing an action of ejectment; and it empowered the Judge who might try any of these actions to award costs against the party who should appear to have been in fault with regard to the absence of a lease. Of course, the fault would always rest with the landlord. He had not cited these clauses as an objection to the Bill, but simply to show that it was not of so voluntary a character as it had been described by his noble Friend, and that its tendency would be to oblige landlords to give leases. A measure had been introduced into the other House by his hon. and learned Friend Sir Colman O'Loughlen, enacting that in cases where there was no evidence of a lease the courts should presume, not a yearly tenancy, but a lease for a fixed number of years. When therefore he found the principle of compelling landlords to give leases pervading all three of the Bills to which he had referred, and which had emanated from different quarters, he could not help thinking that the satisfactory settlement of this vexed question was not far distant. That principle, moreover, was no new one; for the Statute of Frauds, as far back as the time of Charles II., enacted that all agreements affecting land for a certain term of years should be in writing; and he believed that its operation would be attended with salutary results. No good cultivation could go on where the tenure was involved in uncertainty. It was needless for him to prove that a lease would be beneficial to the occupier; and he could speak from his own experience of the benefit which would follow to the landlord. He had always entertained a strong feeling with reference to this question; and he was sure that unless something was done to satisfy the craving for legislation on the subject peace and satisfaction would never exist in Ireland; but he believed this desirable result might be obtained without any undue interference with the rights of property. The few observations which he had made were dictated by the most friendly spirit to the Bill of the noble Marquess. He was glad to hear that it was to be referred to a Select Committee; and if the noble Marquess could make the gentle pressure on the landlords a little more vigorous, he should be glad to give the Bill his support.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, their Lordships would agree with him that great credit was due to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) for the pains he had evidently taken in dealing with this intricate question, and producing, he would not say a Bill, but a regular code on the subject of Irish land tenure. Their Lordships were aware that Her Majesty's Government had brought a Bill into the other House; but, as it had not yet reached their Lordships, it would be irregular on his part to enter into its details. He thought the safest and best course for their Lordships to adopt was to allow this Bill to pass a second reading. To that the Government had no objection, guarding themselves, however, that it should be without prejudice to their own Bill. When the measure of the Government came up to their Lordships' House it would then be time to consider whether it would not be desirable to read it the second time, and then refer both Bills to the same Select Committee. All that he wished to say further was, that the Government felt the great importance of this subject. It was one which had occupied the attention of Parliament Session after Session, and much disappointment had been felt that the question had not been settled. Considering the number of Bills on the subject now under discussion, he trusted that they would be able at length to frame a satisfactory measure.

After a few words, in reply, from The Marquess of CLANRICARDE,

Lord Monck

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday, the 16th of May, next.

VICE ADMIRALTY COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 71.)

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to improve the jurisdiction of the Vice Admiralty Courts. In the year 1863 an Act was passed which defined the jurisdiction of those Courts in the colonies, and had been found to give the greatest possible satisfaction. Suggestions for its improvement, however, had been made from various colonies, and this Bill proposed to adopt those suggestions. By the Bill of 1863 the Chief Justice of a colony was ex officio Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court. That was an excellent provision; but in colonies like New Zealand, where there was an extensive seaboard, and a great number of maritime towns at a considerable distance from each other, it frequently happened that the Chief Justice, who was the only Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court, was engaged on circuit or in one of the maritime towns when there might be a cause awaiting him in another. Now, this Bill would enable the Chief Justice to appoint a deputy, with the approval of the Governor of the colony. Another provision of the Bill was to remove doubts as to the persons who might practise in those Courts. There was also a provision of some importance which removed certain difficulties that had arisen in respect of certain of these Courts, Courts which had been established by letters patent in colonies possessing an independent Legislature.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH—RITUALISTIC PRACTICES.—PETITIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH presented five Petitions of Women of the United Kingdom against any Innovation in the customary Ceremonial of the Church of England. The noble Marquess said, that one of these petitions had 17,188 signatures. One of these petitions stated that in the event of a Royal Commission being appointed to inquire into Ritualistic Innovations in the Church of England, there could be no confidence in the proceedings of such a Commission if right rev. Prelates were appointed thereto who were themselves compromised by the introduction of usages and practices which were rejected at the Reformation. The petitioners mentioned the cases of the Lord Bishop of the diocese of Oxford, who had conducted a novel, unauthorized, and superstitious service for the "Dedication of a Bell" in Bampton Church; the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, who used a similar unauthorized and superstitious ceremonial for a bell in Sherborne Church; the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who inaugurated by a special service a new order of Church ministers other than those authorized in the Prayer Book; and the Lord Bishop of Chichester, who, in addition to novel proceedings in a private chapel, attended a special service in Chichester Cathedral in connection with "the presentation of a pastoral staff," having profane Popish emblems engraved thereon, and also held a highly-objectionable service for the consecration of a Lady Warden of a Tractarian sisterhood; and prayed the House to adopt an Address to Her Majesty on the subject. Having read the petition at length, the noble Marquess was understood to urge in support of it that whilst he admitted that it was entirely in the province of the Crown, on issuing a Royal Commission, not only to nominate who should compose it, but also to lay down the Instructions under which it was to act, he was, nevertheless, justified in presenting this petition, and in briefly supporting the prayer of it. At the same time, he disclaimed any intention to speak offensively of Bishops in proceeding to substantiate the allegation which rendered it inexpedient that they should be members of such a Commission as that referred to. He denied that there was the slightest authority for the Bishop of Chichester carrying a pastoral staff in procession, or to justify the dedication of a bell by a religious ceremony, which was the more objectionable in the English Church because it was common in the Church of Rome.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he did not rise for the purpose of addressing their Lordships on the general Question on which the noble Marquess had spoken at such length, but simply with the view of saying a few words on behalf of his right rev. Friend the Bishop of Oxford, who was unable to be present, and who was anxious that the charge which had been brought against him by the noble Marquess should not be left in the position in which he had placed it, but that the House should be put in possession of the real facts of the case. He (the Duke of Marlborough) felt himself to a certain extent justified in making a statement on what was a personal matter, inasmuch as, although he could not say that he was actually of his own knowledge acquainted with the facts as they occurred, yet he was thoroughly well acquainted with the clergyman of the Church in which the circumstances relating to the dedication of the bell in question took place; and that gentleman was, he could assure their Lordships, one of the most estimable, worthy, and moderate men in the diocese of Oxford, and a man, too, who was as little likely to promote or encourage anything of what was popularly termed a Tractarian character as any Churchman whom he knew. The Bishop of Oxford complained, and he thought not without reason, that the noble Marquess should bring so serious a charge against him as that of having violated the Act of Uniformity without having given him any notice whatever that it was his intention to do so, and should have thought fit to bring it forward, too, at a time when the right rev. Prelate, in common with many of his right rev. Brethren, was necessarily absent in the performance of his duties during the period of Lent. But, without entering further into that point, he would leave their Lordships to form their own opinions as to the propriety of the way in which the subject had been introduced to their notice, and would content himself with reading what he believed to be an authentic account of what was called the dedication of the bell at Bampton Church. That account was as follows:—

"A new bell, by great exertions of the parishioners, was provided for Bampton; and the vicar wrote to the Bishop stating the great wish of the parish that some religious service should accompany its erection. The Bishop consented to attend; they had in the Church the regular service of the day, and the Bishop preached a sermon, explaining the impiety and superstition of the Church of Rome in baptizing bells, and the piety of asking God's blessing, as they were going to do, on this addition to His house of prayer. After the regular service in the Church, the congregation adjourned into the churchyard, and while the bell was raised, sang a hymn and said some prayers like those commonly used at laying a foundation stone—praying that the bell might call men to God's house, might remind them to

That statement came from a private source; but their Lordships might, he thought, form some idea of the fairness with which the subject had been treated by the noble Marquess when he read an extract from a report of the proceedings on the occasion which had been published in a local paper, which report the noble Marquess had in his hand while he spoke, but from which he omitted to quote the passage to which he alluded. That passage was as follows:—

"The Bishop's sermon, taken from the Prophet Jeremiah, was one of the most striking and deeply spiritual discourses we have ever heard his Lordship deliver. In one part of it he gave an account of the first introduction of bells into the early churches, and described the gradual growth of those gross and baneful superstitions which formerly attended their erection, forcibly dwelling on the contrast between them and the offering up of our prayers that God would accept the work of our hands for His glory and for the benefit of His people."

He would only, in conclusion, bear his testimony to what the right rev. Prelate had accomplished, to his own knowledge, in the diocese of Oxford. He would state, from his own knowledge of the diocese of Oxford, that he knew nobody who was so happy in uniting moderate men of all shades of opinion and impressing them with the religious character and fervour of his work than his right rev. Friend who presided over that diocese.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he had not given the right rev. Prelate notice simply because he thought there was no time to be lost in drawing attention to the subject before the appointment of the Royal Commission, of which the Bishop of Oxford, who seemed desirous of having a hand in everything, might wish to be a member—a position for holding which he (the Marquess of Westmeath) held he was incapacitated by what had taken place. He had no passage of anything relating to this subject in his hand which he had purposely omitted, and he did not understand the charge the noble Duke had made against him; but if there had been anything omitted which was pertinent to the case, it must have been that he was averse to overlay the subject with too many quotations.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD REDESDALE said, he rose to

call attention to the state and character of the new Buildings which were being erected for the Government Offices near Downing Street, and to move for a Return in connection therewith. Their Lordships must have been struck with the great size of the buildings which had been already erected, and the incomplete state in which they were left, and also with the fact that no further progress was apparently being made to cover the site still vacant with the buildings necessary for the other offices. They understood that the new Foreign and India Offices were to be the first erected; and he wished to know whether it was intended that those large buildings were to be occupied solely by those two Offices, or whether any other of the public Departments would be accommodated in them. They all knew that it was much more expensive to live in a large house than in a small one; and it was a question of great importance to consider what additional expenditure would attend the transfer of the staff and business of those Offices from the old quarters to the new. He should therefore like to know whether any estimate had been made of the difference of charge for the respective Offices in occupying the new buildings as compared with the charge for occupying the old ones. He was afraid that the great extra expense would not be fully compensated by great additional advantage to the public. The new buildings were also of great height, and he did not know how they were to be usefully occupied. He supposed that all the documents and papers would be sent to the higher stories, which would be extremely inconvenient; and that possibly some few of the attendants would live there. He wished likewise to ask whether it was intended to pull down the present Colonial Office before the new building was prepared for the reception of that Department. That, he conceived, would cause a most wanton expenditure. He understood that when the Foreign Office was removed, the Colonial Office would be moved into its place; but all these temporary changes from one building to another involved a large expense. He wished to know how much of the property in Parliament Street and King Street had been purchased for the extension of the new State Offices, whether any plan was in existence for the completion of those buildings, whether its execution was in the hands of the same architect as the rest, how it was to be carried out, and what offices were to be accommodated in the buildings there erected? He should also like to have an answer to a Question which he had asked when those buildings were first projected—namely, how the buildings in Downing Street were to be joined to the new buildings? He thought it would be extremely difficult to make a good junction between them, and that the result when the work was completed would be eminently unsatisfactory. What, again, was proposed to be done on the south side of Charles Street, and with that portion of the ground which was lying waste? If it was intended for public offices, he supposed it would be requisite to purchase ground for the frontage towards Parliament Street, and also for the frontage towards the Park. He thought there ought to be a far more matured scheme for the accommodation of all these different public Departments; and, as far as possible, none of the Departments should be removed until the new buildings intended for their use were ready for their reception. In that part of the town they had a large space now left in a disgraceful state as far as appearances went, and also in a most useless state as respected the public advantage. The subject was one which ought to be attended to, and that as speedily as possible.

Moved, That there be laid before the House, Return of Property purchased in Parliament and King Streets for the Extension of the new State Offices.—(The Lord Redesdale.)

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, the answer to that part of the noble Lord's Question with regard to the ground bought as sites for the Public Offices which was now lying idle was, that the House of Commons had not yet voted the money required for the buildings which were to occupy that ground, and therefore it was impossible to proceed with their erection. As to how much of the site fronting Parliament Street had been purchased, he might state that a considerable portion of the freeholds and leaseholds had been bought. There were four properties remaining, of which neither the freeholds nor the leases had been purchased. The present new buildings were to be entirely appropriated to the India Office and the Foreign Office. The new India Office had been built with funds supplied from the Indian revenue, and the amount paid to the Commissioners of Works for the portion of the land required for it was £86,000. Her Majesty's Government had no jurisdiction in respect to the interior arrangements of the India Office. The estimated cost of the portion of the building which was to be occupied by the Foreign Office was £250,000, and the cost of the site £89,000. The new Foreign Office would contain accommodation for the clerks employed in the Department, and for the papers belonging to the Office, which were formerly kept in the State Paper Office; and the necessary arrangements for printing and other matters connected with the Department were likely to occupy the greater part, or nearly all, of the available room. The rooms in the new building were not so numerous as those in the old one, though they were larger. Large rooms were required, and the upper portion of the building was to be devoted to the storing of papers. A new Colonial Office was to be built, and the subject of the accommodation was under the consideration of a Commission appointed by the Treasury to consider generally the question of the Public Offices. No one would deny the great importance of having the Public Offices together. To have one portion of the staff in one street, and another portion in another street, was most inconvenient; but until the House of Commons devoted sufficient funds to supply the requisite accommodation, the inconvenience and the expense must be borne. He had before him a letter from Mr. Gilbert Scott, stating that he did not think there was any reason to complain of the want of speed at which the works were proceeding. On the contrary, he stated that he had had to restrain the builders from proceeding too rapidly with some portions of the fine work. With regard to the ground fronting Charles Street, beyond the India Office, no plan had been agreed to with regard to its occupation.

LORD REDESDALE said, he should like to know whether the House of Commons had been asked to vote the money necessary to carry on the required buildings. He believed that if an application were made for a moderate sum of money it would be cheerfully met. The question he had asked why the houses fronting Charles Street had been pulled down if no plan was ready had not been answered. The ground, which was once profitably occupied, had been cleared, and was now unprofitable, and could not be made the site of new official buildings without further purchases being made at both ends, to the Park and to Parliament Street.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

THE NEW FOREST—LICENSES TO SHOOT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL HAMLYN FANE said, he wished to ask, Whether it is proposed to maintain the license to shoot in the New Forest at its present rate of £20; and, further, whether the Government are aware that the said rate has caused great dissatisfaction to those residing in and around the Forest, and who greatly assist in the preservation of game for the Crown? He also wished to know what number of licenses have been granted under the Act of last Session?

MR. HUNT said, he had to state, in reply, that it was intended to continue the present rate at which these licenses were granted. He was aware that dissatisfaction on the ground of that rate prevailed among those residing in and around the Forest, and perhaps it was not unnatural for those who had formerly enjoyed the privilege gratuitously to complain, even though it now cost them merely a nominal consideration. At the same time, it must be remembered that this regulation was made when the Act relating to the Crown Lands was under the consideration of the House, and therefore all parties interested were fully aware of the change contemplated. With reference to assistance in the preservation of game for the Crown, he believed there was some reciprocity in the matter. He was not aware till a few minutes ago that the hon. and gallant Gentleman intended to ask any Question as to the number of licenses granted, and he therefore could not at present state the number.

ELECTION PETITIONS COMMITTEES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the present tribunal for the trial of Election Petitions is a satisfactory tribunal; and, whether he will consider the advisability of endeavouring to frame Clauses in the Bribery and Corruption Bill which shall define the limits beyond which clerical interference becomes "undue influence," and which shall state the precise amount of violence required to constitute a "general riot" at an Irish Election?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I hope to obtain leave to bring in a Bill on the subject of bribery, corruption, and undue influence to-night; perhaps I may induce the House to read it a second time on Thursday; and then on going into Committee my hon. and gallant Friend will have the opportunity of suggesting any clause he may deem advisable, if he thinks the provisions proposed by Her Majesty's Government are not adequately efficacious.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was unfortunately not present the previous evening, when the business for Thursday was arranged. He therefore wished to ask, whether the first Order would be the Representation of the People Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes; there will be no disturbance of the arrangements made.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

QUESTION.

MR. TREEBY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the Return ordered on the 16th May 1866, relative to the Metropolitan Board of Works, has not been made; and, if he is able to inform the House when that Return will be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. HUNT replied, that he was not able to give any precise information to his hon. Friend as to the cause of the delay, the Metropolitan Board of Works not being under the Treasury. He had, however, made inquiry, and found that the preparation of the Returns had occupied a very considerable time, for which he was not responsible. The Return, however, had been laid on the table that day.

UNJUST WEIGHTS AND MEASURES CONVICTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in his opinion, it is lawful for Magistrates in Petty Sessions to sit with closed doors, and, during the exclusion of the public, to convict persons charged with the offence of using unjust Weights and Measures; and, whether he is aware of the fact that certain of the Metropolitan Magistrates have in such manner convicted persons so accused?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, it certainly was not lawful for magistrates in petty sessions to sit with closed doors. It was an open court. With respect to the other question, whether he was aware of the fact that certain of the metropolitan magistrates had in such manner convicted persons so accused, he had made inquiries, and thought his hon. and learned Friend must have made some mistake; for out of the thirteen metropolitan courts, only two—Marylebone and Wandsworth—had any questions of weights and measures brought before them. In all these cases business had been conducted with open doors.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he had been in error. He should have stated the Surrey magistrates instead of the metropolitan magistrates.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would make inquiry into any particular cases which might be brought under his notice.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had promised to introduce a measure on this subject, and he should like to know when that promise would be fulfilled?

MR. WALPOLE said, he hoped to be able to introduce his promised Bill on the subject of Weights and Measures soon after Easter.

CATTLE PLAGUE—EXHIBITIONS OF LIVE STOCK.—QUESTION.

MR. ACLAND said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether the Privy Council have come to a decision, and if so what decision, on the application of several Agricultural Societies for permission to hold exhibitions of live stock during the summer of the present year; and, whether such decision, if any, imposes any restrictions on the exhibitions of animals other than horned cattle?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, the Privy Council had had this subject under their consideration for a considerable time; and being aware that there were five places in England affected by the cattle plague, it was thought not advisable to alter the Order in Council of the 24th of March 1866, so as to allow of exhibitions of lean (not fat stock), during the present summer. That Order in Council, he begged to add, applied only to cattle, not to sheep nor to other animals.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. GREGORY,
THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be agreeable to Irish Members to fix the Landlord and Tenant Bill as the first Order on Monday, the 29th instant. In the present state of public business he should not be able to name another day.

CANADIAN LOAN GUARANTEE. QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. WHATMAN,
MR. ADDERLEY said, that the security for the proper expenditure of the Canada loan was twofold. One clause prevented the Treasury from giving a guarantee until they were satisfied that local Acts provided for the raising, expending, and appropriating the loan. Another clause provided that, in the event of any waste or excess in the expenditure of the loan, such waste or excess must be met by the Canadian revenue before any part thereof was applied to any other purpose.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—CLAUSE 3.—NOTICE.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I placed on the Paper, without loss of time, certain Amendments which I proposed to move on the 3rd clause of the Parliamentary Representation Bill. But there is another Amendment which, though not on the clause, is so germane to it that I am desirous of giving notice of it for the convenience of the House. In the event of the adoption of the Amendment fixing the limit of the rateable valuable in Parliamentary boroughs, I shall propose a clause to provide that whenever the rateable value of any tenement falls below £5 by reason of the deduction of more than 20 per cent from the gross estimated rental the occupier thereof may claim to vote, and may thereupon, if otherwise qualified, be registered. The object of the clause is to provide for certain cases of great inequality of rating. I have stated merely the substance of the clause.

LONDON, CHATHAM, AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the means adopted by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company for raising the share capital and exercising their borrowing powers under the various Acts of Parliament authorizing the construction of the main line and its extensions and branches. He should be wanting in candour to the House did he not at once state that he felt that he had grievous reason to complain of what he conceived to be the unfair and improper manner in which his name had been so prominently put before the public in connection with this company. It was not, however, upon his own account, but upon public grounds, that he asked the House to appoint this Committee, as he believed that a careful review of all that had transpired in connection with this company by a Select Committee of that House would teach the public some valuable lessons with respect to the legislation in the future for railway companies. In drawing the attention of the House to a few of the main circumstances connected with this company, he might state, in the first place, that the line with its various branches was 136 miles in length, while no less than twenty-six Acts of Parliament, or something like an Act of Parliament for each five miles of the line, had been passed by that House in connection with this company. When the House took into consideration that these Acts had only been obtained after the severest competition and at great cost, he thought it would concur in the necessity for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the expediency of permitting a single company to indulge in such an excess of legislation. The whole line had been split up into five distinct undertakings, having their own separate capitals and interests, which were worked by the parent line at certain fixed rates and charges. No less than thirteen suits in Chancery had been instituted by the various interests connected with these separate lines, to determine the rights of each against the others. There were twenty-four debenture powers arising out of these lines, and there were as many Chancery suits pending to determine the rights under each; there were twenty-nine separate share powers, and there were three separate share powers to be charged upon funds not yet created. He felt strongly that these facts formed a sufficient ground for inquiry by a Committee without personal imputations being thrown upon any one. One fact that had come prominently before him in 1863, when he first knew the position of the company, was that while the actual capital of the company consisted of several millions, the nominal capital, the holders of which alone possessed any control over the company, only amounted to £700,000. He hoped that in all future railway legislation, the House would feel the necessity for making some provision by which the debenture-holders and others having pecuniary interest in a railway company might have a power of veto with regard to the undertaking of additional schemes by the company. He would also suggest that companies should possess the power of abandoning all such schemes as were actually found not to be required, which would be a source of great and immediate relief. With regard to the constitution of the Committee he should wish, if it were appointed, that its members should be chosen by the Committee of Selection, so that it might command the entire respect and confidence of the House and the country. Although in making this application he only had in view the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, yet it would be quite possible, if the House should think fit, to extend the power of the Committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with any other railway they might think proper. On these grounds he trusted the House would grant the Committee—and that the hon. Member for Maidstone would not press the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the means adopted by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company for raising the share capital and exercising their borrowing powers under the various Acts of Parliament authorising the construction of the main line and its extensions and branches."—(Sir Morton Peto.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I confess that, having listened to the terms of the Motion of the hon. Member for Bristol, I have great difficulty in ascertaining and in recognising the connection between the subject of his Motion and the duty of the House of Commons to investigate it. No doubt we all know that there have been great disasters in connection with the enterprise, and I am sure that all who know personally the hon. Member for Bristol must regret that he has in any way been connected with those disasters. For myself, I may say that I have recognised with admiration the enterprise and energy of his character, and I deeply regret that he should have been mixed up with these troubled affairs. The House must also sympathize with an hon. Member who has sat among us for so many years, and who has shown so many high qualities which entitle him to our respect. Still, I think we must hesitate before we authorize—for the purpose of obtaining some object which it is natural that the hon. Gentleman should wish to attain—an investigation into matters with which it appears to me the House of Commons has no concern. The undertaking with reference to which this inquiry is sought is what, in comparison with the other proceedings of this House, we may call a private speculation, and those who have become connected with it must be prepared to take upon themselves all the responsibilities which may have arisen in consequence of its affairs not having turned out satisfactorily. I ask the House to consider for a moment where the line is to be drawn in the event of our assenting to this application of the hon. Member. If, in the event of any observations having been made upon the conduct of any individual Member of this House, in connection with any transaction, however extensive, we are to be asked successively to grant a Committee of Inquiry, I wish to know where the line is to be drawn? If we are to examine into the affairs of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, whose affairs have never been brought before the House of Commons, and with which the House of Commons has no connection, why should we not investigate the affairs of any other railway company, and why should we limit such inquiries to railway companies, and not extend them to the circumstances attending the failure of any great bank with which any Member of this House might be connected? If we agree to enter into the investigation of the case of this railway company, would not that Member have a right to come forward and ask us to inquire into the affairs of that bank, on the ground that its failure had created a great sensation in the public mind, and that many persons had complained that they had been much injured by the conduct of the managers of the concern—the imputation being altogether false—and therefore that if we would investigate the matter it would be shown that, although unfortunate, the conduct of the managers had been strictly prudent? The energies of the House of Commons are sufficiently tasked at the present moment in dealing with questions affecting the public interest, and I very much regret, therefore, that the hon. Member for Bristol has found it necessary to make this Motion. I cannot advise the House to agree to the Motion; as, if they do adopt it, I am sure they will establish a precedent which they will afterwards very much regret. Under these circumstances, if the hon. Member for Bristol persists in his Motion I shall feel bound to oppose it.

MR. T. BARING said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Maidstone whether he intended to proceed with his Amendment, an Amendment which, from its wording, seemed to imply that the hon. Gentleman had some charges to make against certain hon. Members in that House?

MR. WHATMAN felt that, after the opinion that had been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer given against the appointment of a Committee, he should not be justified in persevering with his Amendment. At the same time, he wished it to be perfectly understood that he was willing to meet the hon. Gentlemen who were mentioned in the terms of his Motion in any way they might think proper.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I do not know, Sir, whether we are to regard the last speech as equivalent to a challenge; but without entering into private matters of that nature, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that an hon. Gentleman has placed upon the notice paper an Amendment couched in language clearly insinuating something amounting to fraud on the part of three Members of this House, and that the hon. Gentleman does not substantiate his charges when called upon to do so. I do not know whether any breach of order has been committed; but, if not, I still think that the opinion of the House ought to be expressed in discouragement of conduct which certainly constitutes a breach of the ordinary course of Parliamentary practice.

MR. WHATMAN said, he desired it to be perfectly understood that if it was the wish of the House he was quite prepared to make his statement.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he rose to order. He believed that no hon. Member was in order in bringing under the consideration of the House the conduct of any hon. Member unless the conduct complained of had been committed by the hon. Member accused in his capacity as Member of Parliament or in the House of Commons. He therefore submitted to the House that it would not be in order for the hon. Member for Maidstone to proceed.

MR. SPEAKER: A notice of a somewhat personal nature has been placed on the Paper referring to the affairs of a certain railway company, and an hon. Member proposes to add to that Motion "and also into the means adopted" by certain Members of this House "for raising money" in connection with certain railway companies. An hon. Member who spoke just now says that the Amendment contains an insinuation of fraud. The words do not directly bear that construction. Whether anything out of order may arise in the discussion proposed by the hon. Member for Maidstone, it is not for me now to say; but there is nothing in the notice placed on the Paper that can be considered as a violation of order.

MR. GLADSTONE: I apprehend, Sir, that technically, the hon. Member for Maidstone would be prevented from giving his explanation to the House on the ground that he has already addressed us once. I think, however, that the wish of the House has been misunderstood by the hon. Gentleman in his very natural desire to vindicate himself from any imputation of cowardice in shrinking from proceeding with his Amendment. It was very natural and laudable, too, that any hon. Member who felt himself to be injuriously affected by that Amendment, should challenge its being proceeded with; but I do not believe that it is the wish of the House that that course should be adopted. When my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone rose in his place I expected that he would, as I think he is bound to do, disavow any imputation with regard to the three Members mentioned in the Amendment, and now that no charge has been made against those hon. Members, we ought to regard their conduct as in no degree affected. I trust, therefore, if this discussion does not proceed, as I do not believe it can proceed, that those three hon. Gentlemen, whose high character and untainted honour are well known to us, will be regarded as being still as free from dishonour or suspicion of crime as they ever have been. With regard to the original Motion I have little to say beyond echoing the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, both with regard to the just tribute he has paid to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, a man who has obtained a high position in this country, by the exercise of rare talents, and who has adorned that position by his great virtues, and also in the course which the right hon. Gentleman has recommended the House to adopt. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in representing to my hon. Friend that he has no locus standi in this House for proposing his Motion. It may be true, perhaps, that my hon. Friend might be justified in making such a Motion on the ground that railway companies solicit special Parliamentary powers, and that Parliament itself claims greater powers over railway companies than it does over other companies; but still, when it becomes a question of policy, I think that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are unanswerable, and that we cannot draw the line between the case of those embarrassed railway companies and other companies in positions more or less analogous. The consequence of acceding to this proposition would probably be very considerable embarrassment in the conduct of this inquiry, and undoubtedly great future embarrassment in dealing with the precedent which this Motion would set up. I hope, therefore, my hon. Friend will consent to withdraw his Motion.

Viscount Cranbourne

MR. T. BARING said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the position in which the question then stood. The hon. Member for Bristol had moved for a Committee of Inquiry as regarded himself, whereupon the hon. Member for Maidstone proposed an Amendment, asking inquiry into the conduct of other Members. The hon. Member placed on the paper, where it remained for several days, a notice reflecting on the conduct of other hon. Members, and when he (Mr. T. Baring) asked him whether he meant to persist in his Motion, his answer was that he was ready to give him any explanation anywhere else, but that it was not his intention to proceed with the Motion. Hon. Members might say that the matter should drop there; but surely when a Gentleman said that although he did not mean to persist with his Motion, he was ready to proceed if the House wished him to do so, there was no real withdrawal of the Motion. He (Mr. T. Baring) thought the House was bound, in justice to the hon. Members whose names were mentioned in the Amendment, to allow the hon. Member to proceed.

MR. WATKIN said, he addressed the House with the deepest pain. The hon. Member for Maidstone was his Colleague in one important undertaking, and his hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon was his Colleague in another. For both he had great respect. Some years ago the shareholders and bondholders in the latter enterprize, then in much difficulty, put the whole concern into his hands, and it became his duty fully to investigate everything connected with it, and especially the transactions for which the hon. Member for Huntingdon was responsible, and he was bound in duty to say that he had come away from that inquiry with admiration for the honour, uprightness, and the other high qualifications characteristic of the British merchant, by which the conduct of the hon. Member for Huntingdon had been distinguished. No doubt, the enterprize with which they were now both connected, had been unfortunate; but if men were to be hunted down because any enterprize with which they were connected had been unfortunate, where was this persecution to stop? The hon. Member for Huntingdon had become connected with this undertaking in his capacity of agent for one of the colonies, and he stood by it through good report and through evil report, and risked his own money to a large extent, in order that the work might be completed in its integrity as a property. When the day of settlement arrived, the hon. Member had in his possession securities amounting to several hundred thousand pounds, given to him to cover advances, which he might have realized for his own benefit; but, instead of doing so, he took his position as an ordinary creditor, in a manner that did him infinite credit, and he gave up these securities without condition. As representative of the bondholders and chairman of the company, he felt bound to express his high admiration of such conduct. He might also mention that at a meeting of the company to which he had alluded, at which some of the largest bond and shareholders attended, a resolution of thanks was unanimously voted to the hon. Member for Huntingdon for the magnanimous conduct which he had displayed.

MR. KIRKMAN HODGSON said, he desired to make a few observations, because he was personally interested in the implied charge against those concerned in the conduct of the Grand Trunk of Canada Railway. Any charge with reference to that matter which was brought against the hon. Member for Huntingdon should also be preferred against the hon. Member for Kendal and himself, for nothing connected with the financial arrangements of that undertaking had been done or sanctioned by the one which had not also been sanctioned by the others. He was, indeed, proud to regard himself as included in this implied censure; for nothing had been done in the matter by himself and those associated with him which he was not prepared to justify, defend, and explain in that House or before any tribunal whatever; he would not say "anywhere else," because the phrase was capable of varied interpretations, but he would say that he was willing to meet those implied charges before the bondholders or shareholders, or any tribunal of law or equity.

MR. WHATMAN said, that when he used the words referred to, he meant in that House or anywhere else. If he had appeared to go beyond what he ought to have done, he was now perfectly willing to express that he did not intend to attribute any personal act to the hon. Member for Huntingdon. He had merely raised this question on public grounds, and by reason of the confidence given to the public by so great a name being attached to the guarantee. If he had said one word more than he ought to have done he was willing to withdraw the expression.

MR. FRESHFIELD said, that the hon. Member for Maidstone had withdrawn the inferred charge against the hon. Member for Huntingdon, who was no doubt infi-nately obliged to him. With respect, however, to himself, he could tell the hon. Gentleman that he was ready to meet any accusation which any hon. Member might make against him, either in the House or out of it; but he demanded from the hon. Member an explanation as to his grounds for making the accusation he had. As far as he understood the Amendment of the hon. Member, it charged him, in company with the hon. Member for Huntingdon and the hon. Baronet opposite, with some guilty conduct in respect of the raising of money for the Grand Trunk of Canada Railway. As a matter of fact, his connection with that railway was very simple. He was an original shareholder, and had paid cash for the full price of his shares. Originally those shares stood as a first charge on the concern; they had since been converted into a fourth charge, under an arrangement made by the hon. Member for Stockport, who had assured the shareholders that the arrangement referred to was for their advantage. Possibly it was so. [Mr. WATKIN protested that he must explain.] He had great faith in the business qualities of the hon. Member for Stockport. What he had said was not spoken as a covert charge; he had no doubt that the arrangement was to the benefit of the shareholders. Leaving that point, however, he remarked that all he had to say with reference to the concern was, that it had been unfortunate. Still, he insisted that it had been managed honestly; and not a breath of calumny had been raised against its conductors, except what had been thrust upon the House by the hon. Member for Maidstone. He was quite sure, however, that no Member of the House would believe that any of the hon. Gentlemen concerned in the management of that company had done anything inconsistent with professions of the highest possible character. But the hon. Member had also made some indefinite charge against him with reference to the raising of money for the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company. He asked him upon what authority he implied a charge; and, if no charge were implied, then what he meant to convey by his Amendment? The contents of the notice papers of the House were not circulated in the metropolis alone; they found their way to every part of the mercantile world; and the Amendment of the hon. Member, with its implied charge, had gone with the rest. The hon. Member was therefore bound to tell the House what he meant. He especially desired him to explain himself because he courted the opportunity to answer whatever statement the hon. Member might make. He could not, consistently with order, go into the history of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway himself. He admitted, however, that the firm with which he was connected had conducted the legal business of the company for many years; and he ventured to say that there was no undertaking of greater public importance; nor had any undertaking been more independently and honourably promoted. The railway had been originated to meet the requirements of the landowners of Kent; and it had grown as necessity for it arose. It was first a line from Chatham to Canterbury, then it stretched from Canterbury to Dover, and finally obtained powers to run up to London, when it became a great undertaking. It had been unfortunate, but its misfortunes could not be referred to him; and he called upon the hon. Member to substantiate his charges, or, if he could not do so, to withdraw them. He (Mr. Freshfield) could not be content to ride off on the high character of the hon. Member for Huntingdon, for he also had a character to lose—a character that was very dear to him. He thought the hon. Member for Maidstone owed it to the House to proceed with his Motion.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that after the observations which had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, he had no choice but to withdraw his Motion. At the same time, he could not refrain from thanking those right hon. Gentlemen for the courteous terms in which they had spoken of him. He was especially thankful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. After having sat in the House for twenty years, with the exception of a brief interregnum, in political opposition to the right hon. Gentleman, the remarks which had fallen from him were extremely gratifying to his feelings.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he desired to repeat, in behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone, that he had taken action in the matter simply because he was under the impression that the public desired some Parliamentary investigation into the financial questions he referred to. His hon. Friend also wished him to say that his sole motive for withdrawing the Amendment was that the hon. Member for Bedford, who was the Chairman of the Committee of Elections, had told him that it was not the province of Committees of the House of Commons to inquire into matters connected with railways which had not previously come under the cognizance of the House. Thus the motive of his hon. Friend for giving notice of the Amendment was simply a public one; and his motive for withdrawing it was not to be traced to unwillingness to go into it.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that the hon. Member for Maidstone ought not only to be ready to retract, but he (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) thought it ought to be done almost upon his knees. If the hon. Gentleman could not speak himself—if he were a mere puppet in this matter—the hon. Gentleman should have come forward in a manly manner to express regret, and to make apology to those Gentlemen whom he had slandered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Representation of the People of Ireland, he should desire to explain the reason why on a previous occasion he had declined to relinquish his place on the list upon "a private Member's night" in favour of the Government measure. He believed he was correct in stating that once only in the course of his thirty-five years' experience in Parliament had an attempt been made to oust private Members from the position which they attained by the exercise of much personal watchfulness, and after the chances of the ballot. That attempt was made in the plenitude of Lord Palmerston's sway, and proved unsuccessful. He was very anxious to have an opportunity of laying his views on this matter before the House previous to the Easter recess, so as to obtain the opinions at once of the Government and of the country upon the subject. He likewise felt that a proposal emanating from a private Member might not be inexpedient, seeing that the plans propounded by successive Governments in late years had shown a steady deterioration. By the Reform Act the registered voters in Ireland had certain modes appointed for them by which they might place their names upon the register; £50 and £20 freeholders were enabled to register their right to vote for life, and those having a £10 interest could register for seven years, during which time their votes could not be questioned. When Earl Russell, however, brought forward his Reform Bill of 1850, he disregarded these circumstances. But the Bill of 1850 introduced by Earl Russell terminated in the most unjustifiable manner the rights of these persons. The excuse given was a curious one. These rights were extinguished in order that Ireland might have the benefit of a rating franchise—the very franchise which Earl Russell's Government repudiated last year in England, and went out of office rather than consent to. The next measure on the subject was that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, which included a provision enabling Irish Peers to represent both county and borough constituencies, which was in direct contravention of the Act of Union. Very short work was made of that proposal; he himself presented to Lord Palmerston a protest, signed by eighty Members, against it, and the matter was abandoned. But more objectionable than anything else which had gone before was the measure which was brought forward last year by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue). It proposed to unite two boroughs, sometimes at a distance of sixty miles apart, and then to semi-disfranchise them. The first glance at the measure suggested that it must have been framed with the object of securing the seat of the principal Law Officer of the Crown. Of course, he did not insinuate that there had been any such object in view; but, remembering the time when Irish business was carried on by Lord Palmerston's Government with hardly any official from Ireland in the House, it was not unnatural that when a Liberal Government had the assistance of two able men in Parliament they should endeavour to keep them there. He did not propose by the present Bill to disfranchise any boroughs in Ireland, but to group with them other towns in the vicinity, so that in no case would one borough have less than 1,000 voters. Neither did he propose, as former Bills had done, to give additional Members to Cork or Dublin. Cork had already eight Members, and admitting it to be the largest county in Ireland, it must be borne in mind that Mayo, Galway, and Donegal, the next in point of size, had only eight Members collectively. What claim, then, could Cork, or Dublin either, successfully put forward to extra representation? One feature of the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire—the lodger franchise—he proposed to adopt; but fancy franchises, whether literary or monetary, whether dependent on intellectual or pecuniary qualifications, he entirely threw aside. He proposed that the county franchise should be reduced from £12 to £8; which was the limit originally fixed by the Bill of Earl Russell in 1850, and he knew no reason why it should not be adopted now. Large reductions in the county franchise had been sanctioned, in principle at least, in England. The Government of last year proposed a reduction from £50 to £14; the present Bill fixed the limit at £15. If such large reductions were expedient and proper in England, what reason was there why a corresponding reduction should not take place in Ireland, from £12 to £8? There was another reason in favour of the reduction of the county franchise in Ireland. The reduced amount of the suffrage would give landlords a greater interest in keeping their tenants upon their land, and so tend to diminish emigration. With a reduced borough suffrage from £8 to £4, there would be no difficulty in providing that every existing borough in Ireland should have a constituency of 1,000 voters. Eight towns in Ireland already had more than 1,000 voters, and with these—namely, Belfast, Cork, Dublin, Galway, Limerick, Londonderry, Newry, and Waterford—he did not propose to interfere. With twenty-five other boroughs, possessing very small constituencies, it would be necessary to deal. Portarlington, for instance, had only seventy-five voters at present. And what he proposed was, in the case of those diminutive boroughs, to group with them other towns in the neighbourhood, so as to bring up the number of their voters to the prescribed limit. The towns to be grouped were the following:—Armagh, with Portadown and Ballybay; Athlone, with Mullingar, Roscommon, and Longford; Bandon, with Drummany, Macroom, and Bantry; Carlow, with Athy, Tallow, and Bagnalstown; Carrickfergus, with Larn and Antrim; Cashel with Thurles, Tipperary, and Nenagh; Coleraine, with Ballymena, Ballymoney, and Portrush; Clonmel, with Carrick-on-Suir, Carrickbeg, and Cahir; Dundalk, with Kells, Navan, and Trim; Downpatrick, with Newtownards, Newcastle, and Donaghadee; Drogheda, with Balbriggan; Dungannon, with Omagh and Strabane; Dungarvan, with Lismore and Cappoquin; Ennis, with Kilrush, Ennistimon, and Gort; Enniskillen, with Monaghan, Ballyshannon, and Cavan; Kilkenny, with Thomastown and Callan; Kinsale, with Skibbereen and Clonakilty; Lisburn, with Lurgan and Banbridge; Mallow, with Fermoy and Charleville; Portarlington, with Maryborough, Mountmellick, and Tallamore; Sligo, with Ballyna, Ballymote, and Boyle; Wexford, with Gorey and Wicklow; New Ross, with Enniscorthy and Tagmon; Tralee, with Killarney, Kenmare, and Dingle; and Youghal, with Queenstown and Middleton. He also proposed to assimilate the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries of towns. This Bill had the merit, or demerit, of not being framed to further any particular interest, but had been prepared solely with a view of giving a fair and full representation to the whole country. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would allow him to bring in the Bill, so that it might be printed and circulated, in order that the Irish Members and the Irish people might at once have an opportunity of expressing their opinion as to its provisions. He courted criticism, was ready to adopt any improvement the House might consider desirable; but, at the same time, was prepared and ready to defend the principle and detail of the measure against all comers.

MR. VANCE said, he did not think that the Bill which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had sketched was likely to find much favour in that House, especially since the Government had promised to bring forward a Bill of their own shortly after Easter. In detailing the provisions of the Bill, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had omitted to name the sum at which he proposed to fix the borough franchise. [Colonel FRENCH: £4.] And the hon. Member proposed to have the county franchise at £8, the Government having fixed the English county franchise at £15. This did not seem to be right. The borough franchise in Ireland was now £12, and he did not think it could safely be reduced below that amount. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman then proposed to group towns with boroughs so as to make up the number of 1,000 voters, but perhaps he had not calculated how much the number of such boroughs would be increased when the franchise was brought down to £4. He (Mr. Vance) thought that additional seats should be given for places in the province of Ulster, where there was great increase of wealth and commerce. Some other districts also had a claim for more Members; and, indeed, he thought that Ireland, taken as a whole, had less Members than she was entitled to. He agreed that the proposition to allow Irish Peers to represent constituencies was very objectionable; but he hoped that the Reform Bill for Ireland promised by Her Majesty's Government would be founded on very different principles from those on which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had proceeded.

LORD NAAS said, that the Government did not object to the introduction of the Bill, as it was desirable that the House should see the scheme which had been framed by so experienced a Member. He must, however, reserve the opportunity of expressing his opinion on the measure until a future occasion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Representation of the People in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel FRENCH and Mr. MARSH.

TOTNES ELECTIONS.

RESOLUTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners on Bribery and Corruption at the Elections for the Borough of Totnes; to the direct interference of the Duke of Somerset in the political affairs of Totnes, which was supposed to have ceased with the year 1863; to the ejection of Somerset tenants after the election in that year; and to the acts of bribery, corrupt practices, and intimidation habitually practised by Mr. Michelmore, steward to the Duke, and detailed in that Report. He said that he took this course with great regret, because he thought that the punishment which the borough of Totnes was to suffer would be sufficient for all the bribery and corruption which had been practised there for a number of years; and he should have been glad if the scenes that had been there enacted should, as far as the cognizance of the House was concerned, have been buried in oblivion. But a Question had been put to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary the other night, the answer to which led him to believe that an act of injustice was about to be committed by that House. He was anxious, before they sanctioned the prosecution of any individual, that they should clearly understand who were the persons most prominent in bribery, corruption, eviction, and the manufacture of votes that had taken place in that borough. Previously to the Reform Act Totnes had been a free borough, untainted with bribery and corruption; but, after the passing of that Act the boundaries of the borough of Totnes were much enlarged. He found this statement in the Report of the Commissioners—

“At the time of the Reform Bill the boundaries of the borough which had been the same as the Manor of Great Totnes were much enlarged, and those that were substituted, though drawn irregularly and from no fixed centre, took in that portion of the adjacent country on which most houses had been built. This portion contained the Manor of Little Totnes and also the Manor of Bridgetown, which was divided from the town proper of Totnes by the river Dart. The owner of both these Manors was the Duke of Somerset, who thus for the first time acquired weight in the political affairs of the then borough.”

He might observe that Totnes was not exceptional in that respect. In the settlement of the boundaries consequent on the Reform Act, whenever the property of a Liberal or Whig proprietor was found adjacent to such a place as Totnes, those who had the settlement of the boundaries managed to include that property. After the passing of the Reform Bill, the Duke of Somerset represented Totnes till the death of his father, when Lord Gifford became what was called the ducal candidate. For to such a depth had the borough of Totnes fallen that it was no longer the borough which returned a Member to represent the opinions of the burgesses of Totnes or of the inhabitants of the surrounding district, but it became plain that a Member was returned to represent the interests, and the interests alone, of the Duke of Somerset. The Report of the Commissioners further stated—

“In 1855 the then Duke of Somerset died, and Lord Seymour's succession to the peerage creating a vacancy in the borough, the Earl of Gifford, as the ducal representative, was elected without a contest. We had no proof of any corrupt practices having prevailed at this uncontested election; we have not, therefore, inquired into the details of preceding elections except where they throw light on the conduct of persons concerned in the elections of 1857, 1859, 1862, 1863, and 1865. After the election of the Earl of Gifford the disunion that up to that time had existed in the Liberal party became less, the two sections were brought nearer together, and agreed to work in concert for the furtherance of the Liberal cause. No unity in money arrangements existed, but the exercise of the Somerset interest in favour of the independent Liberal was clearly thought an equivalent for money to be spent by the latter. Although during the life of the Earl of Gifford money was not required to secure his seat, yet throughout the time that he represented Totnes considerable sums were spent in bribery on behalf of the independent Liberal candidate, and on the Earl of Gifford's death had to be further expended in order to protect the Somerset Member, who had hitherto been considered safe."

It appeared, then, that it became necessary, in order to maintain the Duke of Somerset's power and influence, to create new votes; and, as the Reform Act of 1832 had included within the limits of the borough a large portion of the Duke of Somerset's property, the Duke and his agents were thereby enabled to manufacture qualifications.

The Report of the Commissioners said—

"The power of creating votes was largely increased by the quantity of meadow land brought within the limits of the borough at the Reform Bill. Sheds of a better and more expensive character than had hitherto existed were erected on the different fields, and a manufactured qualification of £10 for 'buildings with land' was thus obtained. This system of creating qualifications, though adopted by both sides, has added a large number of votes to the Liberal interest, and is now only available to any extent to that party."

He would presently call the attention of the House to the use which was afterwards made of these new votes. In 1863 the Earl of Gifford died, and Mr. Alfred Seymour, at present Member for Totnes, and Mr. Dent became candidates for the vacant seat. The Commissioners' Report stated—

"The Earl of Gifford died in January, 1863, and immediately Mr. Alfred Seymour and Mr. Dent presented themselves as candidates. Mr. Seymour sent to Totnes the sum of £1,000, which was paid into the account of the Messrs. Michelmores with the National Provincial Bank. We cannot accurately discover the amount brought down upon this occasion by Mr. Dent or his adviser, Mr. Mitchell. The only way by which the Conservative candidate could win the election was by the purchase of a number of votes in Bridgetown, tenants of small holdings under the Duke, who might, by the temptation of very large sums, be induced to brave the penalty of certain eviction from their holdings. Fifteen of these people were thus bought at prices varying from £60 to £150 a head, but they were not enough to turn the scale in Mr. Dent's favour."

Though he did not believe that the Duke of Somerset gave any direct instructions to his agent to take any particular course, he knew what was going on, and expressed no censure of the proceedings. Therefore, in some respects, the noble Duke was answerable for the acts of his steward on that occasion. The Report further stated—

"Immediately after the election notices to quit were served on almost all the Somerset tenants who had voted against Mr. Seymour, and they were eventually turned out, care being taken by the other party to find other houses and fields for them within the borough. These evictions were brought to the knowledge of the Duke of Somerset, who, informed by his agent (himself guilty of bribery at the same election) that the evicted tenants were turned out because they had received bribes, made no further inquiries. . . . In the year 1863 the Duke became lord-lieutenant of the county; the whole of the Somerset property within the borough had been worked for the manufacture of votes, by the addition of buildings to land. The tenants admitted to the holdings (all of which are tenancies from year to year) have been admitted by the Duke's agent on the understanding, expressed or implied, that they were to vote for the Somerset Member at all events. This manufacturing of votes and this understanding with the tenant, was known to and approved by the present Duke of Somerset. In his system of dealing with these persons the Duke's agent has had continually in view the strengthening the political power of his employer. It does not appear that the Duke inquired into the manner in which his agents were using their influence over the ducal tenantry."

All that the Duke of Somerset really got appeared plain from the following statement in the Report:—

"The trouble of approving of candidate and the payment of £40 per annum to the registration seem to be all the Duke really gave up, as the Somerset influence, in the absence of any specific directions by the Duke to his agent, was still exercised in the same way and manner as it had been of old. The registration expenses, however, were not to be under the same regulations as heretofore, and consequently we find Mr. Pender and Mr. Seymour each paying a sum of £250 per annum nominally for the expenses of registration, but, in reality, for charges entailed by illegal payments made by Mr. Michelmores."

He had now brought the House to the period when the Duke of Somerset refrained from active participation in the politics of the borough of Totnes; and he now came to the election of 1865. Messrs. Pender and Seymour intended to come forward as candidates again; but, as Totnes had enjoyed the luxury and expenditure of contested elections, and as that luxury was only to be obtained by getting some persons to contest the borough with Mr. Pender and Mr. Seymour, great efforts were made to find a gentleman who possessed courage enough to contest the borough. A deputation of Conservative gentlemen accordingly came up to London in search of such a party, and they applied to Mr. Spofforth, of the firm of Messrs. Baxter, Rose, and Norton, for his valuable advice and assistance in the matter. The first gentleman suggested by Mr. Spofforth, who enjoyed the reputation of being an active agent for the Conservative party, was Mr. Kennard. The latter gentleman went down to Totnes and made his observations there. On ascertaining the circumstances of the case, he refused, as became a man of the highest honour, to owe his seat in the House of Commons to Messrs. Baxter, Rose, and Norton; and thereupon declined to contest the borough. Mr. Spofforth speedily discovered another candidate in the person of Colonel Dawkins, who was willing to become a candidate at the election in question, was prepared with a sum of £2,000 for legal expenses, and with him was soon afterwards associated another gentleman—Commander Pim—and between them they spent the sum of £4,559 16s. 8d. The Liberal party, on the other hand, were not backward. Large sums were provided by them and spent in bribery, a magistrate of the borough and the Duke of Somerset's steward taking part in the transaction. On that occasion, as the Report stated—

“Open house was kept at this as at former elections, both on and before the polling day, at both hotels—by the Liberals at the Seymour Arms, and by the Conservatives at the Seven Stars—at the expense of the four candidates. A petition was threatened on the declaration of the poll, and as it was feared that the treating which had gone on at the Seymour Arms might vitiate the election of the Liberal Members, it was thought well so to arrange the accounts kept in the books of the hotel as to present the appearance of entries having been made to each person of the refreshments supplied to him, although these refreshments had originally been charged to one account, headed ‘Pender and Seymour.’ Accordingly, a Mr. Cross destroyed two pages in the day-book containing the account, and substituted other pages containing the same items, but charged to different individuals. Mr. Samuel Parnell, since that time appointed postmaster at Totnes, performed a similar operation upon the hotel ledger. These facts were done to prevent an objection to the return on account of treating from being available in case of a petition.”

Soon after the election Parnell was appointed to the Post Office at Totnes. Now he had no means of ascertaining who recommended this gentleman to the consideration of the Treasury. He could not suppose for a moment that any Member of that House would be willing to recommend any person for promotion in Her Majesty's service who had been concerned in such transactions, and had shown himself so active in destroying the valuable evidence which was required by the Commissioners. He could not view that appointment in any other light than as a reward for those great and eminent services which he had described. He had now shown that the noble Duke had used his influence in the manufacture of votes—he had shown that Members of Parliament had provided the means for bribery and corruption—he had shown that an active agent and steward of the Duke of Somerset had evicted those tenants who refused to vote for his Grace's candidate—he had shown that a man who had been actively engaged in bribery and getting rid of the information required by the Commissioners in order to ascertain the truth, had been promoted in the Post Office—he had shown that there were magistrates in the borough of Totnes who were acting as tools of those who provided the money for bribery—he had shown that in London there were eminent solicitors and firms prepared to find candidates of “commercial ability” for any borough where they might be wanted;—and he asked if such acts, which he ventured to characterize as offences and a disgrace to that House, could be adequately punished by proceedings against an obscure innkeeper in the borough of Totnes. If it was the opinion of the House that the offences committed at Totnes were such as to call for the immediate and decided action of the House, far be it from him to protest against that decision; he only asked, in the name of honesty and honour, that fair play and equal justice should be meted out to all. If the innkeeper of Totnes was to be brought to the bar of public opinion, let them place at the same bar those who had been the fons et origo malorum, who had created votes, evicted their tenants, found the means of bribery and the tools by which it was committed, and let even-handed justice be dealt to all. It would be a misfortune for the country if the day should ever arrive when there was found to be one law for him who was poor and had no local influence, and another for him who possessed the largest estate in the county, and enjoyed one of the noblest titles in the realm, and who was an honoured and valued servant of the Crown. He repeated, let all who were guilty or suspected of these malpractices, or any other malpractices, be sent to the same bar, and receive condemnation or acquittal on the same terms. He might also venture to summon the House itself to the same bar, because in his conscience he could not believe that where there were so many men of eminent legal acquirement, of knowledge, research, and energy, they could not long ago have made bribery and corruption impossible, if they had chosen to apply themselves earnestly to the subject. In one of the journals of that morning appeared a letter, bearing upon this subject, from one of the most eminent and venerable men of the day—a man whose fame was already established in the history and literature of this country—he alluded to Lord Brougham. With the leave of that House he would read the observations of that noble and learned Lord—

“To the Editor of The Times.

“Sir,—I trouble you with a few lines on the important question of household suffrage. It ought to be granted fairly and frankly, and not loaded with conditions and exceptions which render it unavailing. The only condition that I see is an absolutely essential one is, that the house should have been owned or occupied by tenants or lodgers for two years. I should not much object to a rating of a certain amount; but I think that immaterial, as my reliance is upon the two years, for owners, or tenants, or lodgers; but I would punish with the treadmill all who receive or offer bribes. When the slave trade existed its profits were such that men ran the risk of capture and forfeiture; but when my Act made it punishable by transportation, no one chose to run the risk, and the abominable traffic was entirely extirpated. I believe the same result would happen with bribery.—I have the honour to be yours faithfully,

He would not trespass longer on the attention of the House. His object now in submitting this question to the House was not to screen any one individual from justice, but simply to defend a man whom he admitted to be guilty from being supposed to be more guilty than others who were nevertheless vastly superior to him in wealth and station; to ask the House to do one thing or another, either not to proceed against this poor innkeeper or to insist that all who were implicated in these cases of bribery and corruption should stand at the same bar. He hoped he should not appeal to the House in vain, and he begged to move a Resolution to this effect—

“That before proceedings be taken against any of the Parties convicted of Bribery at the Totnes Election a list of those about to be prosecuted be laid upon the Table of this House.”

Sir Lawrence Palk

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That before proceedings be taken against any of the Parties convicted of Bribery at the Totnes Election a list of those about to be prosecuted be laid upon the Table of this House.”—(Sir Lawrence Palk.)

MR. A. SEYMOUR said, it was not his duty in any way to defend the Duke of Somerset from the attack made upon him by the hon. Baronet. In the first place, he could not defend the noble Duke in this matter, because he was entirely ignorant of the mode in which his Grace managed his property. It was a matter in which he (Mr. A. Seymour) had taken no concern whatever. Whatever information he had on this subject was obtained from the same sources as those which were open to the hon. Baronet. The defence of the noble Duke he believed was in much abler hands than his; but having been referred to so personally by the hon. Baronet, and in terms—the propriety and good taste of which he might be allowed to question—he ventured to trespass on the attention of the House. He would confine himself to replying by a few remarks to what the hon. Baronet had said. In the first place, he could assure the House that he had had no communication with the Duke of Somerset upon this question, having carefully refrained from any such communication either directly or indirectly. Indeed, he was not aware what steps were to be taken in regard to his defence until he had entered the House that evening. He felt that the character of the noble Duke stood far too high in this country to render any defence of his Grace at all necessary. With regard to his (Mr. A. Seymour's) candidature for the borough of Totnes, he had one interview with his Grace, and one only. That interview was fully detailed in the blue book, which was open to the inspection of any Member who was desirous of obtaining a full account of the circumstances of the case. In that one interview his Grace plainly stated that he had no power whatever to name a Member for the borough; but that if he chose to go down as a candidate he might have his (the noble Duke's) support; but his Grace added that his success must depend on himself (Mr. A. Seymour), by making himself agreeable to the gentlemen of Totnes. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh; but he believed it was a notorious fact that the Duke of Somerset at that time did leave the choice of the Member for the borough to the leading Liberals of Totnes. Happening to have been a candidate for Exeter, his name became well known, although he would not say that his relationship to his Grace had not something to do with his nomination as a candidate for Totnes; but having arrived at that point, when he became a candidate, he must entirely decline to follow the hon. Baronet into all those questions and circumstances into which he had gone. Having been absent when the matter was previously discussed, he had had no opportunity of justifying himself before the House. He trusted that in the delicate position in which he was then placed, they would hear what he had to say in explanation, and that hon. Gentlemen would remember that if there was to be retrospective action, it should also include those hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House who were implicated in the same degree as himself. He had no wish to justify anything which might have happened. He was, in fact, placed under very peculiar circumstances. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, and he trusted that they were all of them in a position to be able to deny any accusation that might be brought against them of a similar kind. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon had made broad his phylactery, and had embroidered the hem of his garment with "purity and virtue;" but he trusted when the time came—and it might shortly occur—when the hon. Baronet went down to his own county, they would no longer hear those stories which were so rife in Devonshire and were so well known to all Devonshire men. The hon. Baronet whilst attacking his (Mr. A. Seymour's) noble Relative was endeavouring to raise for himself what he might consider an appanage of his house—the enfranchisement of Torquay, and at the same time obtain a lesson of management in these matters. He trusted it would be a healthy constituency; but he could not think that a place "where wealth accumulates and men decay" could produce a healthy constituency. He cordially endorsed the sentiment which the late Attorney General uttered in reference to Lancaster. No man had a stronger opinion than he (Mr. A. Seymour) had against bribery and corruption, and he had always denounced it in public and in private. The late Attorney General said it was in the power of any constituency to prevent bribery, and that 600 pure men might have prevented it at Lancaster. Now, he was inclined to go further than that, and to say that six leading men on each side could put a stop to bribery in any borough, however large it might be. They might legislate upon bribery and corruption; but, in his opinion, the only effectual mode of preventing it was to bring public opinion, as in the case of duelling, to bear upon it. The hon. Baronet had asked why some were to be brought to judgment whilst others were allowed to escape; but the hon. Baronet had read the blue book to little advantage, if he imagined that the inn-keeper, in this instance, was to be tried for bribery. He was to be tried for direct perjury. It was possible, as the hon. Baronet had stated, that some of the great Whig landlords had increased their boroughs at the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, and so had Gentlemen who held opposite opinions and were lords paramount in other boroughs. If, as the hon. Baronet had said, Totnes only represented the ducal house, how was it that Mr. Spofforth, who was in constant communication with hon. Gentlemen opposite, recommended Gentlemen to go down, and with a commercial spirit as it was called, and with money in their pockets, to contest the borough? Could the hon. Baronet defend that conduct? Did he only see the "beam that is in our eyes" and not see the "mote that is in his own eye?" If that was the case, as there was every reason to believe, how could hon. Gentlemen opposite have the conscience to stand up in that House and raise their voices against bribery and corruption? The hon. Baronet had, however, entirely acquitted the Duke of Somerset of any improper action in the election. He said that the Duke did not instruct his agent as to any particular course he was to adopt with reference to the election. Of what, then, did he accuse him? With reference to Mr. Kennard, if the hon. Baronet had inquired a little further, he would have found that that Gentleman did not quit Totnes until he knew that if he contested the borough he would meet with certain defeat. Further inquiry would have shown the hon. Baronet that one gentleman (Colonel Dawkins, of whom he wished to speak in terms of the greatest possible respect) had been told by an agent of the Conservative party that it was of no use to go down to Totnes without an enormous sum of money. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might sneer; but let them take care that their own hands were clean. Now he (Mr. A. Seymour) would inform the House what his conduct had been in the matter. He happened to travel to Totnes in the same carriage with an intimate friend of Colonel Dawkins', and another gentleman, who it appeared was going to Totnes to take off the stray votes and stand the possible chance of coming in with Colonel Dawkins. Upon ascertaining the object they had in view, he pursued a course which he thought every Gentleman so situated should do, and which would receive the approval of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He took out of his pocket his private poll-book, which contained entries of how every elector at Totnes was expected to vote, and handed it to Colonel Dawkins' friend and the other gentleman, in order that they might form their own opinion of their chance of success; and if afterwards they spent their money, and did not come in, it would be their own fault. After looking over it carefully, one of the gentlemen, seeing that it would be hopeless to contest the election, at once returned to London, where, no doubt, he saw Mr. Spofforth. That, he thought, was the best thing he could do between gentlemen. It saved one gentleman, at any rate, from putting himself in a disagreeable position, and had Colonel Dawkins pursued a similar course it would have been better possibly for him also. Though he did not suppose that he had justified himself in the eyes of the House from the finding of the Royal Commissioners, yet he thought that if hon. Gentlemen opposite had found themselves in his position they would have acted very much as he had done. At the time that he stood for the place he was utterly ignorant of its venality, and, considering the particular influence that was offered to him, he thought the most hypercritical Gentleman opposite would have accepted, as he did, that support, and he accordingly paid a certain sum of money—certainly not an extravagant sum, he thought—with which to clear off some back debts and subscriptions. He thought hon. Gentlemen had sufficient election experience to know what back debts were; but after what had been stated by the hon. Baronet he felt bound in justice to himself to make that statement. He paid, as he had stated, not a very extravagant sum for that purpose, and some long time after finding that a certain sum besides had been spent he felt bound as a man of honour to pay that also, and he did so. He only did what every hon. Gentleman would do—repay money which he found had been spent in his service. He had been found by the Commissioners as an approving and assenting party to bribery, when in fact he was utterly and entirely ignorant of it. He had nothing further to say in defence of his conduct, and he thanked the House for having so patiently listened to his statement.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, that in the observations which he was desirous of making in defence of the conduct of the Duke of Somerset, he should endeavour most studiously to abstain from everything which he might not reasonably hope would command the assent and approval of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, because in a matter of this description he was anxious to avoid anything like a party tone. The hon. Baronet who introduced the subject had stated that it was not his object to bring any individual under the censure of the House; but to advocate impartial justice, in order that all who were implicated in bribery and corruption at Totnes might be dealt with equally and fairly by the House. He did not oppose that principle, neither would the Duke of Somerset, on that or any other occasion. The Duke of Somerset submitted himself unreservedly to the judgment of the House, and to the bar of public opinion. The noble Duke was the last man who would justify bribery and corruption, and he believed, moreover, that he was the last man whom the House would consider likely to have been either directly or indirectly implicated in anything of the kind. If he were so implicated great would be the sorrow and regret all would feel that a man who had hitherto stood so high in public estimation, who had done so much good service to the country, and who had been so generally esteemed, should have condescended to so great an error. On the other hand, he (Sir Roundell Palmer) felt sure that the House would not very willingly receive or believe vague accusations of that kind, but that they would candidly and fairly do that justice to the Duke of Somerset which would be due to any one of the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects. He asked no more for the Duke of Somerset. The true history of the Duke of Somerset's connection with the borough of Totnes was to be found in the Duke's evidence, appended to the Commissioners'

Report, from a perusal of which it would be seen that his Grace's hands were as perfectly clean and pure from any species of participation, either directly or indirectly, in bribery or corruption, or in any other illegal or improper practice, as those of the purest Member of that House. The Duke of Somerset's connection with Totnes commenced in 1834, and he represented that borough for a period of twenty-one years, until in 1855, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the Dukedom. So far from his being indebted for his seat to the use of bribery, corruption, or intimidation, he was, in fact, from the general estimation in which he was held, supported by both Liberals and Conservatives, and was invariably returned at the head of the poll. And when, moreover, an opposition did come, it came from a certain section of the Liberals and not from the Conservatives of the borough. Since he had ceased to be the Member for the borough he had on only two occasions—and only when requested to do so—recommended gentlemen to the constituency. The first was the late Earl of Gifford (at that time he was not related or connected with the noble Duke), and afterwards the present Member for the borough; but on each occasion he had acted with the distinct understanding that he could do no more than recommend those gentlemen to the constituency, and that they must do everything else for themselves. In 1863, when his Grace became the lord-lieutenant of the county of Devon, he expressed his desire to his agent to separate himself from the politics of the borough, and he declined from that time to be concerned in the personal selection or recommendation of any candidate. He even ceased to make the moderate payment of £40 towards the bond fide registration expenses of the borough, and beyond that he had exercised no kind of influence upon the elections for Totnes, except that which, as hon. Gentlemen were aware, was inseparable from the position of a resident neighbouring proprietor, having considerable possessions and an historical name, if he were a person well discharging his duty in public and in private life. With regard to corrupt practices, the Royal Commissioners expressly exonerated his Grace from any connection or participation in them; the very questions put to him by the Royal Commissioners showed that they had not heard anything that could in the least degree bear the appearance of implicating his Grace in any way with corrupt practices. In fact, the Commissioners stated that down to 1855 no money was spent illegally in behalf of the Somerset candidate; the Duke himself (then Lord Seymour) having been the only Somerset candidate from 1834. The Commissioners stated that bribery was first resorted to by the Conservative party in order to counteract the territorial influence of the Somerset family; and, as the House well knew, the final result was that all parties in the borough resorted to the same practices, but the Duke was in no way responsible, directly or indirectly, for the result. In 1841, when Mr. Barry Baldwin contested the borough on Conservative principles, the Duke of Somerset, fearing that money would be spent, came to an arrangement with the opposite party whereby the representation was to be divided between the Duke and a Conservative. That arrangement continued till 1855, when his Grace ceased to represent the borough; and from that time to the present there was not the slightest suggestion that his Grace was directly or indirectly cognizant that any bribery was going on by his agents or by any one over whom he could exercise any authority or control. The hon. Baronet, he believed, did not accuse the noble Duke of participating in such practices.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that his remarks related exclusively to the evictions practised on the Somerset property.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he was under the impression that that was the hon. Baronet's meaning, and his explanation relieved him (Sir Roundell Palmer) from the necessity of saying more upon that part of the question. No one could regret more than the Duke of Somerset to find by the report that persons who were undoubtedly his agents—men holding important positions in the borough, and who were the agents also of other landed proprietors—should have connected themselves with those corrupt practices. He now came to two points, on which the hon. Baronet wished for satisfaction, and he thought he could give it to the hon. Baronet. With respect to the "manufacture of votes," he interpreted the Commissioners' words as meaning not that there had been any illegal creation of fictitious votes with the knowledge of the Duke, but that, the Reform Act having provided that land let with any description of building upon it at a bond fide rent of £10 should give a vote, the Duke's agents had, from time to time, made such arrangements with persons of his politics who desired to vote as would qualify them under that provision. As the law stood, there was nothing whatever illegal in the creation of votes by the erection of buildings and the letting of them with land, at a real rent, upon real tenancies, to persons who desired to vote; the tenants were net persons whom it was proposed to coerce to vote against their opinions; they, on the contrary, held the same opinions as the Duke, they wished to qualify themselves, and their wish was responded to. All the tenancies were real; not one of those created with the knowledge of the Duke was even alleged to be fictitious or colourable. Besides this, if any person declined to assent to the proposition that any party to an election might be lawfully assisted by the creation of bond fide votes by bond fide occupancies, he would present to them another consideration. The practice was, in the first instance, adopted by the Duke's agents strictly as a measure of defence, for an example had been set them by the Conservative candidate, who had manufactured votes in a similar manner upon the neighbouring estate of Gerston; which, at a later period, itself became the property of the Duke. Upon the subject of evictions, he was gratified in being able to state, without fear of contradiction, that the Report made by the Commissioners on the evidence taken before them did not show the least trace of anything like an abuse of the rights of property on the part of the Duke of Somerset. The only cases of eviction mentioned referred to some occurrences which followed the election of 1863; respecting which the Duke of Somerset stated that his agent had indeed told him after the election that he had given notices to quit to several tenants, not because of their votes, but because they publicly boasted of having taken bribes. If more than this was done, it was without the Duke's knowledge, and the Duke's agent, of course, did not state, nor had the Duke any reason to suspect, that he himself had offered bribes. The Commissioners were satisfied with that explanation and made no further inquiry upon the subject. There was one other fact which it was material he should mention—namely, that when one of the Commissioners asked the Duke if any complaints of eviction had ever been made to him, he said he never to his knowledge received any letter of that kind. During the time the Duke was Member for the borough his own conduct was pure, and he maintained the purity of the borough. As to the rights of property, it did not appear that he had on any occasion personally exercised those rights, or authorized any of his agents to exercise them, in a manner which could be regarded as harsh and oppressive. The votes created were bond fide according to law. He (Sir Roundell Palmer) had been anxious to lay these facts before the House, because the Duke naturally felt desirous that his name should stand before the country and the House in as fair and pure a position as it had always done.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he felt it to be his duty to state certain circumstances which had come to his knowledge. He had not the honour of a personal acquaintance with the Duke of Somerset; but he had had the honour of representing a county in which the Duke had a large property and considerable influence, and he could state that no steps whatever had been taken by the Duke to influence his tenantry; on the contrary, his Grace left them to act entirely as they pleased. There was the prospect of a very severe contest, and he happened to know, from personal acquaintance with the tenantry, that the Duke's tenants had not been interfered with. He and his Colleague were opposed in politics to his Grace, and had the Duke used his legitimate influence they would have been no doubt put to considerable cost and annoyance. He therefore thought it due to the noble Duke to make this statement.

MR. BERKELEY said, he had happened to form a very strong opinion respecting the question of undue influence on the part of the Duke of Somerset, and nothing that had been said during the evening had disturbed that opinion. Commissioners, he noticed, were never very anxious to find fault with great men; accordingly, he was not surprised to find that the Commissioners in this case had not made a very severe report respecting the conduct of the Duke of Somerset. He would ask the hon. and learned Member for Richmond whether the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se did not apply in their cases? There were two men who acted as his Grace's agents. One was guilty of gross bribery, the other admitted that he had accused some of the Duke's tenants, who were favourable to the Tories, of bribery, and that he knew the accusation to be false. He had never read evidence that more reminded him of the Italian Majocchi at Queen Caroline's trial than that given by the Duke of Somerset. It was all non mi ricordo. At first there might be a presumption that his Grace's stewards did the right thing, but when their acts became matters of publicity, found their way into the papers, and were afterwards brought out before the Commission, affairs assumed a very different aspect. Could the hon. and learned Gentleman tell the House whether his Grace had discharged Mr. Michelmores? Because, if a man branded as this Mr. Michelmores was did not really act under the Duke's orders, did not take a nod or a wink from the Duke, his continued employment reflected upon the character of his employer.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, that it was Mr. Michelmores's son who was now agent to the Duke.

MR. BERKELEY: Of course; and he would continue to be his agent; and as the Duke's agent, if opportunity offered in the borough of Totnes, things would go on precisely as before. Then it was said that the Duke's tenants were disposed to vote a particular way, and only acted up to their previous intentions; but there was direct evidence that Mr. Michelmores said, "If you don't vote so-and-so, you do not stay." So much, therefore, for the alleged free will of the voters. Nobody had accused the Duke directly of bribery or corrupt practices. But the Duke had broken the Sessional Orders of the House—the value of which no man ought to know better than himself, having been a Member of the House. That those Sessional Orders had been laughed at and utterly put aside by the Duke's stewards or agents there could be no more doubt than that he was now addressing the House. The only thing that he complained of was, that this case was brought forward alone, and that the Resolution had not been made more general, as there were many more names of Peers and Commoners of both parties which were capable of being questioned. There could be no doubt that a very large proportion of Members in that House had been returned by means which violated the rules of the House. No manner of doubt could exist that Members of the Peerage interfered with elections. The evil would go on flourishing and increasing till the House devised some very stringent means of putting it down. Hitherto, instead of being treated as a matter of shame and reproach, occurrences of the kind had been regarded as things of daily occurrence.

But now that the light of day had been thrown upon such abuses they became a reproach to the Constitution, and if the House of Commons made light of them they would become a disgrace to the country.

MR. MORRISON said, that as he first brought this matter before the House by means of a Question, he was glad that the subject had given rise to some discussion. He felt strongly that since the country had incurred the expense of issuing Election Commissions, and the humiliation in the eyes of foreign nations of dragging to light all the abuses of our electoral system, something practical ought to follow the investigation. A different spirit, he believed, animated the House now from that existing in former years, so that these Reports were no longer likely to be cast into the waste-paper basket. He bore willing testimony to the fairness with which the hon. Baronet had stated the case; he had not shrunk from accusing his own party, while substantiating the case against his opponents. But he brought forward the question distinctly as a party question. And it was well that he did so. For if a certain amount of party feeling could be raised, and each side confined itself to attacking the malpractices of its opponents, they might hope that in time those evils would be exposed and checked. The question he himself had put was not at all of a party nature—it related to the alleged embezzlement of £1,200 belonging to Colonel Dawkins. The hon. Baronet made an appeal on the ground that this was a case of high against low, of the rich man against the poor. But if the Government should be advised to take ulterior proceedings, it must be recollected that this fund of £1,200 was available for the defence. He had pointed out that at Totnes perjury and subornation of perjury had been committed, and he had mentioned the name of "Heath and others" instead of including the whole list. The hon. Baronet had taken exception to his mention of Mr. Heath's name singly. He had done so with a view of avoiding unnecessary prolixity, but he would take care on a future occasion to repeat the entire list of names, Liberal as well as Conservative. It was said there was a great difference between the position of the Duke of Somerset and of an innkeeper. That point might be granted, but there was also a considerable difference in the offences with which they were charged. The hon. Baronet was rather late with the Motion he had submitted; and it would be a mere waste of money to go to the expense of printing such documents. In matters of corrupt practices there was, unfortunately, a Statute of Limitations, which he hoped would be removed by the proposed Bribery Bill of the Government. The gravity of offences did not depend upon the penalty which the law imposed. Duelling was regarded long ago in legal contemplation as murder, and yet public opinion always condoned the offence. So it was with bribery and undue influence in the present day. There were numbers of persons, not only in the House, but throughout the country, who regarded such offences as very trivial indeed. In the North of England they well knew that it was not merely the great landowners who exercised undue influence. Manufacturers, shopkeepers, attorneys, the humblest man who felt a sufficiently warm interest in politics were all as ready as a Duke could be to exercise undue influence. He did not think an Attorney General would be well employed in prosecuting for the embezzlement of money supplied for an illegal purpose. But the question of subornation of perjury stood on very different ground, and the Commissioners in their Report insisted strongly upon the fact that they had great difficulty in obtaining information from the witnesses examined before them at Totnes—three separate cases being instanced where parties had been guilty of perjury or subornation of perjury. This was a question which juries and Judges frequently treated with leniency, but it was one which the House of Commons ought to have fairly and fully before their eyes; and therefore he proposed after Easter to bring the whole matter prominently forward. The question of the Duke of Somerset's influence seemed to lie in a nutshell. His hon. and learned friend the Member for Richmond had made a very ingenious defence for the Duke; but the long and the short of it was that the Duke having sat many years ago as Member for Totnes—which was neither better nor worse than the pocket and nomination boroughs represented, not exclusively by noblemen, on both sides of the House—had, since that time, been endeavouring to shake himself free from all evil practices in regard to the borough. No one could doubt that, who read the Report of the Royal Commission in a candid spirit. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House knew that what he was about to assert, as a dockyard Member, was strictly and literally true. The Duke of Somerset was the first chief of the Admiralty, on either side of the House, who, as far as he had been able to ascertain, had deliberately set his face against jobbing in the dockyards. As a Member for a dockyard town himself, he could state that Government influence in the dockyards was of no value now to any candidate, and he hoped that system which rendered it valueless would be continued by the present Government. He thought that circumstance ought to be mentioned to the credit of the Duke of Somerset; because he thought that if a man spent his own money and used his own influence for his friends it was not so bad as if he spent the Government money and used the Government influence. It was only by dealing with particular cases and individuals they had put down bribery and corrupting; and certainly he should attack peccant boroughs and peccant individuals whenever he had a chance.

MR. CORY said, he rose only to make one remark in consequence of the concluding observations of the hon. Member who had just sat down—that the Duke of Somerset was the first chief of the Admiralty who had set his face against jobbery in the dockyards. He had the greatest respect for the Duke of Somerset personally, and for the impartiality with which he distributed his patronage; but a more unfounded statement than that of the hon. Member had never been made in that House. He would not go further back in disproof of it than to the Administration of his right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for War. In 1858, when his right hon. Friend went to the Admiralty, a strong opinion prevailed in many quarters that promotion in the dockyards was influenced by political favouritism on the part of inferior officers. In consequence, his right hon. Friend wrote a private letter to the superintendents of the different dockyards, requesting them to control such improper influences by every means in their power, and during the whole of the fifteen months in which he continued in office he (Mr. Corry) did not believe a single appointment or promotion was made except on the recommendation of the superintendents. He could certainly say that that was the case in respect of the promotions to subordinate ranks which was at his own disposal as Secretary.

MR. MORRISON said, he had no doubt whatever of the correctness of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, and he must have been misinformed as to the Duke of Somerset having taken the initiative in the matter referred to. This circumstance only showed how unsafe it was to trust to one-sided statements.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it had been brought as a charge by the hon. Member for Bristol against the members of the Commission that they were not over fond of bringing accusations against persons in high places. He thought this was a most unfounded charge to be brought against the Commissioners for Totnes, who had done their duty, and spared no one. He agreed entirely with his Friend the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) that the evidence at Totnes had been fairly taken; and he contended that the charge made against the noble Duke by the hon. Baronet to the extent to which it was made was fairly justified by that evidence. The hon. Baronet had expressly stated that he did not charge the noble Duke with bribery or corruption, but with the manufacture of votes. The evidence of the manufacture of votes was confined to certain cases that were specified; while as to the ousting of voters, it appeared that the noble Duke was utterly ignorant that this was done on any other ground than that the voters had received bribes of a very aggravated character, and that they acknowledged having done so. Having gone through the evidence with great care, he thought it right to say that, in his opinion, there was not the smallest pretence for alleging that the Duke was in any way open to the charge of bribery and corruption in the usual sense of the terms; and as regarded the ouster of tenants, it appeared from the evidence that the Duke was not aware that they were removed for any other reason than that of their having received bribes. He believed that the proportions to which the charges were to be reduced were those to which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond had reduced them.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he would withdraw his Motion.

MIXED MARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law as related to Mixed Marriages in Ireland. The House was aware that in Ireland marriages celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest between Roman Catholic and a Protestant were by the 19 Geo. II.—the last remnant of the penal laws—declared to be null and void. He did not, however, at the present time, propose to repeal that Act, and for this reason, that the whole question of the marriage law was under investigation of a Royal Commission, and he was willing to wait for their Report. His sole object in the present Bill was to prevent what in all quarters in Ireland and in every country was pronounced to be a crying evil and an abuse. According to the statute to which he referred there would be no doubt that if a man resorted to a Roman Catholic priest, and professed to be a Roman Catholic, and if the priest, believing his statement, solemnized his marriage with a Roman Catholic woman, he could subsequently repudiate such marriage if he could show that he had professed the Protestant religion at any period within twelve months before the ceremony was performed. The marriage so contracted was legally null and void, and the issue of it would be bastards in the eye of the law, while the woman would be left destitute of support. That such a state of thing called loudly for alteration no one could doubt. But his object was simply this—that where a man already married abandoned his wife, and, professing to be a Roman Catholic, subsequently married a Roman Catholic woman, and was afterwards indicted for bigamy, he should not be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong and shelter himself under the provisions of this Act of Parliament from the responsibilities of his crime. Unfortunately, this was not a mere imaginary or sentimental grievance. From the time of the enactment of the law down to the present, repeated instances had occurred of men taking advantage of this state of the law. It would be in the recollection of hon. Gentlemen that not many years ago a gentleman, from whose rank and position better things might have been expected, relied on this Act to screen himself from the consequences of his own wrong and to ruin the woman whom in the eye of God he had made his wife, though by the law of man he was enabled to repudiate her. There was another case which occurred in Ireland in 1865, and which he believed was the last case that had occurred. A man who was a Protestant married in 1858 a Protestant woman. He deserted her, and during her life-time he made the acquaintance of a Roman Catholic girl, to whom he represented himself as a single man, and a Roman Catholic. He made the same representations to a priest, and, all the necessary forms having been observed, the marriage was solemnized in the Westland Row Catholic Church, Dublin. The matter became public, and the man was indicted for bigamy. There was no denial of the facts, but the defence of the prisoner was—and his father and brother were brought forward to prove it—that he had been born and bred a Protestant, and that within twelve months of his marriage he had taken part in the services of a Protestant place of worship. The learned Judge (Judge Keogh), who tried the case, was of opinion that notwithstanding this defence, the prisoner was not protected by the Act of Geo. II., and the jury having convicted him, he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. An appeal was however taken, and the Judges who heard the case, with great reluctance, and expressing a strong disapprobation of the existing state of the law, arrived at the conclusion that the ceremony in Westland Row Church was a nullity, and that the conviction must be reversed. The scoundrel was accordingly discharged from prison. The feelings of the Judges who reluctantly arrived at this conclusion might be gathered from the expressions used by them in pronouncing their judgment. Mr. Justice O'Hagan characterized this as the worst and most aggravated of all deceptions practised under the colour of religion. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald described the state of the criminal and the marriage law which would permit conduct like this to take place with impunity to be highly discreditable to the country. Mr. Justice O'Brien concurred in the expressions of regret as to the state of the law which relieved from punishment persons who had been guilty of such scandalous conduct. And Mr. Justice Christian, whose recent elevation to the Court of Appeal was approved of by every member of the Irish bar, said he should deeply regret the decision he was about to give, if he did not feel convinced that the Act of Parliament, which he was compelled to put in force, would not long survive that decision, inasmuch as it was high time that a statute under which such iniquitous profligacy escaped punishment, and which was a remnant of a barbarous and, happily, nearly obsolete code, should be modified or repealed. If any apology were required for his trespassing on the attention of the House, that apology would be found in these facts. The sole principle and object of his Bill was to strike a blow at this iniquity, and to show malefactors that if they resorted to this law to gratify their villany they would no longer be able to do so with impunity.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him that this question was environed with greater difficulties than the hon. Member appeared to be aware of. The question of mixed marriages had excited a great controversy in Germany, and he should be glad if the ability of the hon. and learned Gentleman could succeed in devising a remedy for the wrongs which he (Mr. Newdegate), equally with the hon. Member, reprobated. The case which the hon. Member brought forward was clearly a case of fraud; but he doubted whether the hon. Member would be able to find a remedy, as he must remind him that frauds of this kind were not confined to mixed marriages.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Marriages between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Serjeant ARMSTRONG and Mr. GOGAN.

WITNESSES (HOUSE OF COMMONS.)

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. NEATE said, he rose to call attention to the control now exercised by the Secretary to the Treasury over the allowance of expenses to witnesses before Committees of the House. He stated that he was last year Chairman of a very important Committee, and at the end of the Session his recommendation respecting the expenses of witnesses went to the Treasury in due course. A difference of opinion arose between him and the Secretary to the Treasury on this subject. A witness might be summoned, say for Thursday, and it might happen that, owing to a longer time than was expected being taken up with previous witnesses, his evidence might not be wanted on that day. As Committees of that kind usually met only twice a week, the question was whether the witness was bound to remain in town until the following Monday or Tuesday, when the Committee might sit again, or was he at liberty to go down to the country? Who was the best judge to determine that? Was it the Secretary to the Treasury or the Chairman of the Committee? It seemed to him that it should be in the first instance the Chairman of the Committee, and if the Secretary to the Treasury differed from him, the matter might come before the House of Commons represented by a tribunal composed of the Chairman of Committees, the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, and two or three other Gentlemen of experience appointed by the House. In a particular case to which he was now referring, he, as Chairman of the Committee, had made a recommendation that a witness should receive certain expenses, but the Secretary to the Treasury, by the stroke of his pen, disallowed the expenses, and cut them down to the extent of about £2 10s. That was not a satisfactory position for a Chairman of a Committee to be placed in. He concluded by moving for a Copy of his Recommendation as Chairman of the Committee on Mines, and of the reply of the Secretary to the Treasury.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That there be laid before this House, Copy of Recommendation of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Mines in the last Session to the Treasury, with reference to the expenses of Witnesses examined before that Committee.”—(Mr. Neate.)

MR. HUNT said, he was not at all sorry that his hon. Friend had brought this matter before the House, because, although it referred to a small matter, the principle involved in it was great. He ventured to submit that in taking the course which his hon. Friend complained of, he had simply been fulfilling his duty and doing that which all his predecessors had done. Only the other day he had occasion to call the attention of the House to the heavy expenses entailed upon the public by witnesses being summoned to attend before Committees on days when they could not possibly be examined, and of witnesses being paid for a number of days when they had only given one or two days' evidence. His hon. Friend was not in the House on that occasion. He regretted this because, although he did not allude to his hon. Friend particularly, the Committee over which his hon. Friend presided was, he might say without any disrespect, a great offender in the matter then alluded to. The total of expenses recommended to witnesses who were examined before the Mines Committee, even after deducting disallowances, was no less than £462. A great number of witnesses were in attendance seven days, and were only examined one day; a few were in attendance eight days, and were only examined one; one witness was in attendance ten days and was only examined four; one witness was in attendance eleven days and was only examined two; one witness was in attendance ten days and was only examined three. He thought, therefore, that in this particular Committee very small care was taken to save the public money by providing that witnesses should only be summoned for such days as they were likely to be required. The first time that the expenses in connection with the Committee on Mines were brought under his notice was upon an occasion when an application was made to him to give compensation to a gentleman who had been employed as agent to keep witnesses together, and to arrange their evidence. He was then told that the Chairman of the Committee had employed a person as agent to ascertain who would probably be the best witnesses, and to settle the time when they should be summoned, much in the same way as was done in the case of Private Bills. Upon hearing this, he said that he did not consider that the expenses given in connection with this agent should be allowed. He knew of no authority for such proceedings. If the Committee required the assistance of an agent for such a purpose the Chairman should not have appointed one, but should have applied to the House for authority to that effect, and he therefore refused to allow the expenses claimed by the agent on that account. The next time that his attention was called to the subject was when the claims were sent into the Treasury on the recommendation of the Chairman of the Committee. On that occasion the officer in the department who dealt with these things pointed out that in the case of a certain witness from Yorkshire the travelling expenses had been charged twice. He (Mr. Hunt) said that this witness could only be allowed the expenses of one journey up and one journey down. It was then suggested to him that it was possible the witness might have been summoned twice; but upon inquiry it turned out that he had never been summoned at all. Being thus led into some inquiry, he pursued the investigation a little further, and found that out of fifty-one witnesses examined before this Committee only eighteen had received summonses to attend. Had he done his strict duty he should have disallowed the expenses of all the witnesses who had not been summoned. He did not consider that every witness should be allowed expenses who merely tendered himself to the Chairman. The proper procedure would be for the Chairman to intimate to the Committee the witnesses whose evidence might be required; and should the Committee think it desirable to take their evidence summonses should be issued, and no expenses should be allowed to witnesses unless they were so summoned. Everybody knew that there were certain periods of the year when gentlemen from the country were anxious for a trip to London. These gentlemen found out that some subject was being examined before a Committee upon which they had some knowledge. They came into the Committee-room, sat down, and wrote upon a slip of paper to the Chairman that they were from such and such a place, and could give important evidence. Thus if this practice were encouraged, every person who could induce a good-natured Chairman to call him as a witness might get his expenses paid to and from London. Had he therefore, as he already remarked, acted strictly in this instance, he should have disallowed the expenses of all witnesses except those summoned in accordance with the recommendation of the Chairman. What was done in the case referred to was this:—the gentleman employed as agent for keeping the witnesses together took into his own hands the work of getting these persons to appear; and, although the Chairman did not sign their summonses, a claim was sent into the Treasury for their expenses. He went through the claims of these persons and disallowed such as he thought were irregular. The question raised by the hon. Member for the city of Oxford had been on more than one occasion inquired into by Committees of the House. In 1841 it appeared, from the inquiry then instituted, that the Treasury had always exercised a control over these expenses. An officer of the House, in the course of his evidence, distinctly stated that the only effect of the signature of the Chairman to the accounts of expenses was to give the Treasury jurisdiction in the matter and to transfer it into their hands. An officer from the Treasury was examined before another Committee in 1840, and he stated that he could see no advantage that would result from having the expenses of witnesses paid by an officer of the House of Commons, and that the check exercised by the Treasury afforded better security against abuse. That Committee reported upon the subject, placing no limitation upon the Treasury in dealing with the expenses of witnesses, but urging that the expenses should be curtailed by the Chairman of Committees. In 1848 the Committee on Miscellaneous Expenditure again recognised the control of the Treasury. It would thus be seen that the control of the Treasury in these matters had been recognised by the House, and that the House had never objected to the exercise of that control. He thought, therefore, that in the case now submitted to the House he had acted strictly in accordance with the practice of his predecessors. His hon. Friend stated, that upon remonstrance, the Treasury had allowed one guinea more to the witness whose second travelling expenses had been disallowed. That guinea had not, however, been allowed in order to meet his hon. Friend half-way; but because, upon further scrutiny, it turned out that the witness might have justly claimed for another day's attendance. He hoped that the effect of bringing this question before the House would be to induce Chairmen of Committees to pay greater attention to the matter than they had been in the habit of doing. He would suggest that Chairmen should in no case send in a recommendation allowing expenses to witnesses unless they had been summoned. It was not right that persons coming to London should volunteer their evidence and then claim their expenses. Unless, then, the House should think fit to express an opinion to the contrary, he should continue the practice he had pursued since he had been at the Treasury, and endeavour to protect the public against exorbitant charges made in connection with witnesses before Select Committees.

MR. HADFIELD said, that if witnesses were sent for, either by summons or by invitation, their reasonable expenses ought to be paid. The allowance for witnesses was very small, and when sent for from a great distance, such as Edinburgh, there was necessarily some delay, because they must be in attendance when called.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to correct a misapprehension that the expenses of professional witnesses only were paid, since there was a special scale per diem allowed for tradesmen, mechanics, and others who might be summoned, and recommended by the Chairman to receive remuneration. The hon. Member for Oxford suggested that a Committee should be appointed to act as arbitrators when the Chairman of a Select Committee recommended a certain payment which was dissented from by the Treasury. He did not think that the appointment of such a Committee would effect any good. The amounts to be allowed per day had been laid down, and so far an established rule worked well; but the number of days that a witness need be detained in order to give his evidence must always be a matter of discretion with the Chairman of the Committee, who should make it a point to arrange business so that witnesses should be detained as short a time as possible. The best plan would be for the Chairman of the Select Committee to carefully consider the question and take care that no witness should be detained in town a day longer than was absolutely necessary. A Return of the payments made to witnesses summoned by the Select Committee on Trade in Animals showed how much could be done by the Chairman of a Committee, in the making of arrangements; for, although there were witnesses from all parts — even from the Continent — they were not detained more than three days, except one from Ireland, who was detained six days. The Chairman of a Committee was not absolute; his recommendation was liable to check by the Treasury; and it was not necessary to check the economy of the Treasury, because it was easier for the Secretary of the Treasury to be good-natured, and to consent to any recommendation submitted to him, than to put himself in the invidious position of refusing to accede to it. The only effect of appointing a Committee of arbitration would be that the Secretary of the Treasury would feel that if he put himself in the disagreeable position of refusing to sanction proposed expenditure his opinion might be overruled by that Committee, and he would incur the odium of the refusal without obtaining the result of promoting economy. There was sufficient check at present, for if the claim of a witness was excessive the Chairman of the Committee could refuse to recommend it, the Secretary of the Treasury could refuse to allow it, and if he erred in being too stingy or too liberal the last resort was an appeal to the House.

MR. NEATE said, he would withdraw his Motion.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. HUNT said, that in the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on his behalf he had to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the more effectual prevention of corrupt practices and undue influence at Parliamentary Elections.

MR. DENMAN: Surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give the House some information as to what kind of a Bill it is to be. It is a matter in which we all take a great deal of interest; it is of the utmost importance that the House should have some information of the principle on which we are about to legislate on this subject.

MR. HUNT: On a previous occasion my right hon. Friend stated to the House the nature of the provisions of the Bill he intended to introduce.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: There is no discourtesy intended. On the occasion on which my right hon. Friend stated the provisions of the Bill for the amendment of the Representation of the People, but before the scope of it was finally settled, he described as a portion of it certain clauses he proposed to insert with reference to the subject of bribery and corruption at elections. He then stated generally the nature of the provisions he intended to include. Subsequently that Bill was abandoned, and on a later occasion my right hon. Friend introduced the measure which is now before the House. In doing so, he omitted the clauses with regard to bribery; and stated that, though it was his intention to proceed with the scheme mentioned in his first speech, he thought it would be more convenient to make it the subject of a separate Bill to be passed pari passu with the Reform Bill. The other night my right hon. Friend said that he should be prepared to bring forward such a Bill on Thursday next. A wish, however, having been expressed by the House that the Committee on the Reform Bill might be the first Order of the Day on Thursday, at a late hour last evening my right hon. Friend proposed that the second reading of this Bill should be made the second Order on that day, in order that it might not stand in the way of the House proceeding with the Reform Bill. The general provisions of the Bill have been already described by my right hon. Friend. He has just been obliged to leave the House on other business; but he hopes that there will be no objection on the part of the House to the introduction of the Bill, the second reading of which will, if such is the pleasure of the House, be fixed for Thursday. It will then rest at the option of the House to discuss it, after going out of Committee on the Reform Bill, if so disposed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the more effectual prevention of corrupt practices and undue influence at Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 119.]

OFFICES AND OATHS BILL—[BILL 7.]
(Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Cogan, Sir J. Gray.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble.

On Question that the Preamble be post-poned,

MR. WHALLEY said, he must dispute the correctness of the words constituting the preamble of this Bill which, he submitted to the Committee, were untrue in themselves, and were contradicted by the whole course of our legislation. It was not merely on account of religious belief that special provisions were made excluding Roman Catholics from holding the offices of Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland; but it was because that religious belief was nothing but the outward and visible sign of what might be called a confederacy on the part of certain persons assuming ecclesiastical power and authority to obtain money and to secure influence all over the globe, under the pretence of affording spiritual consolation to those persons who should submit themselves to them. The point to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee was, that the admission of those persons to a seat in that House was distinctly coupled with restrictions which one by one and piecemeal were sought to be removed. So far as the Roman Catholic hierarchy were bound by the principles of honour they were bound to accept the Emancipation Act with all its conditions and restrictions; and it was contrary to the spirit of legislation for the past two centuries that these should be swept away one by one. If this were necessary why should not a general Act be passed at once for the purpose. But if this were deemed expedient then our ancestors, from the time of Charles I. and of William III. downwards, must have been under a delusion. When this Bill was first introduced, he stated, and read authorities for his statement, that the Roman Catholic hierarchy were at this moment before the country as organizers of rebellion, and that they had been so since 1862, and he was then called to order, though it was now admitted that that was from a misapprehension. When he last spoke on this subject he was called to order by the Speaker, on the ground that he ought not to say anything offensive to the feelings of Gentlemen professing the Roman Catholic religion; and if the same rule should now be laid down by the Chairman of the Committee, he would return to his house, and remain there until he received a letter from the Speaker, informing him that he had somewhat misunderstood the extent of the restriction imposed on him. It would be impossible for a Member of Parliament to perform his duty efficiently if he were to be restricted in the statement of his earnest convictions, the expression of which should not be offensive to Gentlemen of the Roman Catholic religion, who sat in that House in their legislative capacity, and not as members of the Roman Catholic faith. It was at one time considered offensive to Roman Catholics to say that the earth moved round the sun, and he believed that that statement would still be offensive to Dr. Cullen. He could not therefore consent to hold a seat in that House unless he might have the opportunity of exercising his right of speech in matters which affected the national welfare; and on that ground he had felt it his duty to call upon his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) to answer the statements he (Mr. Whalley) had before made. He had read extracts from the speeches and sentiments of various persons in high authority among the Roman Catholics, including at least one Bishop, declaring that the only reason why they did not come forward and declare their countenance of the Fenian conspiracy was that the proper time had not come, because this country was not at war, because England's time of difficulty had not yet arrived; but that when it did the case would assume a different aspect. The Fenian conspiracy, of which they heard so much, was nothing but the continuation of that long succession—more certain than any apostolic succession—that succession of rebellions in Ireland since 1641, which were the natural result of the doctrines which from Sunday to Sunday were inculcated by the agents of the Roman Catholic Church respecting the “heretics” among whom they lived, and the heretical Government of which they were subjects. The matter he supposed would be treated with the usual contempt, although he had expected that, on the second reading of the Bill, some reply to what he had stated would have been attempted. Instead of treating his statements and arguments with levity it would be much better to answer them; but they were not answered because they did not admit of an answer. He would give a further intimation upon that subject. He believed that the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy were endeavouring to maintain the Fenian conspiracy.

MR. ESMONDE said, he rose to order. The Question before them was, whether the Preamble of the Bill should be postponed; and he would put it to the Chairman whether the hon. Gentleman was speaking to that Question?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question before them was, whether the Preamble of a Bill for removing certain religious disabilities should be postponed? and that question opened the general character of that measure.

MR. WHALLEY: The Fenian conspiracy was at present discountenanced by the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood, because it had for the moment served its turn. But it was still retained, and was not openly countenanced solely because that difficulty of England which was to be Ireland's opportunity had not yet arisen. In confirmation of that view he would ask the permission of the House to read a document with respect to the authenticity of which he hoped the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland would afford facilities for proving, in the inquiry with reference to the proceedings of Mr. Justice Keogh. The document had been published in the newspapers of Canada and also in this country, and it naturally excited feelings of apprehension on the part of Protestants or Orangemen living in the midst of Roman Catholics. That document was the following oath which was said to be administered to the Fenian conspiracy:—

“I swear by the Almighty God, by all in Heaven and upon earth, by the blessed and holy Prayer Book of my holy Church, by the blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, by her sorrows and groanings at the foot of the cross, by her tears and wailings, by the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, by the glorious apostle of Ireland, St. Patrick,”—

(this is the person to whom Dr. Manning alluded, at least I believe it is the same)—

“by the blessed and adorable Host, by our blessed and holy Church in all ages, and by our holy national martyrs, to fight on the Irish soil for the independence of Ireland until I wade up to the knees in the red gore of the Saxon tyrants and murderers, for the glorious cause of nationality, and to fight until there is not a single vestige, track, or footstep left to tell that the holy soil of Ireland was trodden by the Saxon robbers and murderers; and, moreover, when the English Protestant robbers and brutes in Ireland”—

(it was published in Canada, and in England, and he had fair reason to believe that it was an oath that had been extensively taken)—

“shall be exterminated or driven into the sea like the swine Christ caused to be drowned, we shall then embark and take England and root out every vestige of the cursed brood of the adulterer and murderer, Henry the Eighth, and possess ourselves of the treasures of the beast that has so long kept our island of saints, Old Ireland, in the chains of bondage, and driven us from her genial shores exiles to a foreign land;”—

then came this passage, which he asked the noble Lord to include in the evidence in the inquiry about to take place—

“and I will wade in the blood of all Orangemen and heretics who do not join us and become one of ourselves. Scotland having had her blood shed by the Beast, we shall leave her in her gore. To all this I swear with my eyes blindfolded, not knowing who to me administers this oath.”

He would leave it to the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare to decide whether he should by anticipation notice that oath, while he was asking them by his Bill to remove restrictions which had been deliberately adopted by Parliament, and which had been accepted by that very power which he represented.

Motion, “That the Preamble be postponed,” agreed to.

Clause 1 (All the Queen's subjects, without reference to their Religious Belief, shall be eligible to hold the Offices of Lord Chancellor or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland).

MR. CANDLISH said, he rose to move the omission from the clause of those words which related to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In doing this, he felt that he was separating himself from his party, and he entered very unwillingly into the discussion of questions of that description; but he proposed his Amendment for a variety of reasons, one of which was, that in his opinion every argument which would tend to throw open the Vice-regal office to a Roman Catholic would necessarily and irresistibly lead to the opening of the office of monarch of this country.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 2 and 3, to leave out the words "and the office of Lord Lieutenant, Lord Deputy, Lord Justice, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland."—(Mr. Candlish.)

MR. SCHREIBER: I rise, Sir, to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland. When this Bill was last before the House, an hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck), whom I do not now see in his place, but to whom I am indebted for much good advice on that occasion, spoke of the pain with which he always listened to discussions of this nature. But he forgot to add—and I may be permitted to remind the Committee—that the defenders of the status in quo can by no figure of speech be said to originate these debates; and as to the pain which they occasion, hon. Gentlemen opposite must not suppose that they have any monopoly of that. If I may judge, Sir, from my own feelings, these discussions are at least as painful to Members on this side as on that. But this is a case in which there is a principle to be defended, and a duty to be done, and which leaves no room for the consideration of what is personally agreeable or the opposite. I therefore think, Sir, we might very well be spared those indiscriminate charges of bigotry and intolerance which (permit me to say) furnish such a curious commentary on some people's enlightenment. Now, I think that I shall state the case correctly if I say that the argument of the supporters of this Bill proceed on this wise. They take, for example, the office of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and divest it of all its other incidents and attributes. They then proclaim it to possess a purely civil and judicial character, and as such to be fairly open to the just ambition of the Roman Catholic. Indeed, they contend that it is only proceeding in the spirit of the Act of 1829 so to open it. And I will frankly admit that if they could establish their position, it might be extremely difficult to resist these claims. Accordingly, to suit this train of argument we have lately been favoured by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition with a new and startling theory of the office of Lord Lieutenant. We are told that he is "a mere wheel in the Executive machine, receiving his impulse from an official, who may be a Roman Catholic." Is that a description, Sir, which exhausts the attributes of the Lord Lieutenant's office? Has he no representative position? I always thought he was, in an especial manner, the direct representative of the Sovereign in Ireland; that as such he held Courts, and conferred knighthood, and was prayed for in the Churches, and wielded the prerogative of mercy, and exercised a special supervision over the Irish branch of that United Church of England and Ireland, of which the Sovereign is the head. What other officer in the United Kingdom so distinctly exercises Viceregal functions? And then, Sir, as to the statement that he receives his orders from the Home Secretary, who may be a Roman Catholic, it would be more accurate, and more in accordance with the theory of the Constitution, to say that the Home Secretary, who may be a Roman Catholic, transmits the orders of the Sovereign, who must be a Protestant. The orders are not his own, they are merely transmitted through him from the Sovereign to the Sovereign's representative. It is then, Sir, on the connection of the Lord Chancellor with the Lord Lieutenant, and of the Lord Lieutenant with the Crown, that I, for one, rest my objection to this clause; and I conceive that considerations of a similar nature were present to the mind of the author of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, who, wishing to guard the principle of the Protestant succession to the Throne, drew those lines around it which it is now sought to remove—leaving the Lord Chancellor of England and the Sovereign isolated in the necessary profession of their Protestantism. Passages abound, Sir, in the speeches of the late Sir Robert Peel, showing that he ascribed to the Roman Catholic system—viewed in its relation to civil society—a special aptitude for encroachment and aggression, and a singular impatience of equality, which induced him, by way of precaution, to lay upon it those restrictions—I suppose, Sir, I must not call them "weights"—of which it is now sought to get rid. And when I make that statement of an historical fact, how am I met? It is not contradicted, for it cannot be; but the hon. and learned Gentleman, whose absence I again regret, meets me with a question of this kind, "Was that the position in which the hon. Member for Cheltenham considered himself in reference to the Roman Catholic? Did he want the Roman Catholic to be weighted because he was a better man than himself?" That is a question which I shall answer with another, going more directly to the point. "Was that the position in which Sir Robert Peel considered himself in reference to the Roman Catholic? Did Sir Robert Peel want the Roman Catholic to be weighted because he was a better man than himself?" The idea, Sir, is preposterous. Sir Robert Peel was dealing with a system viewed in its relation to civil society, and it never entered his mind to institute personal comparisons, which least of all men he need have feared. Sir, he feared the system and took the precautions which I have described. Those precautions I believe to have been wise. As such they are regarded by the great body of the people of this country. As such I have ventured to defend them with my voice, and as such I shall support them by my vote. But do the events of recent years lend any colour to these views? Why, what has occurred, Sir, even in the present Session? The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas) no sooner announced his readiness, upon a late occasion, to yield in the matter of the Lord Chancellor, than up rose the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and "trumped" him with the Lord Lieutenant. And in the same manner, if my noble Friend had "led" the English Chancellor, the right hon. Gentleman, I presume, would have had no option but to play "his Queen." And all the while, Sir, arbiter pugnæ, there sits the hon. and learned Baronet watching the game in which, whoever else may lose, he and his friends can hardly fail to win. But the people of this country—the Protestant people of this country—are no party, Sir, to these transactions. They view with repugnance and alarm concessions of which they understand neither the motive or the necessity; and further concessions will assuredly give rise to a loud and angry protest on their part. And even now, Sir, I sometimes think that we may hear the first mutterings of the storm. Be that as it may, we are going to enfranchise the Members of a class which views these encroachments with peculiar jealousy, and who, with that vigorous one-sidedness which is at once the forte and foible of their character, are certain to make short work of Motions of this kind and their authors. I therefore am convinced, Sir, that Roman Catholic gentlemen, fortunati nimium sua si bona norint, fortunate as the subjects of a Protestant Sovereign and the citizens of a free country, would do well to pause before it is too late, and to accept the Act of 1829 as a settlement to be respected and maintained. When this question, Sir, was last before the House, many of Her Majesty's Ministers were unavoidably absent. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Absent in attendance, I believe, upon the Sovereign; but I hope that we shall now receive from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer an explicit statement of their policy—a statement which shall leave no doubt that it is a policy Conservative of the Protestant Constitution of this country.

Mr. MONSELL said, he would venture to suggest that both the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House upon this question had mistaken the principles of the Constitution of this country, which were not founded upon the idea of excluding any person from the councils of the Sovereign, or from office, on account of religious opinions. If he recollected rightly, it was Lord Bacon who contrasted the citizenship in this country with the citizenship of the Roman Empire, showing that while in the latter there were various forms of citizenship, that privilege in our own country was complete and entire; and that everybody, unless there were some special reason to the contrary, was eligible for office under the Crown. The adoption of a contrary opinion would be not only an abridgment of the right of the subject but also an abridgment of the prerogative of the Crown—for it was the undoubted prerogative of Her Majesty to select for the performance of public duties such persons as she might think fit. He felt convinced that the two hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the Committee had not adduced a single reason in proof of the assertion that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ought not to be a Roman Catholic, or to show that any danger would arise from such a selection being made. The hon. Member who commenced the discussion had stated that this would be a step towards getting rid of the Protestant succession; but the Protestant succession rested upon the principle that the majority of the people of the United Kingdom were Protestants; consequently, the arguments of the hon. Gentleman—if they possessed any force at all—would go far to show that Ireland, being a Roman Catholic country, ought to have a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant as her Governor. He begged the Committee to remember that the question they were discussing was a serious one. It was the one referred to in the preamble of the Bill—that of religious equality; and without that religious equality the people of Ireland never would be satisfied. As long as there was a distinction made between the majority and the minority of the people of Ireland to the disadvantage of the majority, so long would there be discontent in that country. Discontent would produce its legitimate and illegitimate results, and would lead people who were otherwise loyal to act in a manner in which unfortunately too many persons in Ireland were now acting with regard to the Constitution of this country. He could only express his deep conviction that there never would be thorough peace in Ireland until complete religious equality had been established in that country; while if, on the other hand, they established that equality, loyalty and order would prevail among a people who, as a rule, were more strongly inclined than most other people were to pay respect to authority.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I do not know, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick is aware of the extent to which his argument may be carried. He states, that the only reason why the monarchy of this country is Protestant is that the majority of the people are Protestants, and that it is by their will of the hour that the monarchy is Protestant. He seemed to justify the retention of the Protestant character of the monarchy of this country on that ground, and to remain satisfied with it. But then the right hon. Gentleman turns to Ireland, and, speaking as if with authority, said that the people of Ireland are Roman Catholics, and that unless complete religious equality was established in that country they would never be satisfied. I am quite aware that the Roman Catholic Members from Ireland have unanimously adopted that opinion under the instructions they have received; because, Sir, we have recently seen in the Roman Catholic papers an authoritative letter from Dr. Moriarty, who claims, legally or illegally, to be called Bishop of Kerry, setting forth that view. He has no right to the title by law; but he assumes it, and he has stated the argument which has met with the approval of Gentlemen opposite. I fully admit that Cardinal Legate Cullen and all the prelates and priests who are under his authority hold that doctrine with respect to Ireland. And what does it lead to? It leads to this—that Ireland is to be governed upon principles different from those on which England is governed. Now, one of the most distinguished Irishmen of modern times, one who commanded largely the support of his countrymen, held that opinion. That is the opinion which was held by the late Mr. O'Connell, who throughout his life agitated for the repeal of the Union, and consistently; for unless the same principles of Government are to prevail in Ireland as those which prevail in England and Scotland, the Union is an abuse. Mr. O'Connell, in his repeated declarations against the Union, was consistent; and the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick goes directly to this, that the Union ought to be repealed. The right hon. Gentleman was also pleased to say that it was an undue limitation of the prerogative of the Crown that any person whom the Crown might nominate or wish to nominate to an office should be excluded by law on account of his religious belief. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that the prerogative of the Crown is limited by the Act of Settlement and by other laws of this country. He seems to have forgotten that since the year 1688, if not before, but certainly since the Revolution, it is provided that the Crown of this country shall be held upon certain conditions, defined by law, which were first embodied in the Bill of Rights, and then with the Bill of Rights were embodied in the Act of Settlement, and that by the Act of Settlement the Crown is limited to the descendants of the Electress Sophia of Hanover, being Protestants. The right hon. Gentleman has been pleased to give his own definition of the prerogative of the Crown; and there is an exact authority for the definition he has given which I hold in my hand. It is the Declaration which James II. issued. I have that Declaration here, and with the permission of the House I will read the substance of it. The right hon. Gentleman will then see how precisely he has enunciated the very principles for attempting to enforce which James II., with his descendants, was expelled from the Throne of these realms. The pith of the Declaration is contained in these extracts—

“We cannot but heartily wish, as it will easily be believed, that the people of our dominions were members of the Catholic Church.”

And that I have no doubt is the wish of the right hon. Gentleman.

“We humbly thank Almighty God it is, and long time has been, our constant sense and opinion, which upon divers occasions we have declared, that conscience ought not to be constrained, nor people forced in matters of religion. It has ever been directly contrary to our inclination, as we think it is to the interests of Government, which it destroys by spoiling trade, depopulating countries, and discouraging strangers; and, finally, that it never obtained the end for which it was employed, &c. We therefore, out of our princely care and affection unto all our loving subjects, that they may live at ease and quiet, and for the increase of trade and the encouragement of strangers, have thought fit, by virtue of our Royal prerogative, to issue forth this declaration of indulgence, making no doubt of the concurrence of our two Houses of Parliament, when we shall think it convenient for them to meet, &c. And, forasmuch as we are desirous to have the benefit of the service of all our loving subjects, which by the law of nature is inseparably annexed to and inherent in our Royal person, and that none of our subjects may for the future be under any discouragement or disability, who are otherwise well inclined and fit to serve us, by reason of some oaths and tests, that have usually been administered on such occasions, we do hereby further declare that it is our Royal will and pleasure that the oaths commonly called the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and also the several tests and declarations mentioned in Acts of Parliament made in the 25th and 30th years of the reign of our late Royal brother, Charles II.”—

These are the very tests we are now called upon to deal with—

“shall not hereafter at any time be required to be taken or subscribed by any person or persons whatsoever, who is or shall be employed in any office or place of trust, either civil or military, under us or in our Government; and we do further declare it to be our pleasure and intention from time to time hereafter to grant our Royal dispensation, under our Great Seal, to all our loyal subjects so to be employed, who shall not take the said oaths or subscribe or declare the tests or declarations in the above-mentioned Acts and every of them.”

Now, Sir, it was for issuing that declaration, which the Bishops refused to have read in the churches; it was because James II. sought to thrust these principles upon the people of the United Kingdom, that the House of Stuart was deposed and banished the country. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has been so outspoken, because he has been labouring for years among the oaths and declarations required by the Constitution of this country, to which he has now pronounced his emphatic hostility. He has declared emphatically that Ireland will never be satisfied, and that the inducements to revolt and rebellion never will cease, until the English people abandon the Protestant Constitution under which they live—that Protestant Constitution which they established by a revolution; that Protestant Constitution which secured their liberties; that Protestant Constitution which, I believe, they are prepared to defend. Sir, it is very fortunate that we have at last an explicit declaration upon this subject. I admit, to the right hon. Gentleman, that there are as many circumstances at the present time which might induce the House to consider whether it would not be advantageous to repeal the Union and govern Ireland upon different principles to those which are applied in England. Look at the existing state of things. The Habeas Corpus Act is suspended in Ireland. If we are to govern Ireland upon the principles of James II. we have it upon the authority of Mr. Hallam that the object of that monarch was to get rid of the Test Act and the oaths, because they prevented the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church, and also to get rid of the Habeas Corpus Act, because he held that that Act limited the absolute sovereignty, which he desired to establish. The sovereignty being absolute would exactly coincide with the prerogative the right hon. Gentleman wishes to establish, and of which he says the laws he now proposes to abolish are an infraction. Strange to say the right hon. Gentleman and the Liberal party have for years past been proceeding upon the policy of James II. Why, during the reign of James II. many of the ultra-Nonconformists hailed his adoption of that policy, for they believed that under his notion of religious equality they were to enjoy perfect freedom, but the King and his advisers knew better than that. They held out to the Dissenters and Liberals of that day the repeal of the Tests Acts; but they took care to keep in the background the fact that they meant also to abolish the rights and the freedom which the people enjoyed under the Habeas Corpus Act. They did not inform the people of this, until near the close of the unhappy reign of James II., when he showed clearly that he meant to govern absolutely, and without Parliament. It is said if the Union was repealed, that it would be difficult to re-establish the Irish Parliament; but, according to the principles enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick, Ireland ought to be governed without any Parliament at all. In other words, as the hon. Member for Clare hinted the other day, Ireland ought to be governed as a dependency. But since I pointed out where these principles would lead them, his supporters have cooled in their enunciation, if not in admiration of them; but, basing my argument upon the principles of your legislation, and the speech made by so influential a Member from Ireland as the right hon. Gentleman, I have a perfect right to show you the direction in which you are tending. It is well known that the establishment or ascendancy of the Roman Catholic Church is everywhere adverse to free and Constitutional Government. Take the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion, and with it you take absolute government. Have the events even of recent times been swept from your memory. Have you forgotten that the Jesuits in Naples professed openly to the late King—not the exiled King, but his father—that their order was devoted to the establishment of absolute government? It is a well-known fact. It is contained in a document, which has been published—a thing that is seldom done in such cases. There was a slight difference between the late King of Naples, the father of the present deposed King, and the Jesuit Order; and the latter published—as I observed they rarely do—a document, in which they professed their adhesion to the Neapolitan dynasty, because it was an absolute government. You cannot deny that these principles—the principles that have been enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman—the principle of throwing open all offices indiscriminately to persons of every and any creed, and the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church, which the right hon. Gentleman avowedly seeks on every occasion, involve the establishment of absolute government; and if you wish that Ireland should be governed as a dependency, perhaps you may be gratified by a repeal of the Union, and by seeing Ireland governed as a dependency. Desiring to preserve to you not less than to ourselves the Constitutional freedom which we rejoice to have extended to our fellow-countrymen, I cannot obliterate from my mind all the warnings of history. I and those with whom I act refuse to abandon the securities provided by the Constitution under which we live, and the laws which give it force. Say what you will, you cannot change the nature of a religion. The Protestant religion tends to freedom—the Roman Catholic religion tends to absolute government. And not even at your own request, prompted by those who seek to establish in Ireland the domination of a foreign Power, not even at your own request will I consent to sacrifice, at the dictation of the misguided zeal by which you are directed, the liberties that you now enjoy, and which the proposal before the House tends to endanger.

MR. PIM said, that not long since a Bill was passed in that House for the Confederation of the North-American provinces, but no one thought of proposing any restriction on the religion of the representative of the Sovereign in Canada. And yet what difference was there between Ireland and Canada, except that Ireland was nearer? There was a very large Roman Catholic population in Canada. Lower Canada was chiefly Roman Catholic, but no restriction had been made upon the religion of the Viceroy. If the restriction was needful in Ireland, surely it ought to have been carried out in Canada. He wished to put it to the Scotch representatives in that House what would be the feelings of the people of Scotland if a representative of the Queen were living in the old palace at Holyrood, and the law provided that that representative should not be a presbyterian? If those hon. Gentlemen who represented Scotland would for a moment reflect upon that point, and would take into consideration the propriety of acting towards others as they would wish to be done by, they could have no hesitation in voting in favour of the present Bill. He must express his surprise that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire should have taken exception to the remark of the right hon. Member for Limerick, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland would not cease to agitate for perfect equality. Three-fourths of the people of Ireland were Roman Catholics, and though he was as thorough a Protestant as any man in that House, he thoroughly sympathized with and felt the justice of their agitating upon this question. If Members of the Protestant Faith constituted three-quarters of the population of Ireland, and were situated as the Roman Catholics in that country were, would they not, he would ask, think that they were acting in a manner derogatory to their dignity as men if they did not, so long as they believed there was a chance of attaining their object, agitate for a change analogous to that which was now proposed? It had been suggested that the Act of Settlement was imperilled by this measure; but he could no more imagine the possibility of a Roman Catholic Sovereign of England than he could imagine the possibility of a Protestant Emperor of France. In each country the Faith of the Sovereign would be determined by that of the great majority of the population. If they were settling this question he urged them to settle it entirely, and not leave behind one disability to remind the Irish people of the whole series of disabilities which had existed 100 years ago.

MR. VANCE said, that he must regard the proposal under discussion as a new chapter in the history of Papal aggression. Sir Robert Peel, before he became a convert to the expediency of granting a Roman Catholic emancipation, prophesied that if such a measure were to pass, there would be a number of Roman Catholic Members in that House who would act together as one man, and who, holding the balance between the two opposing parties, would be able in time of difficulty, as it were, to control both. An instance of the correctness of that prophecy was, he believed, furnished on the present occasion. Nobody would some time ago have foretold that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have consented to give up so completely the Irish Lord Chancellor, or that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would have bid higher still by giving up the Lord Lieutenant. Let the Committee reflect on some of the minor consequences of what they were asked to accede to. It was distinctly provided by the Act of 1829 that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should not be a Roman Catholic, and the office was in every respect a Protestant office. The Lord Lieutenant, as a Protestant, attended the Chapel Royal each Sunday. Was it to be turned into a Roman Catholic chapel if a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant were appointed, as would no doubt be the case, to conciliate the support of the small party who held the balance of power between the rival parties? The Lord Lieutenant had attached to him a dean, sub-dean, and thirty-six chaplains, and he should like to know, in the event he had described, what religion the dean, sub-dean, and thirty-six chaplains were to profess? The Lord Lieutenant had considerable ecclesiastical patronage. By what tribunal was it to be exercised if the holder of the office were a Roman Catholic? The fact was, that if it were enacted that the Lord Lieutenant might belong to the Roman Catholic persuasion, the whole office must be re-cast. The Committee, he might add, was asked to proceed on a most dangerous course. The other evening certain Roman Catholic Members proposed and supported a Bill for the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, but others, more wary, opposed it, because they saw that it affected England as well as Ireland, and they feared that the attention of English Protestants might be directed to projects which had lately been brought before the House, and that public indignation would be roused so as to render their success impossible. The precedent which would be established by permitting a Roman Catholic to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, would soon be insisted on in England to the extent of a person of that persuasion being held eligible for the Crown of Great Britain, and so the Act of Settlement would soon be set aside.

MR. SYNAN said, that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, practically, according to his own arguments, appeared to be the only Member of that House who advocated the repeal of the Union between England and Ireland.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. Member has totally misrepresented me. I opposed principles which I believe would lead to a repeal of the Union.

MR. SYNAN said, he considered that the most successful agitators for a repeal of the Union were those who opposed the application of the principles of civil and religious liberty and the establishment of perfect religious equality amongst all Her Majesty's subjects. The hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) opposed the Bill because it would lead, as he thought, to a repeal of the Act of Succession; but in no respect was the Lord Lieutenant included in, or affected by, the Act of Succession. The hon. Member further said he feared that the Lord Lieutenant's chaplains would become Roman Catholics, but that was no argument against the Bill. The measure was founded upon the principle of the establishment of perfect, civil, and religious equality in Ireland, and he thought it would commend itself to the common sense and justice of every Member of that House.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the hon. Member for Dublin had invited the opinion of a Scotch Member, and he would candidly give it to him. The Scotch Members did not come there asking for a Lord Lieutenant for Scotland; they did not want such an officer. The people of Scotland were too economical and would not sanction such waste. That House had twice voted that the office of the Viceroy of Ireland should be dispensed with; and the late Duke of Wellington, in one of the last speeches which he made, prevented that consummation from being attained, asking with whom the Home Secretary could communicate on Irish affairs in the event of the withdrawal of the Lord Lieutenant, and whether he was to do so with the Lord Mayor of Dublin or with the Mayor of Kilkenny, who was at that time in gaol for rebellion. If the Lord Lieutenant were to go away altogether from Ireland and take his thirty-six chaplains with him, there would be an end to the question now before them.

MR. GOSCHEN said, there were two things which ought to take place before they went to a division—the one was that hon. Gentlemen opposite should allow one English Member on the Liberal side of the House to speak on that question; and the other was that time should be given to the Government to pronounce their opinion upon it. It would, he thought, be very unfair towards the Irish Members to go to a division before they had heard the views of the Government; and, on the other hand, the Liberal party ought not to leave the conduct of the debate entirely to the Irish Members. The Motion of the hon. Baronet ought to be accepted and indorsed by the Liberal party, which had gained many victories in the cause of civil and religious liberty in conjunction with the Irish Members, whom, he was sure, that party would not desert when such an issue was raised. He was sorry that the Amendment had proceeded from his side of the House. He knew there was some truth in what was urged by certain hon. Members opposite—namely, that there was a large body in this country who viewed with some alarm these aggressive Motions, as they termed them. But if there was one duty which seemed to him more incumbent than another in these cases upon English Members of Parliament, it was to speak plainly to their constituents if they put pressure upon them on subjects of that kind. [An hon. MEMBER: There is no pressure.] He said there were many constituencies which were alarmed at Motions like the present; and hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered him when he made use of that expression; and the Members for such constituencies ought to tell those whom they represented that they had to deal, not only with questions affecting England, which was Protestant, but with questions affecting Ireland, which was Roman Catholic; that, however much their constituents might be opposed to Popery, “No Popery” could not be the cry for a country where four-fifths of the people were Roman Catholics. How was it possible for Parliament to govern Ireland satisfactorily if the views of that class of Protestants were to be enforced upon that country? He would ask the House whether any real danger had been pointed out as likely to arise to Ireland from the appointment, even if it were made, of a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant for that country? Hon. Gentlemen opposite confined themselves to going back to the Act of Settlement and the reign of James II., as if it was not because what had been done had not been done completely that they had failed to satisfy Ireland and had left her as discontented as she was unhappily seen to be. For these reasons it seemed to him the last vestiges of religious disability ought now to be swept away. They knew what was the matter with Ireland—that it was outraged national sentiment to a great extent. If so small a Bill as that would soften existing asperities in any degree, the Liberal party would do well to support it; and he had some confidence, after the course they had taken on the second reading, that the Government would share in the views he had expressed.

MR. KER said, he wished to call the attention of the House to this fact, that Ireland was not altogether a Roman Catholic country, for there was a numerous body of people there who were essentially Protestant; and even if they were small in number their views and feelings should not be ignored in that House.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he at first thought that it would have been better for his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and to have allowed the question of the Lord Lieutenant to remain for future discussion; but he now thought that the time had arrived when such discussions should terminate in that House, and that the name of Roman Catholic disabilities should never again be heard within those walls. When his countrymen looked for a redress of their grievances to the Imperial Parliament, it was a sad and embarrassing reflection that, owing to the effects of misgovernment, British troops were now again pursuing the footsteps of Irish armed insurrectionists. But to the present hour—and the best working half of the Session was drawing to its close—not the slightest remedy or palliation for the evils afflicting that unfortunate country had been applied. He regarded the present measure as an insignificant one; but it was, perhaps, as large a measure as was within the scope of a private Member. Larger measures must originate with the Government. But up to this time no proposal had been made, except a proposal for the continuation of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and one for the permanent fortification of the police barracks in that country. When they considered how few Lord Lieutenants could be Roman Catholics, and also how little the Lord Lieutenant had to do, except to administer the laws, it was an insult to Protestantism, and to its hold on the affections and conditions of the people of this country, gravely to argue that its interests were in any way bound up with or dependent upon the maintenance of a Protestant Viceroy in Ireland. With equal justice it might be said that this Motion went to the abolition of the standing army, or to the repudiation of the National Debt, as that it aimed a blow at the Protestant succession. If any man were to assert that these Protestant institutions were not deeply rooted in the hearts of the people of England they would be very much offended, and utter an indignant denial if they were told that these institutions could be affected by the question whether the Lord Lieutenant was to be a Roman Catholic or not. He could understand those who wished the Bill to be rejected altogether; but he could not understand those who drew a distinction between the office of Lord Chancellor and Lord Lieutenant, and thought they were open to the charge of inconsistency. It was said that there was a settlement in 1829, and that the Roman Catholics ought to be content with that settlement. He denied that there was any such settlement. There was no bar in that Act to prevent Roman Catholics from asserting their rights. There was no finality except that of complete equality. It was an injustice in the year 1867 to quote Sir Robert Peel as an authority in favour of these invidious distinctions. Were that statesman now alive, he believed he would regard what at one time might have been safeguards as irritating sources of discontent. He hoped the Committee would accept the Bill as it originally stood, and reject the Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City has just asserted that we all know what is the matter with Ireland. I can assure him, as far as I am concerned, that I do not share that knowledge. I know he is a very able man, and he must be a very favoured one if he has thoroughly mastered the causes of disaffection which afflict that country. I think the debate of this evening must have given us all reason to feel that there is some truth in the observations I am making. At this moment Ireland is the scene of a conspiracy constantly on the point of breaking out, and for which no one has yet assigned any authentic reason—which is not national—which is not indigenous—which is said to be imported—and which, if it does not come from the other side of the Atlantic, is assisted by sympathies on the European Continent. There can be no doubt that certain effects are produced by these extraneous agencies, which are extremely inconvenient, not only to those who govern, but also to those who are governed. I am therefore surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have announced so distinctly that we are all acquainted with the causes of the disorders and discontents of the country, which certainly appear to me to deserve the deepest consideration, but which may also perplex the most attentive. In the course of the debate to-night considerable reference has been made to the conspiracy now so prevalent in Ireland, and its causes have been attributed to the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood. I do not want to go into details on that subject—one that might lead to controversy and divert our attention from what is before us as a simple matter; but I could not allow the observations which I have heard, and heard at much length, charging sympathy and connivance with the Fenian insurrection to the Roman Catholic priesthood, to be made, without rising and stating, as a Minister of the Crown, that from our experience of all that has passed with regard to this unfortunate conspiracy and insurrection, and with regard to all that is occurring even up to the present moment, we have had no cause to feel any distrust of the loyalty of the Roman Catholic priesthood. And I will go further and say that to their sympathy with the Crown and the interests of England—to the information which they have given—to the general information and valuable knowledge which they possessed and have afforded, we have been much indebted and greatly assisted in the management of affairs of extreme difficulty; and, although we have been obliged to have recourse to severity, I trust the country will feel that it has not been an extreme severity, but that it has been tempered with that discretion of which real force knows how to avail itself. With regard to the present question before us, it is very important that we should distinguish between the nature of things which seem similar, but which are really distinct. The conditions on which the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act was passed are not part of the English Constitution. They were a statesmanlike settlement, and, as a statesmanlike settlement, they were adapted to the time and circumstances with which those statesmen had to deal. They were founded, no doubt, partly on principle and partly upon expediency, and, generally speaking, they were adjusted to the requirements of the period to which they related. But although I look upon those arrangements as the arrangements of very wise and considerate men, I do not hold that we are foreclosed from revising the policy under which those arrangements were recommended to Parliament. Now, with regard to the two particular offices touched by the present discussion, my noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland, with the frankness and clearness which distinguish him, made a statement to the House some time ago, in which I entirely agree. I believe from what I myself heard some years ago from one who was a great authority connected with this settlement, that the intrusion into the arrangement of the office of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was a step founded in error. It arose from a misconception of the circumstances connected with that office, and from the mistaken belief that it was identical in its attributes, influence, and patronage with the office of Lord Chancellor in England. The Lord Chancellor of England is placed in a peculiar position with regard to the Church of England. He has great control over the patronage of the Church, and he is peculiarly the Adviser of the Crown in all matters connected with the Church. That is a very good reason why we should maintain in the Constitution of this country that the person who holds the office of Lord Chancellor of England should profess the Protestant religion. But there is not now, and there never has been, anything in the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland which renders it unfitting that it should be held by a Roman Catholic. It is not connected with Church patronage, nor does it possess any peculiar relations with the Established Church in Ireland. It is simply the highest legal office, and as such the greatest prize that can be enjoyed by the legal profession, and it is therefore desirable that every Irishman, whatever his creed, should have the opportunity of obtaining that high dignity. But there is a very great difference between the two offices of Lord Chancellor and Lord Lieutenant; and even if the distinction were not so complete and absolute as I think it is, it would be, in my opinion, the most unwise and indiscreet act for the Roman Catholics to press a change in the law in respect to the office of Lord Lieutenant. That would be a course which would only revive prejudices and re-call animosities which I had hoped, if they had not been entirely banished, were greatly appeased. The Lord Lieutenant is the direct representative of the Sovereign of this country, and he is placed in intimate relations with the patronage of the Established Church of England in Ireland, and it would be a most unwise course for us to sanction a change that would create great distrust and dissatisfaction in the minds of the population of this country. Therefore, the course originally taken in this debate by my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland was discreet and wise—a course founded on principle, while to proceed further than the line which he indicated would very much offend the feelings of a great majority of the population of this country. It would, at the same time, create considerable distrust and alarm, and be an obstacle to the encouragement of those feelings which I have always endeavoured to foster; and instead of inducing that equality of position and sentiment of which we have heard so much, would rather tend to produce exactly the reverse. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I shall support the Amendment, which is in unison with the policy of my noble Friend. I am quite willing to open to Irishmen, whatever may be their religious creed, the office of Lord Chancellor. I see no reason why difference of religion should be a bar to any Irishman arriving at that distinction. But I cannot sanction the other part of the Bill; and I believe that we shall be acting a discreet and proper part by determining that the relations of the Lord Lieutenant with regard to the Crown and the country shall not be changed in the manner proposed.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken on this subject with a moderation and with a studious and unaffected concern for the feelings of the people of Ireland, which, in my opinion, do him honour. But, at the same time, I think it must have been obvious to the House that in the argumentative portion of his speech he felt the difficulties of his position; and to use an old and familiar expression drawn from a high source, "his wheels drove heavily." The right hon. Gentleman must be conscious that it is upon grounds of no breadth that he offers a resistance to a most important portion of the Bill. He commenced his speech by stating that he did not pretend to know the source of the evils of Ireland, and it would be most presumptuous in me to contradict him, or to assert for myself any such knowledge. But although it may be true that there are ancient wounds which we cannot heal, and which perhaps are not yet probed to the bottom, still physicians when dealing with the constitution of a patient, even when they doubt as to the ultimate seat of the disease, have recourse to alterative methods, by which they can soothe, if with limited benefit, and which they confidently hope will do something to mitigate the disease. Admitting frankly the fairness of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, I must say that if we strictly observe the paramount principles of civil justice—if we carefully attend to the susceptibilities of national feelings—although we may not go straight to the core of the evils of Ireland, we shall assuage their intensity and prepare the way for the ultimate operation. The right hon. Gentleman draws a distinction between the two offices of Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor. He says with regard to the former that its occupant holds a peculiar position with regard to Church patronage. The Bill, however, proposes to divest a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant of the exercise of that patronage; and, in the second place, even if it did not, the fact would still remain that the Lord Lieutenant has not one shadow of the higher responsibility with regard to ecclesiastical patronage. Whatever he does is done under the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown. Then we are told he is a representative of the Crown. Certainly he is the representative of the Crown on all matters of dignity, of ceremonial, of courts, drawing-rooms, and on public occasions, when ladies are presented to him, and in various functions of that description. But this is not to be denied, that the constitutional responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant is inferior in dignity and weight to that of the Ministers forming the Cabinet, and that still the very place of the Minister who specially superintends the Lord Lieutenant in the exercise of his duties—namely, the Secretary of State for the Home Department—may at any time be filled by a Roman Catholic. The right hon. Gentleman has said that those who propose and support this measure will in pressing it revive prejudices and excite animosities. But when we are told that we are not to apply to Ireland principles different from those which we apply to England and Scotland, I say that the same principles, so far as they are consistent with the unity of the Empire, should be consulted in framing the laws and institutions of each country. My belief is, that to follow out to their natural conclusion, courageously, prudently, but firmly, the principles of strict civil justice is the way not to weaken and disparage, but to confirm and consolidate those institutions. The right hon. Gentleman says, that to press these claims would awaken animosities and revive prejudices. Where? In Ireland? No, but in England. But is that a sufficient reason why a majority of the people of Ireland should be debarred and deprived of enjoying a matter of a civil right, because the minority allege that their prejudices would be wounded? Now, I ask, is that a fair, generous, and equitable mode of handling this question? Is it a mode by which we may seek to soothe the sore and wounded feelings of the people of Ireland, if, on a question that is not English, but Irish, we are to say to the people of Ireland, "Abate your rights, do not urge your demands, because we who inhabit England and Scotland in a matter purely Irish declare we have prejudices which you must respect?" There is no man in the House, I think, who seriously would urge or could possibly believe—certain I am that the right hon. Gentleman will not seriously urge and cannot possibly believe—that danger would result to the Constitution, the Church, and the religion of the country by the contingency—not arising at the moment, but should it ever arise—by the holding of the office of Lord Lieutenant by a Roman Catholic subject of the Queen. I am only doing the right hon. Gentleman justice when I point out to the House that the right hon. Gentleman in his speech made no such allegation. He rested his opposition on the question of the ecclesiastical patronage of the Lord Lieutenant, which the Bill proposes to take away; he rested it on the representation of the Crown by the Lord Lieutenant, which representation is exercised under the control and responsibility of the Government and a Minister of the Crown, who by the existing law may be a Roman Catholic; he rested it on the prejudice of this country, to which it would be most unworthy of us to give weight as against the civil rights of a people who are not English, but Irish. But of danger to the Constitution, the right hon. Gentleman has not said a word; and I am persuaded that he believes that danger to be a phantom. If danger there be, it is in this:—in slackness, in reluctance, in niggardliness on our part in dealing with those claims of Ireland which are founded on justice. But to extend largely and liberally civil equality to the entire of Her Majesty's subjects in these kingdoms is the true way of consulting the interests of the religion, the Church, and the Constitution of this country.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that in the debate on the second reading, the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland called his attention to the fact that the Lord Chancellor had some jurisdiction in the appointment of delegates for hearing ecclesiastical appeals, and was an ex officio trustee of certain Protestant charities. He had consequently prepared a clause providing that when the office was filled by a Roman Catholic those functions should devolve on one of the Chief Judges, being a Protestant.

[BILL 6.] COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the hon. Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) having assigned no reasons whatever for his introduction of this Bill in the present Session, I am bound to conclude that he is actuated by the same reason which prompted him to bring in this Bill last Session. These were that the Declaration, prescribed by the Act of Charles II., which is embodied in the Act of Settlement, and by that Act is required to be made by the Sovereign of these realms at his or her coronation—that this declaration of adherence to the Protestant religion is considered so offensive by Roman Catholics, that they will not permit any Protestant officer of State to pronounce it. Now, I beg the Committee to observe how these matters proceed. We have had an eloquent oration to-night from the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition against preserving any office to persons of the same religion as the Sovereign, and every argument that the right hon. Gentleman used struck directly at the principle that the Sovereign ought to be a Protestant. I know there is a most extraordinary indifference to these Constitutional questions in this House. In my experience I have never known a Parliament in which the principle of religious indifference, to say the least, was so manifest as in the present. It appears to me that the opinions of the Protestant people of this country are neglected and wilfully violated; every principle they most value is bartered away for the sake of the political convenience of the moment. I am happy to say, however, that the people of this country are at last becoming sensible of this; and although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and his Friends may disregard the opinions of their constituents, I have reason to believe that gradually their constituents are coming to the conclusion that, unless they act with energy, the government of the country must eventually and permanently lapse into the hands of the only party in the House who consistently seek to establish the domination of the power they represent—I mean the power of the Papacy. I know that this feeling exists. I know also that it is justifiable. I am, nevertheless, most desirous of avoiding anything needlessly offensive to my Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. I therefore propose an Amendment which would remove from the declaration certain words that they deem to be objectionable. That these words are offensive, however, is a new discovery; for this declaration has existed ever since the reign of Charles II.; and it has only just been discovered by the Roman Catholic Members of this House, that it is an offence on the part of Protestants if they express their religious opinions. Whilst hon. Gentlemen are proclaiming the doctrine of religious equality in this House, his Holiness of Rome is denouncing that principle; commanding his officers to abjure it; forbidding them to unite with any other religion whatever, and urging them to be more and more exclusive. Nevertheless, with characteristic carelessness, the more stringent the directions issued from Rome and the more evident the obedience which they command, the more lax is the guardianship extended to the Protestant Constitution of the country by this House. There is a good deal of idle declamation about the bigotry of Protestants; but what bigotry can be greater than that of a Bill by which the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Roman Catholic body forbid the Protestant officers of the State to express their religious convictions in a form that has existed and been in use for more than 200 years? Can any intolerance surpass that? Why, Sir, it would have been but decent that a Protestant should move this Bill; but no, it is reserved for a Roman Catholic, an active, energetic, zealous Roman Catholic, in obedience to his superiors, to desire that the House should abolish a declaration made by the Protestants. I confess that to me this appears an act of aggressive intolerance that ought to excite a just indignation throughout the country. If Protestantism is to be strong, however, Protestantism must continue to be tolerant. I propose, therefore, that whilst retaining the requirement for the declaration of those opinions, which constitute the distinctive features of the purity of the Protestant faith, as contrasted with what we believe to be the corruptions of the Church of Rome, we—[Laughter from Sir George Bowyer.] The hon. Baronet opposite is ever the exponent of intolerance, and was never more so than in the manner in which he has just given vent to his feelings. [Laughter.] Why, look at him now! Is he not the very picture of sarcastic intolerance? Anything that is said in the course of debate which is not agreeable to him he laughs at or flatly denies; and after having himself expressed in this House extreme Roman Catholic opinions, no sooner does a Protestant Member rise to propose the removal of what he himself proclaims to be offensive, than the hon. Baronet receives him with interruption and ridicule. This Bill marks another step in the career of concession to the Papacy. That is the sense in which it is moved, and it is in that sense I resist it, and I resist it in this manner—by seeking to substitute for a declaration, which is asserted to be offensive in the terms in which it is expressed, another that cannot be fairly said to be so, though about the meaning of it there can be no mistake, inasmuch as it distinctly repudiates the doctrines of the Church of Rome to which Protestants object; but it is free from every offensive word that might serve as a hook upon which the hon. Baronet might hang his ribaldry. For this purpose, and acting under the advice of Sir Hugh Cairns and Sir James Whiteside, I prepared this Amendment last Session. I will not read the terms of the existing declaration, because I am told that those terms are offensive; but I will read the words of the two articles of religion which are embodied by reference in the declaration I propose to substitute for the present; because I wish to show to the House that there is in them no expression which should be offensive to the Roman Catholic, who is really liberal, really tolerant of the opinions of others. For 300 years the Protestants have thus declared their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation—that cardinal dogma of the Church of Rome. The 22nd Article of Religion, as received by the Church of England, runs thus—

“The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also invocation of Saints is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.”

It is not possible that any terms should be more studiously void of offence. And the other Article, the 28th, is to this effect—

“The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ’s death, insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ. Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine, in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is Faith. The Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper was not by Christ’s ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.”

If you study that article you will see that it is couched in terms, which are the least possible offensive, consistently with the utterance of an entire repudiation of the doctrine to which it refers. After giving the matter, therefore, the fullest consideration, and after having had the advice of Sir Hugh Cairns and Sir James Whiteside upon the point, I came to the conclusion that it would be impertinent on my part to suggest any other terms than those contained in some formula, issued by authority, such as are the Articles of Religion. It has been a rule of this Protestant country for 300 years to require from Protestants a declaration of their faith, and to accept them upon their own declaration as thereby qualified for high office. I wish to avoid the consequence that must follow the passing of this Bill as it stands. The object of the Bill is this:—that whereas some few high officers of State, who are still to be of the same religion as Her Majesty, have for 300 years been required to make the same declaration of faith as Her Ma-

esty, thereby declaring themselves to be in religious communion with Her Majesty, that henceforth the Sovereign shall be isolated in declaring her adhesion to the Protestant faith. Pass this Bill, and no officer of the Crown or of the State will hereafter be required to make either the same or an equivalent declaration to that which is made by Her Majesty. Thus you deprive the Sovereign of the security that she has a few high officers of the State avowedly of the same religion as herself. Besides, let it be remembered that our Sovereign is a lady, and surely that ought to command for her some consideration on the part of this House. If it be wise to maintain the declaration by the Sovereign of adherence to the Protestant Faith, it is also wise to require some of the great officers of State to make the same or an equivalent declaration; it is wrong, it is inconsistent with every feeling of loyalty, to allow the Sovereign to be isolated in making a declaration of faith, which this House will, if it passes this Bill, have stigmatized as offensive. If the profession of Protestantism by these officers of State is condemned by this House, how long will it be before an assault is made upon the Act of Settlement itself? and that will be the next step. In these liberal days I know that large sections of the House think lightly of these matters. But I speak in the presence of many Members who remember the late Lord Lyndhurst, a man who was no less remarkable for the liberality of his opinions than for the clearness of his perception. His liberality, indeed, was undoubted; for he was the great promoter in the House of Peers of the measure for admitting the Jews to seats in Parliament, and when Attorney General he drew up the Roman Catholic Relief Bill; yet Lord Lyndhurst, in the last great speech that he ever made, declared that he could conceive no greater misfortune for his fellow-subjects than that the throne of this country should again be occupied by a Roman Catholic. Sir, it is in defence of that great principle—the principle that the Sovereign of this country shall be a Protestant, and therefore tolerant, and therefore of a religion and of a disposition consistent with the Constitutional freedom which has stood firm amongst us for centuries, whilst it has waxed and waned in Continental countries—it is in support of this great principle that, whilst asking the House to remove every just occasion of offence, I pray the House, by adopting my Amendment, not to allow Her Majesty to be isolated in declaring her adhesion to that Protestant Faith which, thank God, most of us in this House profess; would that many more defended it earnestly!

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 4 and 5, to leave out all the words after the words "or right shall be," to the end of the Clause, and to insert the words, "held to apply to the Declaration set forth in the Second Schedule to this Act, which is hereby substituted for the Declaration set forth in the First Schedule to this Act, the obligation to take, make, and subscribe which last-mentioned Declaration is hereby repealed; and be it hereby declared and enacted, That the obligation to take, make, and subscribe the Declaration set forth in the Second Schedule to this Act, shall in all respects be the same as, and that the taking, making, and subscribing of the Declaration hereby substituted shall in all respects be held to be equivalent to the taking, making, and subscribing of the Declaration hereby repealed,"—(Mr. Newdegate),—instead thereof.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that the object of the Bill was to abolish one of the most offensive declarations which the ingenuity of man could devise, and it was directed against some of the most sacred tenets held by Roman Catholics. The declaration was one which had to be taken by the Lord Lieutenant and by all the holders of offices for which Roman Catholics were ineligible. The Bill would not open any office to Roman Catholics which they could not hold now. It was supported last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whom he regretted not to see in his place at that moment, and on the second reading was carried in that House by a majority of more than 2 to 1; it had been sent up to the other House, but at too late a period to be considered. On that occasion the noble Lord the chief of the present Government stated that he thought it could best be considered after the Oaths Commission, which was then sitting, had made its Report. No doubt the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was less offensive; but it referred to the Thirty-nine Articles, which contained expressions in reference to Roman Catholic doctrines which were offensive, and it also contained for the first time a reference to purgatory. The Bill would not in the slightest degree interfere with the Coronation Oath. The declaration contained in the oath was worthy of consideration by the Commission. He thought it also ought to be abolished; but the present Bill only referred to declarations taken by Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that there was a disposition last year to reject the Bill because the Commissioners on Oaths had not then presented their Report, and as they had not yet reported, the reason for delaying the Bill still existed. It was true the Bill had gone up to the other House last Session, and had not been proceeded with; but he had good grounds for believing that it was the determination of the Government to have rejected it.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that though the Commission referred to had not yet reported, a more important Report in reference to this question had been made. A Commission had been appointed to consider what declarations ought to be taken by holders of office, not being laymen, belonging to the Established Church. On that Commission were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Primate of the Established Church in Ireland, several of the then Ministry, the present Home Secretary, and some of the most prominent men, lay and clerical, connected with the Irish Established Church. That Commission unanimously reported that this very declaration which the present Bill proposed to abolish was one which ought to be abolished, and it had accordingly been abolished. The hon. Member now proposed to add another declaration which had reference to purgatory. Now, there was a homely saying in Ireland which would apply to the hon. Member, which was that, "if he did not like purgatory, he might go further and fare worse."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 76: Majority 59.

MR. WHALLEY protested against these continual concessions to the Roman Catholics.

CRIMINAL LAW BILL.

(Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge.)

[BILL 8.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. CHILDERS said, he must repeat his objection to the Bill, that it transferred to the Consolidated Fund certain charges in connection with criminal offences hitherto borne by individuals without any of the forms prescribed by the House having been gone through. That was a proceeding which was of an inconvenient character and formed a precedent which the House ought to resist. He hoped the House would require the examination of the charges by a Committee of the whole House, and would not admit that, in consequence of an arrangement between the promoters of the Bill and the occupants of the Treasury Bench, that they were bound to include these expenses in the Estimates, and vote them year by year.

MR. HUNT said, that the proceeding that was proposed by the Bill was in accordance with an arrangement suggested by Sir Robert Peel in 1846. He took it that they were doing nothing more than was done when the cost of prosecutions was first thrown on the means voted by Parliament, as was done by Sir Robert Peel in 1846. He gave great consideration to the suggestion of his hon. Friend, and though he was at first anxious to assent to such a clause, he had afterwards concluded that considerable difficulty would arise on the question of expense. He believed that if the Bill were passed into law, the expenses of prosecution would become considerably lessened; because under the present law there were often three or four witnesses summoned to one fact, and therefore the public would probably be materially benefited.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought there were reasons why they should not argue too rapidly from the precedent of 1846. The measure of that year was carried under circumstances of extraordinary pressure, and since that time a keener eye had been kept upon the public expenditure. He accepted the declaration of the hon. Member that the House would be as entirely free to consider the subject when the Vote for the expenses of criminal prosecutions was proposed as if the present Bill had not passed.

MR. HUNT said, that if the Bill were passed into law the expenses would be provided for in next year's Estimate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) did not think that this Bill would decrease the cost of prosecutions.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

(Sir John Pakington, Mr. Hunt.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that great care and caution should be exercised in the prosecution of the works, and he believed the estimate he had formed as to the expense of the armament would be found to be correct. He had no doubt our interests would be well protected by the present Secretary at War.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, that experiments had proved iron fortifications to be most efficient for defensive purposes, while iron plates introduced into masonry formed a most imperfect defence.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON explained that iron shields, which would be expensive, were not provided for by this Bill. It merely provided for the re-appropriation of money already granted. The subject of iron plating would, however, receive his most careful attention.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—AMENDMENTS.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that in order to prevent any confusion or misunderstanding which might arise as to the meaning of some of the Amendments he proposed to move upon the Reform Bill, which he found were not so clearly stated as he intended, he now proposed to insert in Clause 3, page 2, lines 3 and 4, after the words "and 2," the words "whether he in person or his landlord be rated to the relief of the poor."

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Lord ELCHO, Bill to amend the Laws relating to Game in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Lord ELCHO, Mr. HENRY BAILLIE, and Sir ROBERT ANSTRETHUR.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 116.]

(Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Henderson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that since he had introduced the measure a great many petitions had been presented in its favour, and there was a very general desire that it should pass into law. The Bill proposed to assess to the local rates all mines and plantations in the same manner that coal mines were now rated. The Courts of Law having held that mines other than coal mines were not liable to be rated, a vast amount of mining property escaped assessment, though they were worked by shafts and drivings in a precisely similar manner. The annual value of mining property not subject to rates in 1853 was £4,744,000, and during the last eleven years the value had increased in a greater ratio than that of land, iron works, or fisheries, though in a less ratio than three other descriptions of property—namely, railways, quarries, and gas works. In 1864 the annual value of mining property had increased by £1,934,000 over the value in 1853. The exemption from rating enjoyed by mines other than coal mines tended to throw great burdens on persons neither directly nor indirectly interested in mining property. For instance, in Ulverstone the annual value of mining property that escaped rating was £50,000, and was all in the hands of rich proprietors. The mines which created the greatest burdens by the number of disabled miners they made, and the roads they cut up with their heavy traffic, were wholly exempt either from poor or highway rate. Thus in the parish of Alston, which in 1865 yielded lead to the value of £65,000, the mines paid nothing towards the poor rates, although out of 328 paupers 278 were from the mines, and only fifty-six were agricultural labourers. When he asked leave to introduce the Bill the President of the Poor Law Board said that many cases of a similar nature were about to be brought before the Superior Courts of Law, with a view to a reversal of former decisions in reference to the rating of mining property. But the judgments which had confirmed the exemption were very specific. In order to show what was the present state of the law, he would quote a passage from the work of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier), in which it was stated—

"The Statute 43rd of Elizabeth, chap. 2, sec. 1, in which poor rates originated, having declared all occupiers of 'coal mines,' among other things, rateable to the poor, it was early decided that the express mention of coal mines excluded all others, and such at present is the law. The only question that can arise now upon this is whether the workings for ore or other substances are or are not mines; for, if quarries only, they are rateable."

He therefore did not think that it was likely that the Judges would reverse former decisions, and shut their eyes to all the concurrent circumstances throwing light on the intention of the Legislature in passing that Act. In deciding a case in reference to a lead mine, Lord Mansfield said—

"We have no ground, authority, or pretence for giving it that extensive construction, nor is there any foundation for imagining that the Legislature meant so. Nothing can be clearer than that these (lead) mines are not within the letter of the statute, for the Legislature could never intend by the word 'coal mines' to comprehend other species of mines. If they had meant to include them they would either have enumerated them or used the general word 'mines.' So that the expression 'coal mines' expressly excludes mines of any other sort, as much as if they had been exempted."

In Cornwall, where the tin mines were unsuccessfully struggling against foreign competition the exemption from rating acted as a protection, inducing people in some cases to keep their capital in what would otherwise be unprofitable concerns; while in his (Mr. Percy Wyndham's) part of the country the exemption operated to relieve from assessment the richest portion of the community, and to throw the burden on the poorer portion. With respect to the mode of rating, if they looked to coal mines it would be found that it varied in different localities, being sometimes on the actual and sometimes on the estimated royalty, and in Staffordshire upon the acreage. There were complaints against this uncertainty; but he feared that if the agitation attempted to establish a uniform system neither lords nor occupiers would pay what they ought to do. Mines differed from lands in this—that whilst the land remained, in the case of mines the corpus of the estate gradually became extinct: but this fact, if used as an argument against rating mines, would not hold water. £12,000 worth of coal would have the same rate as £12,000 worth of land, as when it ceased to exist the rate could no longer be levied. It was upon this principle his Bill was based. The Bill contained a provision allowing, after the passing of the measure, the holders of existing leases, whereby a rent in money, royalty, toll, or due other than in kind was reserved, to deduct from the rent one-half of the rate which would become chargeable upon them; and another clause provided that where any lord or owner of a mine was assessed to local rates in respect of such mine, nothing in the present Bill should be held to disturb such assessment during the continuance of existing setts. With regard to woods and plantations, there was some doubt as to the state of the law in reference to their liability to be rated; but he believed that it was generally held that saleable underwoods were rateable, though it seemed that a great variety of practice existed in this respect. When he drew up the clause providing that woods and plantations should be liable to be rated upon the rate-

able value of the land on which they were grown, he was not aware how the Scotch Act upon the same subject was worded; but he had since ascertained that it was provided by that Act that where lands and heritages consisted of woods, copse, or underwood, the yearly value of the same was to be taken to be the rent at which they might in their natural state be reasonably expected to let from year to year as pasture or grazing lands. It was objected against the Bill that it only applied to mines and woods, whereas there were other descriptions of property which was not rated and which ought not to escape assessment, and there were petitions before the House praying every species of un-rated property—including game preserves and shootings—should be made liable to rates. He did not, however, see why the Bill should be objected to on that ground. It was impossible to pass a comprehensive measure at once; and it should be remembered that in proportion as the number of exemptions was diminished the stronger would become the argument against the continuance of other exemptions, and, whatever might be the defects of the Bill, they were as nothing compared with the anomalies and inconsistencies of the present system.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Percy Wyndham.)

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH, in rising to move an Amendment that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, said, he could assure the hon. Member that he was not actuated by any hostility to the principle of the Bill; but he regarded the details as so complicated that it would be impossible to deal with them satisfactorily in a Committee of the whole House. The most conflicting opinions prevailed as to the principles on which mines should be rated. He was connected with the mineral district in the High Peak of Derbyshire. The mines there had been worked from time immemorial, and the customs dated as far back as the time of Edward III. By these customs every subject of the Crown was permitted to dig and delve for minerals. The minerals belonged to the Duchy of Lancaster; but they had been leased to lords, who received a royalty nominally of one-thirteenth, but actually in most instances of one-twentieth. On these royalties they had paid rates for very many years. The system worked harmoniously, but if it were meddled with great dissatisfaction and litigation would be occasioned. There was evidence to show that if they attempted to rate the mine or throw the rate on the occupier they would at once shut up a great portion of the mines, nineteen-twentieths of which were held by poor men. A question had been started as to the getting of ores. There was an old saying—"There is ore of all kinds, but," alluding to the difficulty of getting it, "not for all men." It had been suggested by one witness examined before the Committee that the royalty should be taken as the principle on which mines should be assessed; but the whole question was one of such complicated detail that it would be impossible to deal with it satisfactorily in a Committee of the whole House. Therefore, in the most friendly spirit to the principle of the Bill, his recommendation would be that it be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. KENDALL quite agreed that all mines should be rated; but he did not think it would be possible to apply this Bill to mines in the West of England. The Bill declared that mines and minerals in England and Wales should be liable to local rates in the same manner and to the same extent as coal mines are liable to local rates; but on what principle were coal mines rated? He never could learn. In some places they were rated on the ton, in others on the profits; but the yield and the profits differed largely. The Bill was totally inapplicable to Cornish mines. In the rich district of Redruth there were only two or three mines paying a profit. How were such mines to be assessed? In one mine £400,000 had been expended, and the whole money was lost. In another instance £90,000 had been expended without the return of a single shilling. If there was no realized profits how could they assess them? At present mining property was in a most depressed state. There was great danger of driving capital away from Cornwall, owing to the large imports of tin from Chile, America, and Australia, and perhaps also to the monetary panic. He did not mean to say that mines should not be assessed to the relief of the poor; but the question was, who should be assessed? They must virtually assess the proprietor of the soil. If any profit was received he was sure to get it, and therefore he was the proper party to be assessed. This was undoubtedly a very difficult question, and regard must be had to many different localities. He should be very glad to see plantations assessed. The best thing that could be done was to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, as the noble Lord proposed.

MR. COLVILE said, this proposition was not a new one. It was exactly fifty years since the first Bill for the rating of mines was laid on the table. The Legislature at that time appeared to be excessively keen on the subject, for the years 1817, 1818, and 1819 produced Bills for this purpose; but, like the material with which they proposed to deal, these Bills met with a "down-set." However, some twelve years afterwards the question again "cropped" up, and Bills were produced in 1856 and 1857. Since that period the subject has been allowed to rest until it was now brought forward by the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham). The only novelty in this Bill was the proposition to rate mines on the same principle as coal mines. Now, he should very much have liked that the hon. Mover had explained a little more fully on what principle coal mines were rated. No one could very well tell on what principle coal mines were rated. The principle, to borrow a popular phrase, was one "that no fellow can understand." The hon. Member said, they must be rated on their net annual value; but how was that possible? A mine was worth thousands a year one day, and next day nothing at all. Unless they had, as in Scotland, an annual valuation it would be impossible to carry out that principle. He did not wish to shrink from the responsibility of having mines rated; he did not know why any hereditament should be exempted from local taxation; but he strongly objected to the mode of carrying out that object as proposed by this Bill. It was impossible to attempt to rate little mining undertakings worked by two or three men. The Small Tenements Act would have to be extended to mines, and compounding lords established. The only principle he could assent to was to rate the lords on their dues, as was now practised in Derbyshire; but the subject was much too wide to be considered by the House. The range of the inquiry should be extended. The hon. Member had taken one leaf from the Scotch Lands Valuation Act, and proposed to rate woods; he would take another, and move that game, let at a rental, should be included, and the Bill referred to a Select Committee.

If that was not agreed to he hoped the Bill would be placed on that shelf which had received so many of its predecessors.

MR. BEACH hoped, if this Bill were referred to a Select Committee, they would be able to arrive at a more satisfactory conclusion than the last Committee, which had only been enabled at the conclusion of their investigation to suggest their own re-appointment. Coal mines were at present the only mines which came under the statute of the 43rd of Elizabeth; but that was no valid reason why other mines should be exempted if any satisfactory mode of assessment could be arrived at. When it was considered that a farmer was assessed on his rent, and had to pay whether he made any profit or not, he did not see why there should be any arbitrary exemption of mines because they did not happen to pay. As to assessing plantations and woods, it would be impossible to assess them on the rateable value of the land on which the trees were grown. To do so would be contrary to the principle of parochial assessment, which was made upon reasonable value from year to year. Considering the deterioration in land, that property which had not game upon it paid in a higher ratio than that which possessed game; but seeing the fluctuating value of it, it would be difficult to establish an uniform rate, as had been suggested by some. He trusted that the Select Committee might be allowed to include the question of game preserves and shootings within the scope of their inquiries.

MR. HENDERSON said, the anomalies that existed in reference to the rating of mines were very extraordinary. When mines were worked from the quarries in open drifts they were subject to local taxation; but as soon as the mineworker extended his operations and made a shaft they became exempt. Again, according to the old system of letting, when the rate was paid in kind there was local taxation; but when it became a money charge the liability disappeared; and, however large the "put out" might be, they did not pay a farthing to the local burdens. The evil was chiefly felt in those districts where the ironstone was the chief source of the wealth of the country. The district about Cleveland, in Yorkshire, was a few years ago entirely of an agricultural character, but by the wand, as it were, of the enchanter, immense quantities of ironstone were found and an enormous population was collected; but the ironstone did not pay a single farthing to the local burdens which were thrown upon places in the immediate neighbourhood. But coal mines, which required so much more capital, and incurred so much more risk in working them, were assessed. Why should the present anomalous exemptions be retained? While he admitted that all minerals should be assessed, he could not agree that they should be rated on the same footing with real property, land or houses. They had all heard of such dreadful explosions as took place at the Oaks and the Hartley Collieries. In the former case, the entire capital invested in the mine was annihilated in a moment, and the colliery could only be restored by the expenditure of new capital to a large amount. In the latter case, the capital expended, which exceeded £100,000, was almost entirely rendered worthless. And there were cases of collieries upon which £300,000 or £400,000 had been expended that had never paid a farthing dividend. It was plain, therefore, that this class of property could not be dealt with in the same way as lands and houses. The whole subject was surrounded with difficulties which the House itself could not well deal with; in his opinion the only satisfactory way of solving this question was to refer it to a Select Committee.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that it seemed from the discussion that every hon. Member admitted the anomalies that existed in the law of rating. These anomalies were by no means confined to mines; and indeed if the whole question were considered there would be raised many more important issues than those which had reference to mining property and plantations. He could agree that, in reference to rating, coal mines were distinct from all other mines; because no man when he commenced sinking a shaft knew whether he should find coal or not. It was within his experience that many persons in seeking for coal went very deep into the earth without finding it. This reminded him of the story of a landowner in the North who had spent a great deal of time and money in boring on his property, and passing a farmyard he heard a loud noise proceeding from the pigs. He asked the cause of the uproar, and was told they were "ringing" the pigs to prevent them boring; on which he exclaimed, "I wish my father had done the same to me when I was young." There were, undoubtedly, many anomalies in the present system. Two individuals might be working on different sides of a hill; the one in open quarry, he paid enormous rates; the other underground, and he paid no rates at all. In the county of Cornwall the parish of St. Just was rated at £13,000, and at one time there were in that parish six mines which were rated because the owners of the land had reserved a royalty, and which paid upon an assessment of £2,828. They found, however, that if they took their rent in money the mines would be free from rates; they therefore made this change, and all their property was immediately freed from contributions to the poor rate, except so much of it as belonged to one person who thought it a duty to be rated. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had said that his predecessor the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) intimated last year that the question of the rateability of metallic mines was to come before a Court of Law again. But since then the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Mersey Docks had caused a different view to be taken of the matter—that decision had, indeed, raised questions that were believed to have been set at rest many years ago. Now, however, this particular question was about to be raised upon a special case, and if the Court of Queen's Bench should not decide in favour of the parish it was intended to take the matter into a Court of Error, in order to see whether the House of Lords' decision had varied the law or established a new law upon this matter. The case was that of "Crawshay v. Morgan and Another." The defendants were overseers of a parish in Gloucestershire, and they proposed to assess Mr. Crawshay for an iron mine upon a rating of £2,483. It seemed to him (Mr. G. Hardy) very desirable that they should get out of this difficulty, if possible, through the Law Courts: but, in the meantime, he thought that the Committee would be very well occupied in inquiring into the question as to mines, woodlands, and plantations: and he would suggest that as this Bill was confined to mines, woodlands, and plantations, the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish) should defer his Motion until the time came for going into Committee; and that, in the meantime, Instructions should be framed to refer to the Committee other questions which were equally important to those which were dealt with in the Bill. Some of the exemptions which had arisen under the Mersey Docks case were peculiarly unfair. That decision had rendered pure charities liable to be rated; and yet there were exemptions in favour of scientific and literary institutions which, although they did good, were not established for the benefit of the poor. He thought it was unnecessary that the debate should be further proceeded with then, because it was embracing within it details which could not be properly discussed on this Bill; and he would propose that the Bill should be read a second time, and that the Committee should be fixed for after Easter, so as to give time to any hon. Member to frame an Instruction to the Committee in order that the inquiry should not be limited to mines, woodlands, and plantations as it now would be from the title of the Bill. He thought that in this way they would advance the objects they had in view, so as to get at a solution of the very difficult question of exemptions. He believed that if the various kinds of property which had been referred to were rated, the Courts of Law would find principles upon which to rate them, as they had done in reference to railways and other property of a difficult kind.

MR. PEASE agreed in the propriety of referring the subject to a Select Committee; but he hoped any Committee that might be appointed would carefully consider the question of the immense risk which was run by the adventurers, and also have regard to the fact that from 80 to 90 per cent of the whole value of the minerals represented pure labour. He trusted the Committee would be able to take a comprehensive view of the whole subject.

MR. BARROW held that the principle of the law of rating was that the occupier of the land—the person who employed the labour that produced the pauperism—should pay the rates which was the provision for the incapacitated pauper. But this Bill contained strange infringements of that principle. It provided that metalliferous mines should be rated upon the same principle as coal mines; but though coal mines had been rateable since the 43rd Elizabeth the principle of rating them was not yet settled. He took it that the worker of the mine should be the person rated, as he was the employer of the labour that produced the pauper; but this Bill proposed that the owner of the land should pay one moiety of the rate; and on this he should like to ask what was the value of the mineral when brought to the surface as compared with the royalty paid for raising it? He agreed that the person who took the royalty should contribute; but to compel him to contribute one-half was inconsistent with all principle. Many leases of metalliferous mines contained clauses that the person who worked the mines should pay all rates; and it would not be right, in his opinion, to interfere with these private arrangements. The Bill could not possibly pass in the shape in which it was at present; and therefore he thought that the whole question should be referred to a Select Committee, and that the Bill should stand over in the meantime.

MR. WYLD thought it impossible that this Bill would work in the county of Cornwall. There was great difference between coal and metalliferous mines. They knew with probable certainty where coal was to be found, and when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) said that this was not so, he referred to former times; but now the state of scientific knowledge was such that there were very few attempts to procure coal which were not successful. On the other hand, sometimes many thousands of pounds were spent in searching for metals without success. This was well known, and therefore the Legislature had very properly made a distinction between the two cases in regard to rating. It was only fair that those lords who were deriving large sums from mines should be taxed for the support of the poor of the neighbourhood; but it was a very different matter to tax those who were spending large sums of money for an uncertain profit, and who were really the benefactors of a district. The effect of this Bill would be to shut up a number of mines in Cornwall, and to throw many people out of employment.

MR. BAGNALL, referring to evidence taken before a Committee, said, that it disclosed such a total absence of principle in reference to rating that the system could be best described as rating by rule of thumb. He hoped the Bill would be allowed to go to a Select Committee, where the details could be properly considered, and though the measure was retrograde as compared with the measure of last year, some simple and satisfactory principle of assessment might result from it.

MR. JACKSON thought that this discussion could end in nothing but the matter going to a Select Committee; and that it would be well that it should be discontinued until after the Committee had made its Report.

Mr. Barrow

MR. HENLEY said, that the House seemed generally agreed that it was desirable that the question of mines should be considered, with the view to bring them under charge to the poor rate; and he had nothing to say against this. The President of the Poor Law Board had told them with great truth that the decision in the Mersey Docks case had rendered property not beneficially occupied liable to be rated to the poor. It seemed plain that this Bill would go to a Select Committee, and it was equally clear that other matters not mentioned in the Bill should also go to the Committee. He thought that the Instruction to the Committee ought to be as wide as possible, for otherwise justice would not be done. It was not many years since, on account of some supposed difficulty in rating particular species of property, the House exempted it; but it seemed now to be quite clear that with our improved knowledge and skill means could be found to rate every kind of property. Why was not stock-in-trade to be rated? Personal property of that kind was liable under the old law of Elizabeth, and it only ceased to be rated in consequence of the supposed difficulty in rating it. But if this Committee was going to solve all the difficulties about things underground, he did not see why they should not also try their hands at solving the difficulties in reference to things above ground; and therefore he hoped that the reference to the Committee would be as wide as possible, and include things in the earth, under the earth, and above the earth, so that they might obtain the means of taxing property according to the annual interest derived from it. When it was proposed to tax so uncertain a property as game there could be no difficulty in taxing stock-in-trade; and it might be a question whether persons should not be rated under the Scotch term of "means and subsistence." At all events, the Committee should consider it if the reference were wide enough.

MR. WHALLEY regarded this as an attempt to revive an inquiry into a matter which had been settled over and over again. As far as this Bill was concerned there was nothing to be referred to a Select Committee that had not been long ago decided upon. The law authorizing the exemption of the mines in question from rating had been settled three centuries ago and was based on a wise principle, the object of the exemption being to hold out an inducement to persons to develop the mineral resources of the country, and it had proved satisfactory in operation.

MR. READ said, that the Select Committee, if appointed to inquire into the question, ought to be instructed to inquire into all exemptions, and that its investigations should be extended to the subject of game and the inequality of the law respecting it. If the owner of an estate kept the game in his own hands, or let it to another party, it was not rateable; but if he let it to a tenant occupying the land it was rateable. He thought it was quite impossible to rate game upon any equitable system, as it was a thing that might be here to-day and gone to-morrow. But in cases where land was so overstocked with game as to depreciate its rateable value he thought that, notwithstanding the abundance of game on it, the land ought to be rated at its agricultural value. That was the effect of an Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. COWEN said, that the more the question was discussed the more would the House be convinced of the propriety of referring it to a Select Committee, with an Instruction somewhat similar to that suggested by the President of the Poor Law Board.

MR. BENTINCK, in supporting the Bill, said, he desired to remind the House that one of the great grievances existing in relation to the question was this: that while coal mines, which were worked to a great extent (sometimes the workings ran several miles under the sea) and were formed at a great expense, and employed a vast quantity of labour, and sometimes returned little or no profit, were subject to a rating—whilst the coal owners were taxed in every direction—iron and other minerals were exempted. It appeared to him that such a system was opposed to the principles of common sense. He was acquainted with the case of a slate quarry in Wales which was at one side worked upon the open ground and at the other worked under ground, and where the open ground part was assessed whilst the underground part escaped liability. That was an anomalous state of things which ought not to be allowed to exist. He was not surprised at the unanimity of opinion in favour of the principle of this Bill, and of the measure itself being referred to a Select Committee. That was the best mode of dealing with the matter, inasmuch as it could be thoroughly investigated by that tribunal;

all the evidence respecting it could be heard, and the whole question could be considered in the most satisfactory manner. Although it might be said that this question had been before Committees some years ago, it should be recollected that the aspects of the mining interest had very much changed since then. For example, there was a discovery recently made of hæmatite iron upon the west coast of Cumberland by which fortunes were being made, yet while the coal mines were assessed, the iron mines escaped. He was much afraid, if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read) that the question of game should form part of the inquiry of the Select Committee were adopted, that the Bill would never come out of the hands of the Committee in time to pass into a law. He should advise his hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill to take counsel before he acted upon the advice thus offered him, and to consider what would be the best plan to adopt with a view of having the measure passed this Session.

MR. LIDDELL remarked, that under the powers of the Union Assessment Act very satisfactory progress had been made in revising those assessments, and the experience of the ablest men had been brought to bear upon the subject. A large number of fresh valuations had been recently made, and twenty, thirty, or forty coal mines had been rated to the satisfaction not only of the parochial authorities, but also of the ratepayers. He thought that they ought to avail themselves in the proposed inquiry of the experience gained in those new valuations. He had ventured to predict that the moment they passed the law extending the area of chargeability from the parish to the union a large amount of hostility would arise in quarters from which it was least expected. It appeared to him that now that places were called upon to maintain poor from whose labour they had derived no benefit, the House was bound to consider the whole question of the law of rating, and the spirit of the Act of Elizabeth, which evidently contemplated the assessment of all property for the relief of the poor. He hoped that the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board would be followed, and that this Committee would not be confined in its inquiries to the mere question of certain classes of mines.

MR. HUBBARD said, he had never heard any argument in favour of those exemptions except such as obviously answered itself. When it was urged that the Act of Elizabeth did not mention mines in respect to rating, he would remind those who relied upon such an argument that neither did the Act of Elizabeth mention railways or telegraphic communications. He was of opinion that the reference of the question to a Select Committee could not but result in the great improvement of our assessment system.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM assented to the proposition as to the question being referred to a Select Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on May 1, Select Committee nominated as follows:—Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM, Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH, Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. KENDALL, Mr. ST. AUBYN, Mr. COLVILLE, Mr. READ, Mr. LIDDELL, Lord EUSTACE CECIL, Mr. LEEHAN, Mr. BEACH, and Mr. KEKEWICH:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

TESTS ABOLITION (OXFORD) BILL.

[BILL 16.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. FAWCETT said, he rose to move,

It was scarcely necessary for him to occupy the House by any observations in support of the proposition. He would not enter into a discussion of the principle involved, because it appeared to him that it had been fully discussed upon the second reading of the Bill; but what he wished to submit to the House was this—if the measure be considered by Parliament a desirable one to enact, there was no reason whatever why its principle should not be extended to the University of Cambridge. There was precisely the same feeling in the University of Cambridge in favour of the abolition of these tests as there was in the University of Oxford. If therefore the Bill were passed without including the University of Cambridge in its provisions, that University would immediately come to that House for the purpose of demanding a similar measure for itself; and thus considerable time would be wasted, for the discussion on the one Bill must necessarily be repeated on the other. The same principle and precisely the same questions were involved as regarded the University of Cambridge as were involved in the discussions relating to the University of Oxford. It might, however, be urged that the University of Cambridge was not in the same position as Oxford as regarded these tests. At Oxford a man who was not a member of the Church of England was allowed to take the degree of “B.A.,” but not that of “M.A.” In Cambridge, however, a kind of compromise had been come to, by which such a person was allowed to take a barren “M.A.” which did not carry with it the privileges which attached to an “M.A.” degree in the case of Churchmen. He believed that this so-called Cambridge compromise gave very little satisfaction, and that there was the same necessity for the abolition of tests in the University of Cambridge as there was at Oxford.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to extend the provisions of the Bill to the University of Cambridge.”—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. SELWYN said, it was somewhat inconvenient to be called on to discuss a question relative to the University of Cambridge upon the consideration of a Bill which in its title, its principle, and in all its clauses related exclusively to the University of Oxford. But as most things had their bright side as well as their contrary aspect, he thought that the unusual course now taken by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) had still this advantage—that it would free them from all doubts and obscurities respecting the real objects of the promoters of the Bill. The actual question now at issue was this—whether, in an institution, of which it was admitted that distinctive religious teaching formed an essential part, there should be admitted into the governing body persons of different religious persuasions. When the second reading of the Bill was moved by his hon. Friend it was suggested by the Member for Oxford University that, with a view to a compromise, certain clauses should be introduced into the Bill which would have placed Oxford in the same position as Cambridge, and the second reading, therefore, passed without discussion. But as by the present Resolution it was sought to apply the Bill to the University of Cambridge, he asked the House to negative the proposition which was in substance one for admitting Dissenters to the governing body of that University. The hon. Member for Brighton said that if the present Bill was made applicable to Oxford only, Cambridge would come forward and ask for a similar measure; but he (Mr. Selwyn) had to inform the House, that in a full meeting of the Senate, numbering 250 persons, and in which there was a division on another subject, a petition was unanimously adopted objecting to the extension of this Bill to Cambridge. That petition stated that a very short time had elapsed since the government and religious condition of the University had been carefully considered and revised by a Royal Commission, acting under the authority of the Act of 1856; but that Act, although allowing persons who were not members of the Church to avail themselves of an University education, had specially provided that they shall not become members of the Senate. The University of Cambridge had fully acted up to what was required of it by that Act; Dissenters had been admitted to all the educational advantages of the University, irrespective of religious creeds—the colleges, halls, the scholarships, had been thrown freely open to Nonconformists. The University had not only admitted Roman Catholics and Dissenters to University honours, but they had gone beyond the pale of Christianity, and had received Jews. With regard to the local examinations, they had given certificates of qualification to ladies, which, in the view of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), might render those “persons” more fitted to sustain that benefit and position which the hon. Gentleman proposed to confer on them in the shape of the elective franchise. The same principle of unity of religious opinion in the governing bodies had been accepted by Parliament in the case of the endowed schools, for which by the Act of 1860 provision was made for admitting to the schools the children of parents not in communion with the Church of England; it was provided that Dissenters should not interfere with the governing body of these schools; and, although attempts were made in 1860 and 1861 to upset that settlement, they were so signally defeated that they had not been renewed. He might also appeal to the universal practice of Roman Catholic and Dissenting communities to preserve the unity of belief in the governing body wherever distinctive religious teaching is an essential part of the institution. It remained to consider what grievances there were that should induce the House to depart, in the case of our Universities, from principles which had been so deliberately established and so long acted on? The principal grievance stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) was that at Oxford persons who were allowed to take the B.A. were not allowed to take the M.A. degree; but that did not apply to Cambridge, because at the latter University, Dissenters might take the M.A.; and Oxford had repeatedly offered to make such a change in that respect, and also with respect to tests, as would put Oxford on a footing with Cambridge. Another alleged grievance was the tests. Now in Oxford, tests were still required on taking the M.A. degree; but at Cambridge they were not required, and members of the governing body were only asked to make the simple declaration that they were members of the Church of England. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) had adopted a statement of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that humiliating distinctions were imposed on the sons of Dissenters; but how could that be maintained when at both Universities Dissenters were allowed to go through the whole academic course, and were admitted to every scholarship and to all the honours of the University examinations without any reference to religious differences. It was not until long after they had taken their B.A. degree and left the University that any distinction arose, and then when they returned at the end of three years they were not allowed to become members of the governing body unless they declared that they were members of the Church of England. Now surely there was nothing humiliating in that, and that grievance had no real existence whatever. The arguments attempted to be drawn from the fact that these Universities were lay corporations was effectually disposed of last year, and as it was dead and buried, he had no wish to revive it. But another point was now constantly harped on, and was the battle-horse of his hon. and learned Friend—namely, that these Universities were national institutions. But a few moments’ consideration would show that there was no more substance in that argument than there was in the one lastly alluded to. No doubt they were national institutions in the same sense that the Church of England was a national institution, founded for the benefit of all the subjects of the realm, and in the sense that Parliament might in case of necessity step in and regulate them and control them; but if by national institutions was meant national institutions without reference to their original foundation and the purpose for which they existed, and that Parliament was at liberty, when no difficulty or danger called for interference, to alter the intentions and divert the purposes of the foundations, he denied that they were so. If everything national was to be dealt with at any time without reference to its original purpose and constitution, and the usages by which it was governed, to what extent would they carry it? If a gallery of pictures—the Turner Gallery, for example—were bequeathed to the nation on certain trusts, it became a national institution for the benefit of all; but would any one say that, because it was a national institution, it was competent to the Government or that House to disregard the conditions of the trust, sell the pictures, and apply the money towards the construction of iron-clads. The oft-repeated statement, therefore, that these Universities were national institutions, did not advance the case one step further. Another line of argument was that a considerable portion of the endowments of the Universities were given before the Reformation, and when the Church of England was in union with the Church of Rome; but his hon. and learned friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) was too much of a scholar and a lawyer to rest anything on such an argument, because if three centuries of possession and numerous Acts of Parliament were not sufficient to secure a title he did not know what was. The natural result of such an argument was simply that the property, not only of the Universities, but also of the Church of England and of a large number of individuals in this country ought to be handed over to the Church of Rome. Besides this, and since the Reformation, the Universities had been enriched by many benefactions, which had been given solely on the ground that the Universities were Church of England institutions. In addition to that, could it be said that because the Universities had been so liberal as to extend the benefits originally intended for one class to all classes and creeds, they were now to be placed in a worse position than if they had confined the Universities strictly to their original purposes? He would again appeal to the practice of the Dissenting communities, and would ask hon. Members who were interested in their endowments to consider what would be the effect of one of the arguments used in favour of this Bill upon Nonconformists as well as upon the members of the Established Church—namely, the argument that because so large a portion of the population had severed from the Church of England the members of the governing body should no longer be exclusively members of that Church. The Dissenting communities would not adopt that principle in their own case; for, as he ventured to remind the House, it was contrary to what they had repeatedly contended for in our Courts of Justice. Our law books were full of cases in which Baptists, Presbyterians, and other bodies who had been the subject of such dissensions, had successfully established the principle that persons choosing to leave their communion forfeited the right they before possessed of being members of the governing body. Were they, then, to apply a different rule to the Universities? and if so, must it not also apply to the different Dissenting communities? Lord Brougham was of that opinion with regard to pecuniary endowments; and the same principle applied with greater force to the powers of the governing body, and if they had no right to enjoy any portion of a pecuniary endowment under such circumstances, much less ought they to have any control over the whole of the institution. If, however, that principle was established in these days of toleration, they must have in the Senate and the Convocation representatives of all the varying shades of opinions, and he need hardly ask hon. Members what the effect of that must necessarily be. The effect would be either to destroy the religious teaching of those Universities or make the Senate House and Convocation the arena of religious controversy. The experiment had been repeatedly tried in America, Ireland, England, and other countries, but it had failed. It was also said that the few who would be admitted to the governing body would be a small minority, and that no practical injury would result to the Universities; but a small minority had many ways of making itself felt, such as by watching the opportunity, when two parties were equally balanced, of swaying the decision. They would also be able to raise such constant discussion on any given subject so that for the sake of peace almost anything would be yielded to obtain that repose which was so desirable, and which might not otherwise be obtained. Those controversies had hitherto been avoided with great advantage to the Universities, and he was surprised that his hon. and learned Friend should advocate their introduction into such a place. He would rest the opposition to the Bill on the firm and deliberate decisions of Parliament, on the practice of the Universities and of the Dissenting communities, and on the fact that the proposed alteration in the constitution of the Universities was not founded on any real or substantial grievance.

MR. NEATE said, that the only question was whether they ought to have separate legislation for Cambridge and Oxford. In his opinion, whatever might be the disadvantages or advantages attending the measure, both the Universities ought to be placed in the same position. He appealed to Members of the University opposite whether they would insist upon Oxford University being isolated solely on account of its connection with the Church of England.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he desired to explain the vote he was about to give in favour of the Instruction. He acknowledged that his position was one of some difficulty and peculiarity on this subject. Whilst he thought that considerable changes might be made in the Universities as to the admission of Dissenters and on matters of endowment, he could not question that securities should be taken to preserve the present system of religious education, which was obtained both at Oxford and Cambridge. There was another principle that he held by very strongly—namely, that this was a question that could not be dealt with by partial legislation. These objects can be obtained only by some general compromise, and no such compromise has yet been suggested likely to meet the approval of the House. Then he thought that it was impossible to draw any broad line of distinction between the Universities and the colleges; that the religious questions arising out of their constitutions should be considered as a whole, and that the two Universities should be dealt with in common. So that, although he could not support the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Brighton declared a principle which he was well able to indorse. He had the greatest possible objection to varieties of legislation in matters of this kind, which should be dealt with upon principles common to the whole country. It was easy to understand how it was that the Universities were not now on the same footing. When the Oxford University Bill was introduced into Parliament it contained no provisions whatever relating to religious disabilities; and the House inserted certain provisions of that nature against the will of the Administration. When, two years afterwards, the University of Cambridge came to be dealt with by a general Act, the opinion of Parliament had still further advanced; and more extended provisions than those in the Oxford Bill were introduced in the Bill for Cambridge. Hence the present variation, which he did not think should be maintained, much less extended. Whatever were the claims of the Dissenters, they were the same on the one University as on the other; and he did not despair of seeing the time when, by some abatement of extreme views, both the colleges and the Universities might be dealt with by a comprehensive measure.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE was glad the Instruction had been moved, so far as it simplified the question. The Bill was now proposed as one which should deal with both the Universities, and he therefore opposed that Instruction as a Cambridge man. He was quite willing—nay, anxious—to see Oxford placed on the same footing as that which Cambridge occupied at present, and not only so, but he would not refuse the Parliamentary franchise to the graduates of either University, but that was not what the Instruction of the hon. Member for Brighton asked for. The Instruction called on the House to place Cambridge by anticipation on a less desirable footing, the footing of the future Oxford, the nature of which was to be decided on hereafter, and that he objected to. He had already protested on a former evening against the process of dry nursing the Universities; and he was afraid he could not now acquit his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter of having put on the mob-cap and attempted to dandle the infant. With reference to the whole question, he regarded the grievance of the Dissenters, for the most part, as a sentimental one. Nonconformists, it was said, were placed in a humiliating position; but to what extent was this charge true? The Nonconformist undergraduate was treated the same as his fellows in respect to degrees; the social life of the University was the same for all. He himself had the honour of being the friend and contemporary at Trinity College, Cambridge, under the old exclusive system, of the noble Lord the Member for Arundel (Lord E. Howard), and of the hon. Member for Hythe (Baron M. Rothschild), and since that time the Oxford and Cambridge University Reform Bills had been passed. That Nonconformists should be able to reach all the honours and distinguished positions to which a man of intellect was able to attain in the course of his educational career was surely not a condition of humiliation. It was well that the degrees were open to Nonconformists, but it was not well that the concessions now asked for should be made; indeed, it was impossible to grant them without undermining the basis of the collegiate system. In this was to be found the fallacy of the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend every time he spoke upon the subject, and argued that he would throw open the University and keep the Colleges closed up. Without a revolution and upsetting the whole existing system, they could not separate the Universities from the Colleges. They could not deal with one without affecting the other, and they could not throw open the government in the University to Dissenters without giving them a share in the fellowships of the Colleges. He did not, of course, deny the greater antiquity and independent origin of the University. But in the course of centuries the University and the Colleges had interpenetrated until it was impossible to disentangle the complication. He admitted that, in a certain sense, the Universities were lay corporations and national institutions; but they were pre-eminently the seminaries for the education of the clergy, so educated in company with the elite of the lay members of the Established Church. Did they desire to sacrifice this peculiar advantage? They must recollect that one distinguishing characteristic of the English clergy was their social position—that they were on a level in education with the laity, moved socially among them, and had an influence as intelligent leaders of public opinion that was not enjoyed by the clergy of any other Christian community. The clergy of the Church of Rome separated from their childhood for that profession, and refused social ties, were educated together in ecclesiastical seminaries; the ministers, on the other hand, of Protestant communities abroad were not conceded equal social equality with the gentry and nobility of the land. The happy and exceptional position of the clergy of the Church of England was, he believed, in great measure due to the fact of those Universities and Colleges in which they received their education being, at the same time, the place of the highest secular instruction. Was the House, he asked, prepared to abandon this tried advantage for an uncertain good? Were they prepared to make the clergy of the Church of England mere seminarists; or would they attempt the other solution and produce a happy family, by maintaining a national religious establishment in connection with the Universities, but forbidding it to possess any distinctive creed till it became what the noble Lord the Member for Nottingham had suggested in the Fortnightly Review—that an established Church ought to be—a body which would include the unbeliever as well as the believer of the creed, and in which the clergyman need no more be assumed to believe in the prayers which he read than the town crier is assumed to do in the truth of the announcements to which he gives currency. The hon. and learned Gentleman pressed them with the demand, why were they afraid of those small results which, as he contended, would alone flow from the Bill? He asked over and over again, was it worth while to oppose so harmless a proposal so strongly? But he (Mr. Beresford Hope), saw that the efforts which had been made to push the Bill were so ostentatiously great that it was obvious that its supporters did not consider it an unimportant matter; but that they believed that if it were agreed to, the result would be to force a large proportion of the Dissenting element into the government of the University. He defied them to admit the Nonconformists to the Senate and the Convocation, and to insure that the Colleges would five years hence be as they are at present. On these accounts he felt bound to oppose the Instruction; he did not do so because he wished to prevent Dissenters from enjoying all honours and distinctions attainable in a University, but because he believed that a liberal and tolerant Church of England, supported by its Universities, was a national safeguard; a safeguard, not only to its own members, but also to all orthodox Christians, Nonconformists as well as Churchmen, who valued the truths of Christ's religion preserved and taught by the Church of Christ.

MR. COLERIDGE said, he must respectfully decline to be drawn into a discussion of the general question. The principle of the Bill had been twice discussed and twice accepted by the House—once last year, by a large majority, and again this year without a division. There was a great inconvenience in hon. Gentlemen taking more than a year to prepare their replies, and then answering speeches delivered by him (Mr. Coleridge) a long while ago. The speech they had just heard was a speech against the principle of the Bill; and, with the greatest respect for his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Selwyn), he must say that it ought to have been delivered, if at all, on some former occasion. The present issue was extremely short and definite—namely, whether the two Universities should be placed on the same footing; and he thought it inexpedient to continue a discussion on the general principles of the Bill which hon. Members had raised in their endeavours to combat arguments which had fallen from himself in the course of two speeches—one delivered thirteen months and the other four or five weeks ago, and which they might have heard and answered at the proper time if they had chosen to do so. The principles of the Bill had been already accepted by the House by a decision with which he, for one, was perfectly content, and he trusted the House would confine itself to the question before it.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE remarked that he had a Notice on the Paper which proposed to place Oxford on the same footing as Cambridge was now; and he wished to point out that to pass the Instruction would imply legislation with respect to Cambridge, whereas, the object of his Amendment was to restrain legislation for Oxford within the limits of the Acts relating to Cambridge.

MR. HENLEY thought it hardly fair for the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) to complain of discussion on the general principles of the Bill, since it was impossible to ascertain the probable effect of the proposed Instruction without doing so. He agreed that the two Universities should be identical in position; but the Instruction did not go precisely in that direction. They had before them a Bill in which there were many things they did not like, and they were asked to say that they would apply those things to both Universities. He objected to the Instruction because it invited them to take a leap in the dark; they were asked to pledge themselves to do a certain harm to Cambridge which they had not made up their minds to inflict upon Oxford. However much the House desired to put the Universities on the same footing, it surely did not desire to put them on an evil footing. He, for one, did not, and therefore should vote against the Instruction and in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Baronet (Sir William Heathcote). He believed the two Universities would then be placed in precisely the same position; but he would not vote for applying a Bill to Cambridge till he knew how they were going to affect Oxford. He recommended the hon. Member for Brighton to withdraw his Motion, and when in Committee to move the addition of a clause extending the Bill to Cambridge.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the line of argument adopted by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge), that because he had made a speech upon the Bill on moving the second reading no further discussion ought to take place now when he proposed to extend the principle to Cambridge, was, to say the least of it, a little singular. He (Mr. Newdegate) was perfectly willing to admit to the full benefit of membership, without any degrading and dishonourable distinctions, all the subjects of the Queen who might choose to resort there, without reference to the religious communion to which they might belong or to the religious opinions which they might hold. No man should consider himself degraded because he was not admitted to the government of an institution to which he belonged; and he could not help remarking upon the arrogant temper of modern Liberalism, in claiming a sort of exclusive knowledge of what was required by the educated classes. He was of opinion that the Universities ought to be preserved as the nurseries of the clergy of the Church of England. That opinion might be right or wrong; but he could not understand the arrogant and arbitrary tone of those who attempted to force this measure upon the House. He hoped, however, that they would continue to preserve that tone, being convinced that it would tend to produce considerable re-action in the minds of the intelligent classes, and open their eyes to the real character of such liberalism.

MR. FAWCETT was about to address the House, in reply, when—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to reply. The Amendment is simply that it be an Instruction to the Committee to include Cambridge in the scope of the Bill.

TELLERS.

Selwyn, C. J.
 Hope, B.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

MR. SELWYN urged that the University of Cambridge and its representatives had had no opportunity of considering the principle of the Bill, since at the second reading its operation was proposed to be confined to Oxford. He thought they were entitled to such an opportunity before the measure proceeded further, and to put himself in order he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. COLERIDGE expressed surprise at such an objection being taken, for his hon. and learned Friend, as also the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope), had on previous occasions taken part in the discussion of this measure. The Bill was very short. It proposed to admit Dissenters to the Convocation of Oxford, and if extended to Cambridge, would, of course, admit them to the Senate of that University. He hoped the Motion would not be pressed.

MR. SELWYN, in explanation, remarked that on the second reading the Bill was confined to Oxford, and the hon. Member for that University (Sir William Heathcote) intimated his intention to propose Amendments which would he hoped be accepted. It would therefore have appeared a waste of time for the friends of Cambridge to take part in the discussion; but by the Instruction the Bill altered the position in which Cambridge was at present placed, and they ought to have an opportunity of considering it.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that until five minutes ago this was an Oxford Bill, and Cambridge now found itself in the position of a measure having been read a second time, by which its internal constitution was vitally affected. Under these circumstances, it was only fair that the Senate of Cambridge should have an opportunity of considering it.

Motion negatived.

Clause 1 (Persons taking Lay Academical Degrees not to be required to take any Religious Oath or subscribe any Formulary of Faith).

MR. WALPOLE asked, whether the hon. Members in charge of the Bill had considered the form of the Amendments which would be necessary in order to carry out the Instruction. The term Convocation was not applicable to Cambridge.

MR. FAWCETT said, it would be sufficient in most cases to add the words "and Cambridge."

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he had given notice of two Amendments, the object of which was to bring the University of Oxford to the position in which Cambridge now stood; but, after the division which had taken place, he felt that it would be useless to go to a division, though he wished to place his Amendments on record.

Amendments proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, line 16, after "thereof," insert "except being or becoming a member of the Convocation of the said University."

"And any person who shall have obtained any such degree as now confers a title on the holder thereof to become a member of the said Convocation shall thereby, and although he shall not have subscribed such articles or formulary, nor have made nor taken such declaration or oath, be entitled to obtain, under the provisions and subject to the other conditions of the Act of the seventeenth and eighteenth Victoria, chapter eighty-one, a licence to open his residence for the reception of students."—(Sir William Heathcote.)

MR. COLERIDGE said, that he must oppose the Amendments, for he considered that the only hope of effecting any good by the Bill was to pass it in its integrity. At the same time, in reference to the colleges, he wished to say that he had no desire to touch them, and he believed that they were wholly unaffected by the operation of the Bill; but if any hon. Member could point to any words that could be construed into any interference with the present condition of the colleges, he should be prepared to amend them.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

ASSOCIATIONS OF WORKMEN BILL.

(Mr. Neate, Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. NEATE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, explained, that in proposing this measure he had no intention of impugning the recent judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, which if questioned at all ought to be appealed against in the House of Lords; but simply wished to restore to trade societies that right of summary process before a magistrate against a defaulting treasurer which prior to that judgment they practically enjoyed. The recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench had virtually taken away this power from trades union societies, and had placed them almost out of the pale of the law. Another effect of that judgment was, that the duty was thrown upon the magistrate of deciding upon the nature of any particular society that might appear before him, as to whether it was or was not of a political character—a duty which he believed that they were unwilling, and might in some cases be incompetent, to discharge. The right of combination for the purpose of reducing the hours of work or of raising the price of labour, was conferred upon workmen as far back as the year 1818; but the effect of the recent judgment would be, that any arrangement of this sort, however expressly it might exclude anything like the exercise of violence, might come within the principle laid down by the learned Judge, and thus drive the society from its legal status. He therefore felt that the Legislature was called upon to interfere for the purpose of remedying the inconveniences that attended the present position of these societies. The question was not whether trades unions were societies which deserved special encouragement, but whether they were of so pernicious a character that they ought to be excluded from advantages extended to harmless societies. With the economical character of trades unions the House had nothing to do; and if they were political bodies they were only slightly so. But were they not of use in preventing violence and the destruction of property? Some time ago a glowing account was published of the excellent relations existing between the Belgian workmen and their employers; but soon after that we heard of a very formidable outbreak on the part of some of those workmen. Even if there were no trades unions we could not prevent differences from arising between employers and the employed; and if the workmen had not an opportunity of constantly conferring together, their feelings might become aroused to a dangerous degree, and in case of a strike, having no funds to fall back upon, some of them might be tempted to have recourse to plunder and the destruction of property. He trusted the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time as an admission of the difficulty which existed, and that Government would introduce a measure on the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Neate.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was quite impossible for the Government to assent to the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press it. The objections he had to the Bill were founded on no reflections upon trades unions, nor upon any considerations of a political nature; nor was it because he thought these societies were contrary to public policy:—he objected to the Bill because it proceeded on the unprecedented principle of asking the sanction of the Legislature to an existing and continuing violation of the law. This was not a case in which the hon. Member having charge of the Bill said the law was wrong, and asked to have it repealed. Neither did the hon. and learned Gentleman ask for a mere indemnity for past and completed errors. These would be two intelligible propositions. But admitting, as he did, that the law had been violated—that the Courts of Law had declared the constitution of these societies to be illegal—the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed that, without an alteration of the law which had been so violated, legislative sanction and encouragement should be given to all societies continuing in a like course of illegality. Such a proposition was so inconsistent with every idea of legislation that he was surprised it should have been brought before the House. By the Friendly Societies Act of 1854 it was enacted that certain facilities should be given to societies of that kind, provided certain rules were complied with, and provided those societies were established for purposes not illegal. It appeared that the treasurer of a certain trades union was in default; proceedings against him were taken before the magistrates, when the objection was taken that the society was illegal, and that therefore the magistrate could not exercise any jurisdiction. Ultimately the case was brought to the Queen's Bench, which Court decided that it could not give the society relief in any way as against its defaulting treasurer. That decision was based, not on the fact that the society in question was a trades union, but on the fact that its rules were illegal, and consequently, that the society could not claim the benefit of the provision in the Friendly Societies Act. If his hon. and learned Friend objected to that decision, he could advise the society to go to the Court of Error. But, as he understood him, he did not object to it; neither did he ask the House to repeal the law; but he said, "Let the law continue as it is; let those societies continue to be illegal; I ask no alteration of the law respecting them; I ask that they may continue in their violation of the law, but that while so continuing they may have all the privileges to which they would be entitled if they were acting in conformity to the law." Now, he submitted that such a proposition was self-contradictory. He could understand an application from his hon. and learned Friend to have the benefits of the Friendly Societies Act extended to such trades unions as altered their rules so as to make them legal, and to have the Bill granting such extension retrospective so far as to include the liability of treasurers of such unions for money paid into their hands before the rules had been altered; but the proposition now before the House was one to which the Government could not give their consent, and he had to repeat the expression of his hope that his hon. and learned Friend would not press it.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES said, the remedy suggested by the hon. and learned Attorney General was quite impracticable. One of the objects of these societies was to assist their brethren when out of work, and to ask them to repeal the rules to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred was simply asking them to extinguish themselves. He did not want to go into the question as to whether trades unions were good or whether they were bad. Those societies were in existence, and acting, as they believed, in such a manner as to give them the benefit of the 44th section of the Friendly Societies Act. The members had for the last thirteen years been paying in sums of money to their treasurers, which sums, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, were completely jeopardized. He knew a good deal of the circumstances connected with the framing of that 44th section. At the time it was under consideration persons interested in trades unions got the highest opinion that their rules were legal. No doubt, the very eminent gentleman who gave the opinion meant that the rules were not illegal in a sense which would render the members of the unions liable to a criminal prosecution; but the persons who consulted him understood the opinion to be that the rules were legal in the sense that would entitle the unions to the benefits of the provision in the 44th clause of the Friendly Societies Act, and, accordingly, they deposited their rules with the Registrar of the Friendly Societies in order that their unions might be brought under the Act. In point of fact, these societies thought that their rules had been sanctioned by a Government officer; and he might remark that three years ago the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), after careful consideration of the subject, allowed societies registered under the 44th clause to deposit their surplus funds in the Government savings banks. The number of these societies was forty-four. One of them had upwards of 33,000 members and a spare capital of £150,000; and branches of it were established not only in the large towns of the United Kingdom, but also in the United States and the colonies. Then there was the Society of Amalgamated Carpenters and Joiners, with upwards of 200 branches and a fund of between £14,000 and £15,000. The funds of these societies were in the hands of their officers in every part of the country, who, unless some such measure as the present were carried, might pocket the money with impunity, as it had been decided that, as the law now stood, the societies had no remedy whatever. Now, what would be the effect produced on the minds of the members of these societies if they were left entirely without remedy—if they had no means of protecting their funds against frauds on the part of their officers? The effect of throwing out the Bill would be the exciting a sense of injustice in the minds of all the members of these societies, and which would make them very discontented, whereas at present they were all loyal and well-affected citizens.

MR. POWELL thought that while the Commission was pursuing its inquiries the House ought to preserve a strict silence on the subject of these societies. There had been nothing in the action of Parliament during the last fifteen years which could be regarded as a recognition of those societies, and the House could not be held responsible for any misconstruction of the law under which they had acted. If the wide question of illegality were dealt with on the ground of restraint of trade their legislation would have to embrace not only trades unions but also masters. But though he had objections to the Bill, he did not wish it to be inferred that he was averse to some alteration of the law. Considering the number of men and the amount of capital in these societies he thought that their case ought to be considered by Parliament in a fair and friendly spirit. He thought it would be better if the present Bill were withdrawn and a special measure brought in.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that if he were a party man he should be enchanted at the course taken by the Government on this subject; since what they were now doing took away all the grace from the concession they had made in granting an inquiry into the subject of trades unions. As far as mere words went, nothing could sound fairer than to say to the unions—Set yourselves right before the law, and we will then see what can be done for you. But, what was the fact? The law which they were said to have violated was a mine sprung under them. No one dreamt of it until the recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. Under the power which our law allowed the Judges to assume, of declaring that whatever was in restraint of trade was illegal, anything might be made law; but when a law was made in this way, it was to all intents and purposes a new law. As the law which these societies were said to have violated was a law of which they and everybody else had been entirely ignorant, the only rational course was to preserve the status quo until the whole subject had been reconsidered, which would only be done by legalizing provisionally the course which the societies had pursued, and allowing them to continue in that course until a final settlement was come to. It was a highly demoralizing practice to attempt to prevent people from doing what it was desired they should not do, not by punishing them, but by enabling any scoundrel to plunder them—by granting him complete immunity for acts which in any other case would be severely punished. The Legislature should not employ the vices of mankind, but their virtues, to carry out its intentions. It would have been infinitely better for these societies to have punished their officers criminally, than to put the societies themselves out of the protection of the law.

MR. BARROW said, that trades unions had been sailing under false colours, and had called themselves friendly societies, when, in fact, they were political associations. The Judges had declared that their rules were contrary to law; and now the House was asked to restore rights which never existed; for the object of the Bill was to enable societies to recover from their officers monies levied for illegal purposes. It would be better, in his opinion, that the Bill should be withdrawn.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate was adjourned till To-morrow.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—RITUALISTIC PRACTICES.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that in the course of the discussion raised by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Westmeath) on Tuesday last on the subject of Ritualistic Practices in the Church of England, he was reported to have said that the noble Marquess had omitted to read an important passage from a document which he had in his possession, and which passage he himself, in following the noble Marquess, read to the House. He was at the time under the impression that he was quoting from a duplicate of a paper in the hands of the noble Marquess; but he had since received a communication from him to the effect that he was mistaken in that impression, and that the document used by the noble Marquess did not contain the sentence in question, and he had therefore no hesitation in retracting the charge founded upon it which he had made, and in admitting that no charge could arise out of it against the noble Marquess.

CANADA RAILWAY LOAN BILL—(No. 73.) (The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, in moving that the Bill be now read the third time, said, it was not a measure emanating from Her Majesty's present Government, but was for the completion of negotiations which had been carried on with successive Governments for many years past. The proposal contained in the Bill was, that this country should guarantee the interest of a loan of £3,000,000 for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. When the proposal first assumed a definite form, some six years ago, the contemplated arrangements were of a complicated character, owing to the necessity of dealing with three separate colonies, and determining as to what proportion of the loan was to be guaranteed by each Province, and as to the works to be undertaken by each Province. But the Act which had already passed through the Imperial Parliament, and received the Royal Assent that Session, had simplified that question by reducing the arrangement to one between the Imperial Government and the confederated Provinces. The guarantee had therefore taken the shape of a simple guarantee by this country to the one Dominion of Canada, and an engagement by Canada that, before that guarantee was given, the confederate Provinces would, by an Act of the new confederate Parliament, sanction and authorize the construction of a railway, the charge on the consolidated revenues of Canada of the interest of the loan, with a sinking fund which has been agreed at 1 per cent per annum on the total amount of the capital guaranteed; and also of the charge—which was one of considerable importance—upon the consolidated revenues of Canada, next after the charges of the interest and the sinking fund, of whatever sum might be necessary (beyond the £3,000,000 guaranteed), for the completion of the railway, without any Imperial guarantee. It was unnecessary at that stage to enter into the question of the merits or demerits of the particular scheme. Originating as it did in the first instance in the decision of the then Government of this country that it was essential that a line of communication should be constructed to connect Canada with a port under the control and dominion of the Imperial authorities, it had never ceased to be an object of solicitude on the part both of the Provinces and of the Imperial Government that the scheme should be brought to completion. That original project of a military road to be constructed at the sole cost of the Imperial Government had been gradually developed into the scheme which it was now proposed should be completed, of a railway communicating between the Canadian system of railways and the port of Halifax. Up to the time of the agreement for a confederation between our North-American Provinces it might have been very fairly argued that Canada had no such great interest in that scheme as would have induced her to complete it, because her commerce, if it passed over the proposed railway to the sea, would still have had to pass over a line and to a port which was not in her own hands. But the Confederation between the different Provinces now changed the position of Canada in that respect, and by the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, Canada would obtain a communication with the sea at Halifax, passing entirely through a country and to a port under her own control. Looking at the progress which Canada had made during the last thirty years, the importance to that colony of having a communication between her system of railways and a seaport under her own control could hardly be over-rated. It had been said that this railway, even if made, would pass through an inhospitable country, with a scanty population and few resources, and that it would be closed during many months of the year; but there had been no evidence of this. There might be times during which a railway in that country would be closed for a few days at the commencement of the snow, or at the break up of the frost; but all the experience of the results of the working of the Canadian and American railways showed that afterwards there was hardly any other stoppage of the traffic throughout the year. It was quite unfounded to assert that this guarantee was given as a bribe to Canada to enter into the Confederation of the Provinces. It had never been the policy of this country to enter into engagements of such a kind. The proposal for the Confederation was brought forward by the Provinces themselves with a view to develop the commerce and resources of the country, and they might fairly ask the assistance of the mother country to aid in a measure which would strengthen their means of self-defence. Ample security, in the ordinary sense of the word, had been offered that this loan should be repaid, and that no undue charge or heavy burden should fall on this country. It was impossible to give a guarantee without being liable to the extent of that guarantee; but those who brought forward the measure had satisfied themselves that it would not ultimately impose any burden on the taxpayers of this country. No one could doubt that this Intercolonial Railway would lead to such a development of the resources of the country, and to such an increase of the population, that it would enable the inhabitants of the colony to bear the taxation required to meet the guarantee almost without feeling it. A former guarantee of one-half the amount now asked for, but given at a time when the population and revenues of Canada were much smaller, and given, moreover, at a period of great depression, had been repaid in full a considerable period before it was really and strictly due, and had been repaid not with borrowed money, but out of the revenue of the colony. After the examination and scrutiny which this measure had undergone from the late Duke of Newcastle, and many of his predecessors, and also from the House of Commons, he felt confident that their Lordships would not refuse their assent to this measure; but would, by sanctioning the loan, enable the Provinces to commence, with the new system of Government, and with the establishment of the Confederation, a work which they and the Imperial Government had pronounced essential for the development of their resources, and which was necessary to give them the undivided control and power over that which would be to the sea through a great portion of the year their only access.

—(The Duke of Buckingham.)

LORD LYVEDEN said, he did not intend to oppose the Bill, although he entertained strong objections to its principle. Coming as it did before their Lordships as a loan Bill, they were almost incapable of introducing any Amendments into it. The noble Duke had referred to the approval of this scheme by preceding Governments; but when Minister after Minister of both parties had proposed such schemes as the present, it behoved those who did not belong to either of those Ministries to look all the more sharply into similar proposals. It was idle to talk of a guarantee of this kind not involving any real burden; because, as had been said by one of our greatest financiers, if the Government went into the money-market and attempted to borrow money, after having given such a guarantee, they could not do so on such favourable terms as if no such guarantee had been given. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) in introducing the Bill in the other House adopted an apologetic tone, admitting that such guarantees were objectionable, and that this was a deviation from the policy which had been pursued by successive statesmen, but arguing that the case was exceptional. He (Lord Lyveden) was at a loss, however, to discover any exceptional circumstances which were always suspicious. The preamble of the Bill stated that the railway would conduce to the welfare of Canada, and would promote the interests of the British Empire; it had not, however, yet even been decided what route should be adopted, and the lines which had been constructed as commercial speculations had not proved remunerative. He could only conclude, therefore, that what was meant was the defence of Canada. This was a difficult subject; but he believed the majority of military authorities—and he was speaking in the presence of an illustrious Duke who was the highest military authority—were of opinion that the proposed railway would not answer that purpose, and that the defence of such a line of frontier as that of Canada would be impossible without more fortifications and more men. Such a defence could only be directed against the United States. Now, he objected to this continual introduction of this question of defence; for though he did not believe the United States were inclined to attack Canada, he thought it was unwise to be thus continually holding up perpetual warnings to the United States of the defenceless state of our frontiers, and offering constant temptation to aggression. Moreover, if we should ever be embroiled with the United States it would be very inexpedient to carry on war on the most disadvantageous ground that could be selected. The inhospitable nature of the country was really its best defence; whereas if this railway fell into the hands of the enemy it would become a useful instrument of aggression. He should like also to know why the Canadians could not undertake the works contemplated by the Bill themselves? We ought to let our colonies rest on their own responsibility. It was true that we ought to set them afloat; but after we had once set them going they ought to be able to take care of themselves without further help from the mother country. If this country went on lending money in this way whenever it was asked for, it was impossible that the Canadians would ever think of relying solely upon themselves. It was true that they offered a gallant resistance to the Fenian raids; but he understood that they had done little or nothing towards the fortification of Montreal, which it had been agreed should be undertaken by them, while we bore the cost of fortifying Quebec. The defence of the colony ought to rest on the public spirit of the people and on their determination to repel aggression from any quarter; but as long as we went on lending them money and guaranteeing their loans, it was hardly in human nature to expect that they would show any self-reliance. We had withdrawn our troops from New Zealand, and, according to Sir George Grey, the results had been most salutary; but a contrary policy towards Canada would incite the people to extort money from the mother country, for they would know that they had only to raise the bugbear of an American invasion in order to procure immediate assistance. As long as we let it be understood that war with Canada meant war with England, we offered a temptation to the United States to threaten our frontier, and encouraged the colonists to rely upon us instead of upon themselves.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I heard my noble Friend who has just sat down say that it was very unwise to be constantly calling out that Canada was defenceless.

I quite agree with my noble Friend ; but, if that be so, I think your Lordships have reason to complain of my noble Friend's speech, which dwelt chiefly on that very theme. I confess I am apt to think that, though there may be difficulties in such a course, and that such a course may promise small advantages and great risk, yet we are bound, from a feeling of national honour, to support our colonists, who are subjects of our Queen, in carrying out their loyal views, and it is quite possible that the difficulties which stand in the way of our doing so may be overcome. It is not for me to say what may be the military defence of Canada. We all know that there is a very extensive frontier to be defended, and that the United States are very populous ; and we have seen of late years that they can place on foot an immense and efficient army in a short time. All this is known to all the world ; it does not require that we or the United States should proclaim it ; and the passing of this Bill cannot be considered as the proclamation of any fact of which the Americans are not already cognizant. Still, we have seen that a country like this may be able to accomplish very difficult things. The defence of Canada would, no doubt, be very difficult ; but it has often occurred to me that if our ancestors had acted upon the same timid views which some persons entertain, the state of things would now be very different. If, for instance, our statesmen about a century and a half ago thought it right to defend Portugal, a small country having a comparatively extensive frontier conterminous with Spain, and did it with success, the defence of a colony like Canada may not be so hopeless as my noble Friend supposes. Portugal was apparently at the mercy of Spain. But Spain was not the only country which Portugal had to dread. France was afterwards united with Spain by a family compact, and both those countries were able to throw a seemingly overwhelming force upon Portugal, which there was every likelihood of their being able to overrun and conquer. Nevertheless, we kept to our treaty with Portugal, and we were always ready to give her assistance. It might be said that there were difficulties which both France and Spain had to encounter in carrying out their designs against Portugal. But there came a time when the Sovereign of France was the greatest general of modern times, and had the largest armies at his disposal. You would think, then, that the case was quite hopeless, for here were 300,000 or

400,000 men who could be always sent under one of the great Marshals of the Empire against her, and Portugal must have been lost. But we, too, had a great general ; but, above all, we had spirit and determination to defend Portugal, because she was our friend and ally, and that defence succeeded. There still remains the treaty ; there still remains Portugal ; and I defy you to say that the defence of Canada is a bit more difficult than the defence of Portugal at that time. I will not attempt to show the way in which we could defend Canada—that is a question for military authorities. But there is this great consideration—which affects all the Powers of the world—that a State, however great, has often a difficulty to encounter which may make her hesitate to go to war ; because, although conquest may be apparently easy, it may lead to other wars, or may excite jealousy and hostility of other Powers. Therefore, a country which may be disposed to enter upon a war of aggression is often deterred from doing so. I do not know, for instance, that any one could say that Belgium would be able to resist the whole power of France if directed against her, or that Sweden could resist the power of Russia if turned against her. But there is a sense among great Powers that an unprincipled aggression solely for the sake of ambition may be the cause of very great misfortunes to the people that make it. These attempts, therefore, that seem so easy from a military point of view are not attempted. That appears to me to be something like the position of the United States in relation to Canada. My noble Friend has said that if we have any honour among us an unprincipled attack upon Canada would give rise to a war between us and the United States. That is a motive, and I trust long will be a motive, with the United States for refraining from such an attack. It is impossible not to see that the United States must be sensible that in a war with England they should have to take the chances which might occur—the chances of great loss, of immense cost—and, probably, at the end of the war, the United States might not be in possession of Canada, and might not have been in any sense gainers by the war. These are considerations which affect statesmen and rulers ; and thus the safety of weaker States is secured, which otherwise would appear hopeless. My noble Friend says we must take away our troops from Canada, as we have done from New Zealand and other colonies. But it is to be observed with regard to New Zealand, the Cape, and every other colony of ours, that we have no great land frontier exposed to attack, and that no one of our colonies except Canada has a great State bordering on it. Therefore, it may be wise to keep troops in Canada even when we withdraw them from New Zealand. For my own part I think it wise, and great military authorities have been of the same opinion. I do not think it would be good policy to leave Canada without defence. Undoubtedly we expect that when these different colonies of North America enter into confederation, and comprise a population of 4,000,000 under one Government, they will furnish a sufficient army to defend themselves; but, at the same time, we must give them certain assistance and encouragement. There is no doubt that at the first blush it would appear a very difficult thing indeed if you were on unfriendly terms with the United States, to defend Canada from aggression. But, for my own part, it seems to me that, having the New World open to her, the United States are very likely to spread their colonization rather to the West and South than to the North. I do not expect, therefore, unless there be cause for it on other grounds, that the United States will attack Canada merely, as my noble Friend says, for the vexation of this country. I think the statesmen of the United States are generally very wise and far-seeing men, and I do not believe they are likely to go to war with England for any such purpose. It is true that even respectable newspapers in the United States are always declaiming against England; but I do not think her statesmen would think of attacking Canada for the mere purpose of annoyance. I do not think, therefore, that there is any such insuperable difficulty in point of policy as should induce us to do that which is dishonourable—for it would be dishonourable to desert the Queen's subjects, who look to you for protection—and therefore I heartily give my assent to the proposal contained in this Bill.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, as the defence of Canada has been much referred to in the course of this discussion, I wish to say a few words. I confess I rejoice that this measure for a Confederation has been brought forward, and that it has been accompanied by a project for the proposed railway, which in a military point of view cannot fail to be of the greatest importance. The defence of Canada without such a railway presents much difficulty. We have seen in late years the inconvenience which results from the fact that during a considerable period of the year we are deprived of any direct communication with the Upper Provinces. As your Lordships know, it is only during a portion of the year that the great river St. Lawrence can be navigated, and that in the winter months the Upper Provinces are to a great extent, for military purposes, cut off from communication with the mother country. This railway, if completed, will form a connecting link at all periods of the year between the mother country and the North-American Provinces. On that ground alone I believe it is of Imperial interest that this railway should be completed; and if the measure now before your Lordships produces that result, I think it would be of signal benefit. My noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) has dwelt strongly upon the difficulty of defending the Canadian frontier. But, though that operation may be one of considerable difficulty, it ought not to be treated as impossible. Indeed, I see no reason why, however arduous the task may seem, it may not be accomplished; because in war some of the greatest operations which appeared to be almost impossible, yet by talent, perseverance, energy, and courage have been carried out with entire success. As far as the Imperial Government are concerned, they have already shown their desire to do their part. The defences of Quebec have already been taken in hand, and I trust that Quebec will soon become a powerful and important fortress. Montreal also requires defence, and I trust that the delay which has taken place in providing for its defence has only been caused by the feeling that the question of the Confederation ought first to be considered and dealt with. I do hope that, seeing the anxiety of the mother country to support the object of the Confederation, the colonists will now think the time has come to put their shoulders to the wheel, and do all that in them lies for the protection of their extended frontier. The matter is one which depends in a great measure upon themselves, and I hope that the good feeling shown on our part will encourage them to do that which, as I know, they were certainly at one time disposed to do—look after the defence of their own territory. I am entirely of opinion that if the loyalty and devotion which have been hitherto displayed by the colonists should continue to increase, after the Confederation is established, as it has increased up to this time, Canada will before long, in men and material, be able to defend itself. I mean, of course, that she will do this as far as her power and means go, and not that she will be able to dispense with Imperial aid. As to the entire removal of the Imperial troops, that is out of the question. My noble Friend (Earl Russell) has pointed out that most of our colonies are so situated that they have no frontier to defend. Canada, on the contrary, has a most extended frontier, and it would be an absurdity to leave such a colony wholly denuded of Imperial troops, though, of course, the number of those troops ought to be as much reduced as can safely be done. All that is wanted is a small compact force as a nucleus round which the colonists may rally. It must give the greatest satisfaction to every Englishman to see how anxious the colonists are to maintain their connection with the mother country. Considering the changes which have taken place of late, and the manner in which they have been pressed to separate from this country, I think it redounds greatly to their credit that their loyalty and devotion to the mother country have remained unshaken, or, rather have increased in recent years. I do hope, therefore, that the feeling which has been so nobly shown in Canada, and the gallantry with which the Militia and Volunteers have come forward on every occasion when their services were needed, will be appreciated here, and that we shall hold out the hand of friendship to the new Confederation, which, I believe, will be of great advantage to the colonists, and, I hope, will also add to the security of the Empire. I repeat that we must not be led away by the notion that the colony is indefensible. I believe, on the contrary, there will be means to defend it; and I shall rejoice not only at the Confederation which this Bill is to ratify, but also at the military chain of defence which the Bill will complete, and which is so essential to the maintenance of our Empire in this large, valuable, and important possession.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that remarks had been made upon the absence of information respecting the line to be determined upon for the Intercolonial Railway, and a fear was expressed that it might be placed in too great proximity to the American frontier. His reason for not referring to any particular line was that it was far better for the colonists to lay down the railway along what appeared to be the most advantageous route, bearing in mind that it was not probable that any portion of the railway would pass in any nearer proximity to the frontier than the present Grand Trunk Railway terminus on the St. Lawrence. The noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) had remarked on the great advantages which would accrue from the withdrawal of the troops from Canada, instancing the progress made in New Zealand owing to that cause. But his illustration was not a happy one, for the troops had not been withdrawn from New Zealand at the date of the letter to which the noble Lord referred. The noble Lord had taken exception to the wording of the preamble of this Bill, and the use of the term "the welfare of this country." Surely, however, the criticism was not just; for if the proposed railway assisted to develop the trade and resources of the colony by bringing the maritime Provinces nearer to the upper Provinces, and thus connecting the colony more closely with the mother country, such a measure could not be otherwise than for the welfare of the latter. Then the noble Lord said that this guarantee was the price or the bribe we were paying to the colonists for Confederation. But it was not so, for before Confederation was so much as thought of an opinion had been pronounced by the Government of this country that the improvement of the means of communication between different parts of Canada was highly desirable. The noble Lord would find that the plan of water communication had been carried out by this country, and the reason why the scheme, first proposed, of a military road had not been carried out, was because the railway system had only just then been introduced into the colony. As early as 1852, the noble Lord, the then Secretary of State, proposed that guarantees should be given for the money to be raised for a work very similar to that now contemplated. In the papers and despatches referring to those proposals no allusion was to be found to the idea of Confederation; but the opinion of the Government of this country was there recorded as to the necessity of this work; and it was unfair to say, therefore, that this loan had been granted as the price of Confederation. The Confederation had been spontaneous on the part of the Canadians, and the loan was to enable them to complete a work which this country had, as far back as twenty years ago, pronounced to be essential to the development of the colony. We ought to assist Canada by giving her free communication with the sea; and, though in case of danger she must defend herself, yet we ought to give her the necessary means of carrying out that defence. It could not be expected that if we refused to give to Canada the means of defending herself, and also withdrew our troops from the colony, she could remain attached to the Empire; but if we gave her the aid on which she relied for developing her own resources, and utilizing them for her defence, she would remain loyal to this country; and then it would be found that in the event of Canada being exposed to danger the people of England would rally round the colony and defend it with all the power at the command of Great Britain.

In reply to Lord LYVEDEN.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that no progress had been made with the works at Montreal, because it was agreed by the late Government that the subject of Confederation should take precedence of the fortification question.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL GANGS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, on rising to bring under the Notice of the House the Sixth Report of the Commissioners relating to the Agricultural Gangs, said: My Lords, I have no intention of troubling your Lordships at any great length, particularly as I know that a debate of very great importance is going on in the other House; but, having given Notice some time ago of my intention to bring this subject under your Lordships' notice, although I have been forestalled by a Motion made in the House of Commons a few nights ago, yet I think it my duty to show, as briefly as I can, that this House has not been unmindful of the welfare of the agricultural community, and that the charge made against the landlords, that they evince no interest with regard to their poorer tenants, is altogether unfounded. Two years ago I had the honour of bringing this subject under your Lordships' notice, and, I believe, I was the first person who drew attention to it. I then moved your Lordships to present an Address to the Crown, praying for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the subject of the employment of children and young persons in various trades not protected by the Factory Acts, and that that Commission should take into consideration the system of agricultural gangs. The Report of that Commission was made a very short time ago, and I wish to read a few extracts, in order to show your Lordships what the system really is. The Commissioners say—

“The system of ‘organized’ labour known by the name of ‘agricultural gangs’ exists, as far as the Commissioners have been able to ascertain, almost exclusively in the following counties:—Lincolnshire, Huntingdonshire, Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Nottinghamshire. There are a few instances of the employment of these gangs in three other neighbouring counties—namely, in the counties of Northampton, Bedford, and Rutland. They are not found over the whole of any of these counties, but are distributed irregularly through various parts of them, in obedience to local circumstances. All organized agricultural gangs consist of the gang master, a number of women, young persons of both sexes. The Commissioners, in designating ‘young persons,’ adopt the definition of the Factory Acts—namely, those between thirteen and eighteen. Children of both sexes from the age of six to thirteen. The ‘organized gang’—the subject of the present inquiry—is called in some districts the ‘public gang,’ in others the ‘common gang,’ in some places it is called the ‘jobbing gang,’ elsewhere the ‘travelling gang.’ The numbers in each public gang are from ten or twelve to twenty, thirty, and forty, very rarely above forty. But the most common, because the most manageable number, is about twenty, employing in the whole about 7,000 boys and girls, from six years old and upwards. In addition to the ‘public gangs’ there are also many ‘private gangs,’ employing full 20,000. The ‘public gang’ master is an independent man, who engages the members of his gang, and contracts with the farmer to execute a certain kind and amount of agricultural work with his gang. The ‘private gang’ is a small gang, seldom exceeding twelve or twenty, similarly composed, but in the farmer’s own employ, and superintended and directed by one of the farmer’s own labourers. The unanimity with which the public gang system is condemned in consequence of its injurious influences on the moral character of those subject to it is all but entire throughout the whole evidence. The number of persons who are able to speak well of the system under its moral aspects, as far as they have witnessed it, is very small indeed. The rest, with an earnestness of expression which testifies to the sincerity of their convictions, are evidently deeply impressed with the desire to call attention to the great amount of moral evil connected with the system, and to urge the consideration of some mode of improving it. A great part of the work consists in making or keeping the land in a fit state for the growth of crops by cleaning it from weeds of all kinds, and may be included under the description of weeding, 'knocking,' or spreading, and putting in manure are sometimes added. Thinning or 'singling' turnips and mangold wurzle is a work of the same nature as weeding. The work also includes the putting crops into the ground, as by setting potatoes and dropping seed for dibblers, treading corn on light soil, &c. The work also includes the getting in of certain crops when ripe, e.g., pulling turnips and mangolds or beet, pulling flax, and sometimes peas, instead of their being mown; picking up potatoes when dug or turned up; also gathering garden produce in market gardens of fruit and vegetables. The turnips or mangolds when pulled have also to be topped and tailed."

As an instance, take the following, which is recorded by Mr. Savage:—

"Mrs. Antony Adams, labourer's wife, Denton, Huntingdonshire—'In June, 1862, my daughters, Harriet and Sarah, aged respectively eleven and thirteen years, were engaged to work on Mr. Worman's land at Stilton. When they got there he took them to near Peterborough; there they worked for six weeks, going and returning each day. The distance each way is eight miles, so that they had to walk sixteen miles each day on all the six working days of the week, besides working in the field from 8 to 5 or 5 30 in the afternoon. They used to start from home at 5 in the morning and seldom got back before 9. They had to find all their own meals, as well as their own tools (such as hoes). They (the girls) were good for nothing at the end of the six weeks. The ganger persuaded me to send my little girl Susan, who was then six years of age. She walked all the way (eight miles) to Peterborough to her work, and worked from 8 to 5 30 and received 4d. She was that tired that her sisters had to carry her the best part of the way home—eight miles, and she was ill from it for three weeks, and never went again.'"

When a system like this exists, it is obvious that the Legislature ought not to hesitate a moment in applying a proper remedy for the evil. The Report goes on to say—

"The dress of females collects wet much more than that of boys or men, and even if they are at work does not dry nearly so quickly. The workers are often waiting about for long intervals with wet feet and their clothes soaked through up to their knees or waist, or higher, doing nothing but waiting till the weather or the crop is drier. Children, from being shorter, are wetted by the crops higher up their bodies than elder workers, though not worse off as to rain. The gang-workers, as a rule, are the poorest of the labouring class, and many of them are badly fed, shod, and clothed, and have very small means of making a change of clothes when they return home. Not only rain, but even in fine weather the dew makes the crops very wet, some much more so than others, and the higher the crop the more are the workers exposed to this wet, and females owing to their dress much the most. Hence they are often soaked through up to the knees or waist, and children even higher, and have to squeeze or wring out their petticoats, and even take them or other parts of their dress off and hang them up to dry. A young woman entirely crippled with rheumatism, which she got soon after going into a gang at eleven years old, says 'We have had to take off our shoes and pour the water out, and then the man would say, 'Now then, go in again.' It is suggested by a competent person that, if the employment were placed under regulation, one of the several rules which it is suggested should be endorsed on a license to be required from the gang-master should be 'No girls to be permitted to enter high wet corn in weeding.'"

In my opinion, my Lords, no female at all should be engaged in this injurious and disgusting employment. To say nothing of the moral considerations involved, there is not a medical man who will not tell you that the most critical period of a woman's life is that between eleven and thirteen years of age. That is the time when a change in her constitution takes place, when maladies are most easily contracted, and when the female child requires to be watched with the most parental and minute care. Children at that tender age are nevertheless exposed, as we are told, to all the inclemencies of the seasons, with every malady that besets humanity, and yet no hand is stretched out to rescue them from their miserable condition. I shall next proceed to read to your Lordships the evidence of Dr. Morris, of Spalding, who says—

"I have been in practice in the town of Spalding for twenty-five years, and during the greater portion of this time I have been medical officer to the Spalding Union infirmary. I am convinced that the gang system is the cause of much immorality. The evil in the system is the mixture of the sexes in the case of boys and girls of twelve to seventeen years of age under no proper control. The gangers, as you know, take the work of the farmers. Their custom is to pay their children once a week at some beer-house, and it is no uncommon thing for their children to be kept waiting at the place till eleven or twelve o'clock at night. At the infirmary many girls of fourteen years of age, and even girls of thirteen up to seventeen years of age, have been brought in pregnant to be confined there. The girls have acknowledged that their ruin has taken place in this gang work. The offence is committed in going or returning from their work. Girls and boys of this age go five, six, or even seven miles to work, walking in droves along the roads and by-lanes. I have myself witnessed gross indecencies between boys and girls of fourteen to sixteen years of age. I once saw a young girl insulted by some five or six boys on the road side. Other older persons were about twenty or thirty yards off, but they took no notice. The girl was calling out, which caused me to stop. I have also seen boys bathing in the brooks, and girls between thirteen and nineteen looking on from the bank."

I now come to the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Huntley, the rector of Binbrooke, who says—

"Turning to the moral side of the picture, all is blank. The benefits of education, which charity has provided, are thrown aside by the parent. The young being occupied in manual labour from morn till night, the village school is comparatively denuded of scholars. In room of moral and religious teaching, children are auditors of obscene and blasphemous language, while also exposed to the most profligate and debased examples; thus completing the first stage of ruin. Progressing from childhood to womanhood, the girl is brought up without experience in the management of domestic affairs, and it is no wonder that when the duties of servitude and married life are demanded of her she is ignorant of both. There is not one extensive occupier of land, nor one sober-minded person throughout my parish, who does not denounce the gangs as destructive to the morals of the poor."

Then we have the evidence of Mr. Richard Greenwood, a farmer, who tells us—

"I never employ a common gang. The common gang is very bad indeed. There is a reason for them when children can't be got otherwise, but I think that they could, if they tried, in many cases. I don't think that work is done much cheaper by the gang. I think the gang system is full of evil. There are great girls and boys of fourteen to fifteen years of age among them, and there is always something wrong going on. It does not matter who the ganger is; where there is a lot together, he has a control over them all. I have counted twenty to twenty-five in the gangs that come from Binbrooke. The only advantage to the farmer is that it saves him the trouble of seeking the children. Half the girls from Ludford have been ruined by going out. I think that farmers would not be at all losers by girls not going out to work at all."

That is the testimony of a man who farms 1,000 acres. But I now come to the evidence of some mothers whose opinions on this subject are entitled to the greatest weight. A very intelligent woman named Rachel Gibson says—

"I can't speak up for any gangs; they ought all to be done away with."

Most heartily I say "amen" to that.

"My children shan't go to one if I can help it—that is, as long as I and their father are alive, I hope, if we can keep them; one is seven, one five. I believe that I am the same as many other people about this. There are a great many mothers who send their children into gangs who would not if they could help it, and they say so. Nothing comes amiss to children after they have been in them, no bad talk nor anything else. I know that a child if brought up in a gang is quite different from what it would have been if brought up otherwise; you would soon know that it had been out, especially if you were talk to it. Gangs might be very well for boys, but never for girls. I did not go myself till I was seventeen, and could take care of myself. The coming home is the worst part, that's when the mischief is done. There never was any good got out of gangs, neither in talk nor in the other way, and they never will be kept as they should. I don't think it proper that womenkind should go into the fields at all, in gangs or not, though I have done both. There would then be more in the houses to mind them. Harvest work is different; you are not under a gangmaster, except that sometimes the tying has been done by a gang, and at harvest much more money can be made; a woman may make 2s. 3d. in a day, and that comes nice to any one. But other work is different. I should just have liked you to have met that gang coming back this afternoon, with their great thick boots and buskins on their legs, and petticoats pinned up; you might see the knees of some. A girl whom I took in to live because she has no home to go to came back to-day from the gang all dripping wet from the turnips. If you don't feel any hurt from the wet when you are young, you do afterwards, when you are old and the rheumatism comes on. Girls wear a pair of buskins to keep them from the wet. It is hard work when you have to wring the tops of turnips and mangolds up, and often makes blisters on the hands."

These are the views of another mother as to the working of the system—

"What I say is, these gangs should not be as they are. There are so many girls that they make lads at a loose hand—that is, leave them nothing to do. Then there is the girls coming home at dark; that is, when the job is done. The gangs are draughted off, two (that is, workers) here, three there, and so on, so that the gangmaster cannot look after them, and is not to blame. I have gone with twenty in a morning, and seen only two perhaps come home with the man at night. Then girls will have bad language among themselves, though the man might wish to stop it, but there are so many together, twenty or thirty perhaps, that he can't keep them quiet. I have worked in gangs many years. Sometimes the poor children are very illused by the gangmaster. One has used them horribly, kicking them, hitting them with fork handles, hurdle sticks, &c., and even knocking them down. These are not things to hit a child with. My own children have been dropped into across the loins and dropped right down, and if they don't know how to get up he has kicked them. I have many a time seen my own and other children knocked about by him in this way. It was not from drink; he was quite sober. Sometimes, too, they cannot work properly because their hands are cut all across and blistered where they twist the stalk round to pull up the root. Of course, he don't knock the big ones; it is the little ones he takes advantage of. I have heard him use to a child most awful words for a girl to hear. My boy, when about ten or eleven, had a white swelling on his knee and lay suffering nearly six years before he had his leg and thigh taken off, all but about as long as a finger. He came back one day and said he had a thorn, but others told me about the man kicking him. He was a very quiet boy, and was for peace. The doctor said it was from ill-usage, a fall or kick; there was no thorn."

I beg, in the next place, to call the attention of your Lordships to the sixth Report of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, because he points out how serious is the effect produced on the mortality of the children by work such as that to which I am referring. The Report states—

"That in some entirely rural marsh districts the habitual mortality of young children is almost as great as in the most infanticidal of our manufacturing towns; that Wisbeach, for instance, is within a fraction as bad as Manchester; and that generally in the registration districts (eighteen others, which include several in which the gang system prevails) the death-rate of infants under one year of age is from two and a quarter to nearly three times as high as in the sixteen districts of England which have the lowest infantile mortality. The result of this new inquiry, however, has been to show that the monstrous infantine rate of the examined agricultural districts depends only on the fact that there has been introduced into these districts the influence which has already been recognised as enormously fatal to the infants of manufacturing populations—the influence of the employment of adult women."

It goes on to say the effect of the gang system is to increase the employment of females, adult as well as young. The consequences are thus described—

- "The opinions of about seventy medical practitioners, with those of other gentlemen acquainted with the condition of the poor, were obtained. With wonderful accord the cause of the mortality was traced by nearly all these well-qualified witnesses to the bringing of the land under tillage—that is, to the cause which has banished malaria, and has substituted a fertile though unsightly garden for the winter marshes and summer pastures of fifty and 100 years ago. It was very generally thought that the infants no longer received any injury from soil, climate, or malarious influence, but that a more fatal enemy had been introduced by the employment of mothers in the field."

It is unnecessary to multiply instances of the evil consequences of this system, but I think I must give you the results of the employment of women in this way, as stated by the Rev. H. Mackenzie, rector of Tydd St. Mary's, who says—

"The causes of the gang system are the comparative cheapness of female and child labour. The effects of the employment of women in fieldwork are:—1. Loss of self-respect, and dirty and degraded habits. 2. Slovenly and slatternly households. 3. Alienation of husbands by the discomforts of home. 4. Neglect of the education of children. 5. Drinking habits among the men, and opium consumption among the women. The effects of the employment of girls in gang fieldwork are:—1. Boldness. 2. Ignorance. 3. Unchastity. 4. Want of cleanliness in work and person. 5. Incompetence in sewing, mending, cooking, and all that pertains to household economy. 6. Indifference to parental control. 7. Unwillingness to apply themselves to any regular mode of gaining a livelihood. Girls who have up to a certain time made good progress at school are materially injured in morals, discipline, knowledge, and regularity by going for two or three weeks to work in the fields. It will be a blessing to this neighbourhood if fieldwork for girls under age can be prohibited. This in a few years would abolish fieldwork for women altogether."

There is only one other extract with which I shall trouble your Lordships, showing how totally unnecessary it is to employ females in this manner, and that it is merely by indulgence in an old habit that the system is persevered in. This, my Lords, is described as the state of things at Eye, with a population of 2,430 persons, and where the property of Sir Edward Kerrison is situated—

"It will be seen that no females are employed on the gang system here. This is owing to the interest taken in it by Sir Edward Kerrison, who is owner of the greater part of the parish of Eye. It was entirely by his desire that girls were not employed in these gangs. The demoralizing effects were seen to be so great that for some years past only males have constituted the gang, and it certainly has worked admirably, for a distinct moral control is at the same time exercised over these lads by the instruction given to the master to check all obscene language and unbecoming behaviour, not only in their work, but if they are so ill-behaved either by language or manner when not in their work it is checked by special observation to the proper quarter, and the individual is admonished so as to let him know that he is not unobserved, and most probably he will find it much more to his own interest to behave in such a manner as may warrant those who have the power and influence to help him in after life. And all these poor people well know from practical experience that they have the kindest friends in Sir Edward and Lady Caroline Kerrison. Year after year young lads and young girls are looked after and helped out in their start in life, and assistance given in clothing and travelling expenses, where the parents require the help. This has an immense moral effect on the poor of the place and neighbourhood, coupled with the fact that the large landowner is a resident and taking personal interest in the welfare of the people."

That proves that the employment of females in these gangs is wholly unnecessary; and if their labour of this kind can be dispensed with in a district like Eye, it can be dispensed with anywhere.

Such, then, my Lords, in a very few words, is an outline of this system as described in the Report of the Commissioners, and of the mischief which it inflicts on a considerable portion of the population. I believe that a remedy might be easily and speedily applied to it. I regret very much to find from the report of the discussion in the other House that the Government think that no attempt at legislation can be made during the present year. I hold that when such a frightful state of things as this is found to exist it is incumbent on us to strive to correct it. I am myself disposed to undertake, immediately after the Easter recess, to move that your Lordships should adopt a Bill containing provisions which are almost certain to meet the requirements of the case. In the first place, I would proceed on the principles of the Factory and Colliery Acts. When in 1842 I introduced a Bill in the House of Commons to remove women from employment in the collieries of the United Kingdom, I was told that I should do no end of mischief by depriving women of their means of subsistence, and that I should be the cause of misery in many families. Nevertheless, I persisted, the Legislature adopted my proposal, and nothing but good has come of it. From that hour to this the condition of the colliery districts has been greatly improved in consequence of the non-employment of women in that disgusting and unsuitable labour. I shall propose by my Bill, immediately it passes, to exclude from these public gangs all women whatever under eighteen years of age. If I were to exclude women altogether, even above that age, as they are excluded from the collieries, I might be thought to be asking too much, as old habits cannot be got rid of all at once, and a little time might be necessary to find some substitute for the labour of women. But by removing all women under eighteen from these public gangs you would at once set at liberty 1,478 girls out of a population of 7,000. I speak now only of the public gangs. The private gangs are, it is true, the most numerous; but they are much more difficult to deal with than public gangs, comprising, as they often do, women and children living in the neighbourhood of a farm, and working under the superintendence of the farmer's son or of one of his labourers. I should reach them in another way, by clauses which would affect the whole agricultural population; because it is perfectly manifest that some measure relating to this matter must be brought in which will touch the whole agricultural population. The particular machinery of the Factory and Colliery Acts would be wholly inapplicable to agricultural industry; but, as I have said, I should propose to proceed upon the principles of those Acts. The main outlines, then, of the Bill which I desire to introduce would be as follows:—

1. That no female under eighteen years of age shall be employed in any public gang of agricultural labourers.
2. That no child under eight years of age shall be employed for hire in field labour at all.
3. That after the 1st of January, 1869, no female under eleven years of age (I should like to say up to thirteen) shall be employed for hire in any field labour whatever. This will affect not only the private gangs, but the entire agricultural population of every county; exceptions, of course, to be allowed for harvest. I maintain that physically, morally, and economically such a provision as this will be most beneficial in its effects. Certainly the extensive employment of women and girls in fieldwork has tended more to degrade women and lower the rate of agricultural wages than the operation of almost any other causes whatsoever. Then I should next provide that no child between the ages of eight and thirteen shall be employed for hire in field labour, without producing to its employer, at times to be appointed, a certificate of its having attended school during the preceding intervals for a certain number of hours, calculated according to the most convenient arrangements, whether by half-time, alternate days, or by the system under the Print Works Act, of so many hours collectively, of education, in any assigned period, regard being had to the seasons of the year. I believe that the half-time and the alternate day system cannot be adopted in the agricultural districts; and I therefore suggest that what is required is the attendance of a child at school for a certain number of hours during a definite number of weeks or months. My Lords, in attempting to grapple with this evil I hope your Lordships will kindly give me your sympathy and support. In this way you will give the crowning stroke to the various efforts made for many years past to bring all the industrial occupations of the young and the defenceless under the protection of the law; and, whether they are employed in trade, in manufactures, or in any handicraft whatever, every child under a certain age will be subject only to a limited amount of labour, and will be certain to receive a certain amount of education. All that remains for your Lordships now to do, as representing the landowners of the Kingdom, is to embrace within the scope of your beneficent legislation the whole mass of the agricultural population. Then, I believe, we shall be enabled to say that no country upon earth surpasses us in the care we take of the physical, the moral, and the educational well-being of the myriads of our humbler fellow-creatures. I am quite sure, my Lords, that the object you have in view is one well worthy of all the time, the anxiety, the zeal, and the talents which can be bestowed upon it; and I am satisfied that your Lordships will earnestly desire to see it accomplished.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that being connected with one of the districts in which the system that had been described by his noble Friend existed, he wished to express his thanks to him for having brought the subject before their Lordships. There was no place where it could be better discussed than in that House, where there were so many owners of land and persons practically conversant with agriculture. After the very full account given by his noble Friend of the state of demoralization which had been shown to exist in those parts of the country where the gang system prevailed, he would not trouble their Lordships with any detail; but, having for many years been acquainted with the course followed in these gangs and with the effects they produced in the districts where they were to be found, he did not think his noble Friend had said one word about them which was too strong. He could assure their Lordships that where the gang system had been introduced it had been the cause of the greatest mischief to the population concerned. The evil was one which he believed they ought to lose not a day in dealing with by legislation. He was therefore glad that his noble Friend was likely to introduce a Bill, because their Lordships would then have an opportunity of discussing the subject in a practical manner. He would not at that moment express any decided opinions with respect to the proposals; but he thought that his noble Friend scarcely went far enough in proposing that no girl under eleven years of age should be employed in field labour. For himself, he should be sincerely glad if a law could be framed to prevent girls from being employed in agricultural labour under thirteen years of age. It was desirable that boys intended for agricultural pursuits should be early accustomed to field labour, but he thought they ought not to be employed for hire under eight years. It was also desirable that there should be some provision for their education. The most difficult point in the scheme of his noble Friend would be to prevent women from being employed in public gangs under the age of eighteen. He did not mean to say that that would not be desirable; but considering the extent to which females were employed in some parts of the country, he doubted whether it would be practicable at once to adopt so decided a measure. Such were the evils attending these public gangs, that he was persuaded the farmers themselves would soon be glad that the Legislature had interfered for their suppression. It seemed to him desirable that some attention should be paid to the system of private gangs, and he was happy to learn that it was the intention of the Government to extend the inquiry to them. He would only add that, melancholy as the fact might be, there could be no doubt that, to a very considerable extent, the smallness of the wages received by agricultural labourers compelled them to employ their wives and children in work of that description; at all events, the element of wages could not be kept altogether out of view. Fortunately, it happened that the wages of agricultural labourers were at the present moment on the rise, and the moment was therefore favourable for legislation. He trusted that his noble Friend would bring in his Bill as soon after Easter as possible.

THE EARL OF BELMORE thought that the noble Earl deserved the thanks of their Lordships for bringing this matter before them. The disclosures made in the former Reports of the Commissioners were painful enough; but those contained in the sixth Report were more painful still, because they established the great demoralization produced by this system, and more especially among the young girls employed in this sort of labour. One of the Commissioners, however, in his Report, remarking on the influence of out of door employment on the physical condition of the women and young persons, stated that, working as they did in the fresh air, their appearance was generally satisfactory, and that some of the young women were exceedingly healthy and muscular. His noble Friend had stated that immediately after he would introduce a Bill dealing with the subject:—he (the Earl of Belmore) need hardly say that Her Majesty's Government would give their best consideration to any measure having that object. The noble Earl had expressed his regret that the Secretary for the Home Department had stated in "another place" that he could not undertake to deal with the question during the present Session of Parliament. But in pronouncing a judgment upon that announcement of his right hon. Friend it was necessary to remember the great difficulties by which the subject was surrounded. If they were to deal solely with public gangs the result would be that many of those employed in them would join the private gangs; and if they were to extend their legislation to private gangs it would be very difficult to define where the system began and where it ended. His right hon. Friend, feeling these difficulties, did not see his way at present to the introduction of a Bill upon that subject; but, as it was desirable that further inquiry should take place, he proposed almost immediately to reappoint the Commission, and they might then hope to be able, in the course of a year or two, to deal in a satisfactory manner with the whole question of agricultural labour.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that in the measure which he hoped to introduce he should endeavour to meet the case of private as well as public gangs.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Resolved, That Standing Order 179. Sects. 1. and 2. be suspended; and that the Time for depositing Petitions praying to be heard against Private Bills, which would otherwise expire during the Adjournment of the House, be extended to the Second Day on which the House shall sit after the Recess at Easter.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Four o'clock.

CASE OF MR. CHURCHWARD.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Lord Chancellor has yet revoked the appointment of Mr. Churchward as a Magistrate of Dover?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. and learned Member only means to give notice of his Question.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE: I rise to give notice that I shall move for all copies of the recommendations to the Lord Chancellor upon which Mr. Churchward was appointed a Magistrate; and also move for copies of all Correspondence between the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Churchward since his appointment.

THE IMAUM OF MUSCAT.—QUESTION.

SIR FOWELL BUXTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the treaty with the Imaum of Muscat, concluded 10th September 1822, is considered to be in force so far as it relates to the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar, now that his dominions are independent of Muscat?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, the treaty with the Imaum of Muscat of September 10, 1822, and subsequently confirmed in 1839, having two years ago been referred for the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, the question had been decided by the then Government in the affirmative.

JUVENILE LABOUR IN PRINTWORKS. QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the last Report of the Inspector of Factories, stating that in Printworks children of eight years of age and under thirteen, and females above thirteen, may be and sometimes are employed from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m., and, if so required, without any interval; and boys above thirteen may be employed for twenty-four hours without any interval; and, if so, whether he intends to introduce into the Factory Act Extension Bill any Clauses to modify the hours of labour under the Printworks Act?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that some communications had been made to the Home Office from the inspectors of factories, with reference to juvenile labour in printworks. He proposed to consider whether a Bill could not be introduced for the purpose of regulation with regard to these works.

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received a request from the Government of France to send a Delegate to represent England at the International Currency Conference to be held at Paris next May; and, if so, what reply he has sent to such request; and, whether he is aware that most of the European Governments, and the United States of America, have undertaken to send Delegates to such Conference?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had received a request from the French Government to send a delegate to represent England at the International Currency Conference in Paris, and that morning a reply was sent to that request. It was to the effect that the Master of the Mint would be empowered to attend the Conference to give any information in his power or take part in any discussion that may take place; but he will not be authorized to bind the Government to any conclusions at which the Conference may arrive.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL LESLIE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the importation of sheep into Ireland from Scotland might again be permitted, as the cattle disease has now for some time disappeared in Scotland?

LORD NAAS said, he thought the time had now come when it might be possible to consider the question as to whether the restrictions that had existed so long in regard to sheep in the United Kingdom might not, to a certain extent, be relaxed. He had directed certain inquiries to be made in the matter, and he hoped in a few days to acquaint his hon. and gallant Friend with the result.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—COMPOUND HOUSEHOLDERS. QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether in the case of a compound occupier who may have claimed to be rated under the provisions of the Representation of the People Bill, paid a rate, and been placed on the Register, it is intended that the composition shall be treated as continuing, or shall be considered to have ceased, as affecting the liability of the landlord to a future rate in the tenant's default, or in the event of a vacancy in the occupation; upon the former supposition, to ask upon what principle such tenant is required to pay the full rate, in apparent contradiction of the law which sanctions a reduced rate where there is a guarantee from the landlord; upon the latter supposition, to ask upon what principle the tenant is allowed to deduct from his rent the composition rate only, the landlord having been relieved from the guarantee on condition of which such composition rate was substituted for the full rate; and, whether it is not the fact that, in the one case a larger amount of rate would be payable on the tenement than the law now contemplates, and in the other the landlord would be relieved of part of the charge upon his property without being required to fulfil the conditions under which such relief is now allowed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Notice of the hon. Gentleman is rather peculiar. It partakes more of the character of a treatise than of a Question. It asks certainly in the first place for information; and I am bound, always in reply to these inquiries, to give the best information I can. But it then proceeds to two alternatives, then to the discussion of two principles, and finally to a very argumentative conclusion. Now I admire the condensed power of expression which has permitted the hon. Gentleman to lay his views before the House even in the comparatively short form in which it appears upon the Paper; but I have not that confidence in myself that I feel I could do justice to the Question in the space which the patience of the House would permit. The hon. Gentleman has opened up a question which may lead to an important debate, and one which awaits the consideration of the House at the present moment. As regards the information he requires, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the 7th section of the clause I last put on the paper, with respect to compound-householders. All the information I have on that subject is contained in that 7th section. With regard to the alternative principles and conclusion, I will take the most convenient opportunity offered me to enter into the questions which the hon. Gentleman has opened.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—CHILLED SHOT. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY BAILLIE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War,

Whether it is true that shot have been cast in sand at Woolwich without being chilled, which were brought into competition with Major Palliser's projectiles, and which gave precisely the same results as though they had been cast in chill?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It is true, Sir, that shot has been cast in sand at Woolwich without being chilled, and have great penetrating power; but as to the results, I am not at present able to state them. As to economy of manufacture, I am given to understand that the chilled iron has decidedly the advantage.

FEEs OF RETURNING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he proposes to introduce a clause into the Reform Bill, for the purposes of making uniform the various fees now payable by candidates to the returning and other officers who shall hereafter be specified, and whether he proposes to make the payment of conveyance to the poll illegal?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have to state, in answer to my hon. Friend, that experience has made me very chary of interfering with returning officers or any other body of individuals; but with reference to making the payment of conveyance to the poll illegal, I may say it is intended so greatly to multiply places of polling so that I hope that would be perfectly unnecessary, and that no such expenses need be incurred.

IRELAND—VOTING PAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. REARDEN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the amendment of the Representation of the People of Ireland; and, if so, whether the Clause in reference to Voting Papers, contained in the Bill for the Representation of the People of England, be omitted in the Bill intended for Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have already stated, in reply to several Gentlemen connected with Ireland, that it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Representation of the People of Ireland; and, with regard to the latter part of the inquiry, whether that Bill will contain a clause in reference to voting papers, I believe there is a very general feeling in Ireland that a clause of that character should be inserted in the Bill.

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is able to state, without injury to the Public Service, the actual position of our relations with Spain?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, the House is aware that there are, unfortunately, two questions now pending between the British Government and that of Spain. With regard to one of these questions, that of the Tornado, I have received from the Spanish Government a further communication. I cannot say it is altogether satisfactory; but, at the same time, I do not look upon it as necessarily final or conclusive. That communication is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. With reference to the second and more pressing case of the Victoria, I regret to say that I am not in a position to give any further information to the House. I have not received any reply of any kind from the Spanish Government on that subject.

METROPOLIS—BUCKINGHAM PALACE GARDENS.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If the footpath outside the Buckingham Palace Gardens, from the Palace towards the lower end of Grosvenor Place, belongs to the Crown, and, if so, why the path is not kept flagged instead of being a muddy and narrow path during wet weather; and, if the First Commissioner will undertake to have it kept in proper order for foot passengers?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he apprehended that any question on this subject should be addressed not to the Office of Works, but to the parochial authorities who were intrusted with powers of lighting and paving.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—THE HUNDREDS OF OFFLOW.

QUESTION.

MR. FOLEY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,

Whether, there being no division of the Two Hundreds of Offlow in the Census Tables, the proposed division of East Staffordshire includes the whole of Offlow and not South Offlow only, as stated in the Bill for the Representation of the People; and what the estimated population of East Staffordshire will be, exclusive of the present and proposed boroughs?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Gentleman is doubtless aware that the boundaries which are traced in the Representation of the People Bill are what are called in the old Act of 1832 "temporary boundaries," and do not constitute any permanent arrangement. Our intention is, as the Bill denotes, to propose the names of some very distinguished and eminent persons to the House of Commons who shall be appointed Commissioners of Boundaries, and who shall have power to appoint sub-Commissioners to inquire into and to determine what shall and what shall not be included in the new boundaries. But it was necessary, under the existing circumstances, that these temporary boundaries should be inserted in the Bill. Since the Notice of the hon. Member has been placed upon the Paper I have received information from those who are cognizant of the circumstances, and I find that there has been some inaccurate statement with regard to the Hundreds of Offlow. I find that the whole of Offlow will be included within the division of East Staffordshire. With regard to the population of East Staffordshire, after deducting the inhabitants of the present and proposed boroughs, I think it will be something about 90,000.

BRIDGES (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. ESMONDE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will lay the Amendments to the Bridges (Ireland) Bill, of which he has given notice, relative to the Youghal Bridge, upon the table before the Easter recess?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that he hoped to be able to lay the Amendments on the table on Friday night. The Act relative to the Youghal Bridge was drawn as a separate Bill, and it would require some care in shaping the clauses before a general Bill was introduced, which he hoped would be the case soon; but the Bill could hardly be proceeded with till after Easter.

IRELAND—CASE OF REV. MR. MAGINN. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with reference to the case of Priest Maginn, What if any further information he has obtained as to his refusal to give evidence on the inquiry relating to the affray in which Police Constable Duggan was shot; also, with reference to the statement of Mr. Justice Keogh, imputing misconduct to magistrates and other parties, whether he has communicated with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland thereon; and, with reference "to the full and impartial inquiry, with every facility for all parties to take part, and to adduce any evidence likely to throw light upon the transaction," as promised on the part of the Government by the Chief Secretary, whether facilities will be afforded for ascertaining if it was one of the objects of the Fenian conspiracy "to wade in the blood of Orangemen and heretics who do not join us and become one of ourselves," and inquiring into the authenticity of the alleged Fenian oath as published in newspapers; first in Canada, and subsequently in this country?

LORD NAAS: In reply, Sir, to the Question of the hon. Member for Peterborough, I have to state that, since I answered the Question put to me by him the other evening, some fresh information upon this subject has reached me, and I find that, although there was no formal inquiry into the circumstances of the affray to which he refers, what did really happen was this:—The magistrates having taken the usual steps to obtain informations with regard to the occurrence which had taken place, the Reverend Mr. Maginn attended the place where these informations were being taken, and he was asked to swear an information. I think the best answer I can give to the hon. Gentleman's Question is to read the copy of the note taken by the magistrates upon the occasion, which was afterwards forwarded to me by the Inspector of Police who attended on the occasion—

"The Reverend Thomas Maginn thus concludes his evidence; he says 'that he acted in the capacity of priest, that he had nothing to say further than that which he had stated before, and that if he were then examined further it would tend to lessen his influence; that he had already exposed his life in his endeavours to preserve the peace, and that he was willing to do so again, and that every priest in the county of Kerry was willing to do the same.'"

In consequence of that statement the reverend gentleman was not sworn, and did not make any information. With regard to the second Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has communicated the nature of the observations of Mr. Justice Keogh to the magistrates to whom they referred, and that, of course, any further steps that the Lord Chancellor may think necessary to take will be guided very much by the nature of the reply to those observations which the magistrates may make. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I have only to say that I cannot conceive that the nature of the Fenian oath can in any way become a portion of any inquiry which may be instituted with regard to the conduct of those magistrates.

MAJOR KNOX said, he wished to know, whether the noble Lord had any objection to lay the Report of Mr. Justice Keogh upon the table of the House?

LORD NAAS: It is impossible, in the present state of the case, to lay that document on the table.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask, if the noble Lord had any objection to lay a Copy of the Informations upon the table?

LORD NAAS: I shall have no objection to lay on the table a copy of the informations taken before the magistrates.

AGRICULTURE OF AUSTRIA AND DENMARK.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLLAND said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When Professor Wilson's Reports on the Agriculture of Austria and Denmark will be issued?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the Reports would be ready in a few days.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends to proceed with the Bill that evening? The provisions of the Bill would require very careful consideration before they received the sanction of the House, and must give rise to a lengthened discussion. Under these circumstances, he scarcely thought that the right hon. Gentleman really intended to move the second reading of the Bill that night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, as far as this Bill is concerned, my only object is to consult the convenience of the House, and I am anxious that its provisions shall be fully discussed. I believe that in bringing forward the Bill to-night I was only fulfilling a personal pledge. It would be rather inconvenient for me to fix any particular day after the holydays for bringing it forward.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—[BILL 79.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HIBBERT: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question with reference to the Amendment of which I have given notice upon the 3rd clause of the Reform Bill, which refers to the rights of compound-householders. My proposition is to give to the compound-householders every facility to acquire votes by enabling them to place their names upon the register on paying or tendering the amount of the composition rate upon their houses. I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the Government are prepared to accede to that proposition? The course I shall take with regard to the Reform Bill will be very materially influenced by the answer which the right hon. Gentleman may give to my question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think the hon. Gentleman must see that it would be exceedingly inconvenient for me to give an immediate answer to the question he has put to me. I myself have placed several Amendments upon the paper with regard to the rights of compound-householders. The question in connection with the compound-householders is one of great difficulty; but, at the same time, it is one for fair discussion. If hon. Gentlemen wish to bring forward any propositions upon this point, I shall be very happy to hear any suggestions that may be made, and as long as those propositions are consistent with the principles of the measure we have brought forward—namely, the principles of personal payment of rates and of adequate residence—I shall listen to them with very great attention. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) the other night indicated some views upon this subject, which, coming from such a quarter, will command my utmost attention. The hon. Gentleman, however, will perceive that, at the present moment, it is quite impossible for me to give any definite answer to the question he has put to me. The subject is one which is well worthy of discussion; and as long as they are not inconsistent with the principles to which I have referred as being vital to the Bill, any suggestions that may be made with regard to compound-householders will be fairly considered by us.

EARL GROSVENOR: I rise, Sir, to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, to put myself in order, I intend to conclude my observations by moving the adjournment of the House. We all know that there is a general feeling on both sides of the House that this question of Reform should be settled, and that we should not only pass a Reform Bill during the present Session, but that we should pass a Reform Bill which will have every probability of being a lasting one. And I understand there is a feeling, shared by Members on both sides of the House, that in order to arrive at such a settlement it would be advisable that the further progress of the Reform Bill should be postponed until after the Easter holidays. ["No, no!"] There are two sets of Amendments affecting the Bill upon the Notice Paper—those of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), and those which are proposed by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone)—which involve points which will give rise to very considerable discussion. If hon. Members who have Motions on the paper for to-morrow will not give way, the practical result will be that we shall only have to-night in which to discuss this great question. I therefore appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he thinks that we are likely to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of this question after a debate of one night only, and whether he does not think it would be better to adjourn the further progress of the Bill until after the Easter recess. [Renewed cries of "No, no!"] I believe that if the consideration of the question were postponed for a short time, there would be much greater likelihood of some arrangement being arrived at during the recess. The notices given are extremely numerous, and if time were given some satisfactory compromise might be arrived at. I therefore appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the further progress of the Bill until after the Easter recess.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Earl Grosvenor.)

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN: I am not aware what the feeling of the House is generally; but, in corroboration of the remark of the noble Lord, I do know certainly that some hon. Members do not think that it would be desirable to enter into a discussion of the Reform Bill in Committee at the present time. The noble Lord who has just sat down has said justly that the greatest possible anxiety is demonstrated on both sides of the House to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of this question, and I do think that no obstacle of any trifling kind should be allowed to come in the way of that settlement. But I think it would be a great chance that it would become a very great obstacle to this settlement, if we should commence the debate and not be able to finish any branch of it before the holidays. I have no feeling myself upon the matter; but I know that many hon. Members are sincerely anxious to give every opportunity for the two sides of the House to come together upon one or two questions which are not very difficult of adjustment, and I think that there would be much greater facility for carrying out this desire if we postponed the debate.

MR. AYRTON: I think that it is quite impossible for the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to misunderstand the feeling with which this side of the House is actuated, for that feeling has been expressed in a very distinct and audible manner that we ought at once to proceed. If there be any wish in the House not to proceed, undoubtedly the right hon. Gentleman must feel that if silence gives consent the question raised by the noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor) has created great indisposition in hon. Gentlemen opposite to proceed; but I fully believe that that feeling is not shared by those who sit here, and who have shown, from the commencement, an anxious desire to have this question settled as soon as possible. It has been suggested that if we do nothing at all we shall contribute much to a settlement; but I myself cannot conceive anything so likely to settle the question as a good practical debate in this House. The question of Reform cannot arrive at a settlement until it has been discussed with a view of arriving at a conclusion upon the main points to be secured ; and I am convinced that nothing will so much contribute to a settlement as that we should discuss and decide upon the question raised by the Amendment of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. I am quite sure that the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) will not ask us previously to discuss the Motion which he intends to submit, and that he will not interpose his Amendment so that we cannot proceed to discuss the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment. But there are also very strong reasons why we should proceed at once ; for if we adjourn for the holydays without doing so the Session will have half expired before we resume ; and is it to go forth to the country that this period has been arrived at without one single point in the Reform Bill having been disposed of or even debated seriously ? I believe that nothing could be so disastrous as the knowledge that half the Session had expired without our having taken any earnest step in the progress of this great subject. I think that it would be most unfortunate if we should separate without the people having the moral assurance that Parliament intends to proceed with the question of Reform. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer accedes to the proposition of the noble Lord it will raise but one feeling throughout the country—that we had only entered on this question for the purpose of burking it. I hope that the Government will fulfill the engagements repeatedly made, that they would proceed as early as possible to the solution of the question. I need not remind the right hon. Gentleman of his promise to proceed de die in diem ; and are we to be told that there is anything very serious to-morrow to prevent us proceeding ? I should like to know what it is ; it is one of those shadows that are thrown up occasionally when the House wishes to do nothing. The question to-night is one of a narrow character, and I believe we can come to a conclusion upon it. If hon. Gentlemen opposite should be determined to prolong the debate I believe that we can go on with it to-morrow, and can then sit until we come to a conclusion. If hon. Members are really desirous to redeem the character of the House in the eyes of the country, there ought to be no separation for the holydays until the Amendment of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire has been disposed of.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE : I think that I ought not to be misunderstood. The noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor) has referred to those Gentlemen who have Notices on the paper, and to-morrow I stand first with a Notice in reference to despatches which have passed between the British Government and the Spanish Government. The House will do me the justice to say that during the long period that I have been a Member I have never once interposed against the wish of the House on any one occasion. But I must say this—the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) has said that ill-feeling will arise in the country if we do not come to a decision in reference to the Reform Bill before the House breaks up ; but I consider that it would be most unfortunate if a question so important as that which will be raised on my Motion should not be fairly and fully discussed previous to the holydays. [“ Oh, oh ! ”] Some hon. Gentlemen may differ with me ; but I entertain that opinion so fully that I must proceed with it. Will the House do me the justice to see that I put the Notice upon the paper a week ago, and before there was any notion that the question of Reform would come before us in this form ? I think it most important that the House should support the Government by expressing its opinion upon this important question before the holydays ; and I must therefore state in answer to the hon. Member, but with the greatest respect to the House, that I must firmly decline to give way.

MR. GLADSTONE : It appears to me, I confess, that my noble Friend the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor) has made a proposition which, though well-intentioned, is not well-timed. Let us consider how the matter stands. We are now approaching the middle of April ; and if this adjournment be agreed to, three months of the Session will have expired before we shall be able to resume this question. There is a universal sense of the necessity of despatch. On account of that necessity of despatch ordinary modes of procedure have been departed from ; and if my noble Friend's proposition is acceded to, three months will have passed before the first practical step has been achieved. I trust we may be allowed to proceed at once. My noble Friend urges impediments ; but only one question, as far as I know, stands upon the paper before the subject of personal rating, and with regard to that question I believe I am right in saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), though very anxious to enter upon the discussion of the Amendment of which he has given notice, is not unwilling to postpone its consideration, if he finds such a postponement to be the wish of the House. With regard to the question of proceeding to-morrow, I understand that a noble Friend of mine who in "another place" expressed his wish to enter upon a discussion of our relations with Spain was formally requested by the Government, and no doubt with reason, to postpone his Motion. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has also answered several questions; and from those answers, undoubtedly, the inference would arise—and I have no further knowledge on the subject myself—that Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to enter into such a discussion, and do not consider that it would be advantageous to the public service. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) will scarcely be determined to force on such a discussion irrespective of the views of the Government on matters with regard to its policy and prudence? If, however, my hon. Friend is determined to force on such a discussion, he will, I think, find that he has a difficult task in hand. But I am bound to say that it depends upon the decision of the House whether to proceed with the discussion of the Reform question; because the law of adjournment on the Friday, nine days before Easter, is not an irremovable impediment. The question is whether the impression is or is not to be conveyed to the minds of the people of this country that the House is in earnest upon this subject. Ready as we are, after many delays and after many changes, to enter upon the discussion of a point which goes, as we know, almost to the heart of the most important portion of the Bill, it appears to me that the House will subject itself to very grave and serious imputations if we allow this matter to stand over in preference to sacrificing a day, or even two or three days, at our own personal inconvenience. We ought not therefore to postpone for about three weeks that which the public believe has already been too long postponed.

MR. CLAY: I do not altogether agree either with what has been proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets

(Mr. Ayrton) nor with the course recommended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire; but I think that it would be very undesirable that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not, under any circumstances, be allowed to proceed with the Bribery Bill to-night. Upon the intimation which he gave, and considering the Bribery Bill to be part and parcel of the work of Reform—and although a separate Bill, it was originally part of the Reform Bill—I should think that we should be showing our earnestness by taking the second reading of that Bill to-night. It was in our hands this morning; and it is a very short Bill, and an extremely intelligible one; and I have read it through, and came perfectly prepared to discuss the second reading to-night. I have mentioned this because there are disquieting rumours in the air of a dissolution; and very many Gentlemen consider that this would be a very bad time for a dissolution, for reasons drawn as much from foreign as from home policy. I have not as yet heard of a good time for this particular result; but, however that may be, I should look upon it as little less than a national misfortune to send us to the country without having first passed a stringent Act for the more effectual suppression of bribery and corruption; and with that impression I earnestly entreat the Chancellor of the Exchequer to urge forward as speedily as possible some measure that would have the effect of protecting the voter in the exercise of the franchise.

MR. J. STUART MILL: Sir, I confess I attach the highest importance to the Amendment which stands on the paper in my name. Nevertheless, I shall waive my right to proceed with it now, entertaining as I do a confident hope that the House, on both sides of which that proposition has most distinguished supporters and sympathizers, will with one consent allow me at some early period an opportunity for a full discussion upon a proposal which I can assure hon. Gentlemen is a most serious one, and is becoming every day more serious from the number as well as the quality of its supporters. I should not for a moment think of interposing this Motion in the way of anything so important as the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, upon which the House is desirous, no doubt, of coming to a decisive judgment before we either adjourn or are dissolved. I am sure that the House is not so eager for its own amusement as not to be willing, if necessary, to sit through a part of next week. To think that the House would rather leave the question as it is than submit to this minute sacrifice of its pleasure or recreation would be so disgraceful to its character, that I cannot think of entertaining so uncourteous a supposition.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, I think the point we ought to apply ourselves to is, whether the Motion of the noble Lord will or will not help us forward in settling this great question. We must consider the position in which we have been placed during the last four or five days. In the beginning of the week a Motion was before the House at the instance of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge), which would have raised the definite issue by which the House would have decided whether it meant to deal with this great and difficult subject by means of a household suffrage, with a fixed limit, without saying what that limit was, or by the plan of the Government having no limit. Now, whether we take the one or the other of these plans, both sides of the House must lend their assistance to work it out in a manner the most satisfactory to the country. I do not think any one can controvert that proposition. That proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Exeter was, however, suddenly withdrawn from us. Whatever the issue might have been upon it, we could have ascertained the feeling of the House upon which principle, if I may say so, we were to proceed. But that is not all; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has varied his Amendments as to their position and character so much from day to day, that we are not able to consider or know what are actually the issues we are invited to try. But that is not all. No man can say, now that this particular point is to be submitted to us by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—the hon. Member for Westminster having, as I understand, withdrawn his Amendment—what bearing this issue of the question as to the payment of the personal rates will have upon the one plan or the other. Therefore, if we occupy the whole of this night, and perhaps have an adjourned debate, shall we be really making any progress? I put this fairly to hon. Members on either side of the House. The noble Lord said truly that in the recess compromises might take place—or, if that is not a proper word, an interchange of opinions. But, more than that—it may be that some proposal or some Amendment may be first raised which shall enable the House to decide whether we ought to go upon the principle of a fixed limit, or whether we are to go upon the plan of the Government—because until that point is decided, I do not see how we are to help each other in adjusting the different clauses of the Bill upon that particular question. That is the difficulty I feel as to proceeding with the discussion of the Bill to-night. I believe that we shall have a considerable debate which will probably lead to no division; I therefore do not think we shall be gaining ground. I do not believe there is any man in this House, upon whichever side he sits, who has a stronger feeling than I have of the necessity, if possible, of settling this question. I do not believe there is any man in this House who has a stronger opinion than I have of the great necessity which exists for an enlargement of the electoral franchise. But I believe it must be done, and can only be done, by a distinct understanding that the House should settle in the first instance what is the principle they mean to stand upon—whether it be a fixed limit or not—because upon the decision on those two points must depend the opinion that is to be given on all those other Amendments which stand upon the paper. Otherwise we shall have cross debates, and cross voting perhaps, upon particular points in respect to which men will not know exactly what they are about. That is the feeling I have upon the question submitted to us, and, so far as my voice goes, I shall support the adjournment.

MR. OSBORNE: The House has become so accustomed to these surprises—to this perpetual springing of mines—I verily believe the whole of the ground below the gangway here is mined—I hope that our position will be well understood before we engage ourselves in considering whether we shall again stultify ourselves by following the noble Lord. I can well understand the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues on the other side of the House, who are, I believe, in collusion with the noble Lord. But what do we owe to the noble Lord that we should adopt his suggestion? The noble Lord last year helped to throw out the Government Bill; the noble Lord, doubtless under the rose, wishes, by compromises with his Friends on the other side of the House, to make this as mild a Bill as he possibly can. I implore the House not to appear before the country in the disgraceful position they would occupy if they listen to the insidious proposition of the noble Lord backed by the two hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. What is the meaning of a compromise? Have we not read in the papers of the last two days that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, flushed with the converts he has made upon this side of the House, has declared that he will accept none of your Amendments? We all know that since the right hon. Gentleman has chosen deliberately to put that letter to his supporters in the papers, he is not likely to withdraw from it; and I will not do him the injustice to think, even though he be earwigged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire during the recess, that he will depart from that which he has laid down. Sir, there is no chance of a compromise, and I hope this question will be fairly fought out, and that we shall win over the false Reformers. Those who are real Reformers still wish to push this Bill forward a stage by discussing it to-night; those who are represented by The Day newspaper will wish to put off the question until after Easter, until what they call "a more convenient season." I implore all those who represent constituencies, and who wish to stand well with those constituencies [Laughter], to insist on the immediate consideration of the Bill. I can imagine that those hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, with their small laughs, have no constituency. Do not forget that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told his supporters that he will abandon his Bill if any improvement is made in it. ["No, no!"] I can well understand the wish of certain hon. Members to gain time—to put off as far as possible the evil day—but I do not understand any man professing to call himself a Reformer voting with the noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor), the man who has done more than any person in the House to cut off all idea of Reform.

LORD ELCHO: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down says he can understand why my noble Friend wishes to postpone the question of Reform. I think I can equally well understand why the hon. Gentleman and his friends wishes to force this question on. Notice of an Instruction was given the other day which was undoubtedly intended to produce one of two effects—either to force the Government to eat their leek, if I may say so, or to transfer Gentlemen who sit on the front Benches on this side of the House to the front Benches on the other. I am one of those who last year endeavoured with my noble Friend ["Hear, hear!"]—I am not ashamed to own that I endeavoured with my noble Friend to prevent the Government measure passing. I never attempted to disguise the fact; I spoke as openly last year as I believe I always do. I helped to secure the rejection of that Bill because I did not think it was founded upon sound principles, or was likely to effect a settlement of the question; and I objected also to the way in which it was attempted to force that Bill down our throats whether we liked it or not. As a Member of Parliament, I objected to that. But if I was anxious last year that the Bill should not pass, I am equally anxious this year that the question should be settled. I have never been opposed to Reform. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen may groan; but I invite them to look through the pages of Hansard, and point out one single passage in any speech of mine that says I am opposed to Reform. [Cheers.] I voted for the Bill of 1859. But these are personal matters, and I set them aside. I repeat I am anxious to see this question settled in the present Session of Parliament, and I am further anxious to see it settled without a change of Government. If possible, I am anxious to see it settled without a dissolution, because I believe it would be prejudicial to the best interests of this country that we should have a dissolution with this question of Reform unsettled. My noble Friend the Member for Chester, I know, shares in these views—or rather I share in his. And he has had the manliness to come forward this evening and to state that he believes this settlement is more likely to be effected by the course which he suggests than by forcing on this discussion as the right hon. Gentleman opposite is so anxious to do. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) shrank from the word "compromise." I do not shrink from it—I know it is unpalatable to those Gentlemen opposite who wish to drive headlong they know not whither—but I do not shrink from boldly standing up here and stating that I am in favour of a compromise on this question. I am convinced of this—and I do not say it without good ground—that if this question be not brought on for discussion to-night, but be postponed till after Easter, we are likely to gain a compromise which will lead to a settlement of this question. By forcing on this question you may succeed in making both sides of this House change places—you may possibly succeed in compelling a dissolution: but when you have attained that end, what then? You will have a united party opposite to you—you (the Opposition) are not a united party; and no one knows better than the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that you cannot pass a Reform Bill through this House unless it be based upon a compromise, in which both sides, to a certain extent, give up their own opinions. ["No!"] You may say "No!" but what I say is true; and there is not a man who hears me that does not know it to be true. What I say will be supported and backed out of doors. Public opinion wishes to see this question settled without reference to party or personal considerations; it wishes that there should be give and take between us; that more of public and less of party spirit should be exhibited. I say it decidedly and avowedly that no Reform Bill can be settled without a compromise. I do not shrink from that. I believe that compromise can be best effected by the course suggested by my noble Friend, and I think the public are greatly indebted to him for the courage and manliness he has exhibited in making the proposal.

MR. BRIGHT: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) has discussed this question, as his habit is, in a fair, practical, and sensible manner. He thought that we should lose no time by postponing the debate until after the recess; and that, as to-morrow night would probably be given up to something else, it would be injurious to commence a discussion this evening. If we were to rise to-morrow night for the recess, and if we were now about to discuss the question of the second reading, I think there would be something to be said on behalf of this view; because on the second reading the principles of the whole Bill should be discussed, and I should say that a week would be as little time as the House would require for the discussion. But that is not the position we are in. We are really in the position of being about to discuss what I should call the pivot of the Bill—the point on which the most important matter—namely, the borough franchise—turns. We are not about to discuss that one point for the first time, because on every occasion when the Bill has been discussed at all so far, almost the whole of the speeches have been directed to that point. Therefore, the House on both sides will come to the consideration of it with minds very much prepared to thoroughly understand the position and debate it. I have a strong opinion that one night, or perhaps two nights, will be sufficient for the settlement of that point. The noble Lord talks a good deal about compromise during the recess. But when we are all away home who is to do the compromise? Is the noble Lord the Member for Chester to stay in London, and cook a new dish that would suit every one's palate? [Earl GROSVENOR interposed a few words which were not heard.] Am I to understand the thing is to be settled in the recess, and that when we meet again here we shall find something we can all sit down to with good appetites and entire approbation? I do not believe in that. If there is to be any compromise or any settlement, it must be done above-board, and—more than that even—it must be done in the full eye of the whole country. I maintain it would be a great advantage to the country if we could have two nights' discussion upon this one important point before the recess, in order that during the recess, when, as is well known, a great number of public meetings are about to be held, we should have the opinion of those public meetings, if they choose to express it, with regard to this most important matter which is before us. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) has spoken of a dissolution. I observe, Sir, that the hon. Member generally manages on these occasions to say something which is likely to be very serviceable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, we have heard a threat of dissolution before. But last year, if such a thing had been hinted at for a moment, we should have been told that it was unconstitutional and unjustifiable to threaten the House of Commons. The hon. Member talked also about bribery. Why, Sir, it is the corruption of this House, the costliness of these seats—it is that £1,000,000 which it has cost to bring 600 gentlemen here—it is that which makes a dissolution difficult, and prevents that appeal to the country which it probably may be necessary to have before this question can be fairly settled. But I maintain that now, when we are going for three weeks to our homes, when this matter will be discussed in every town and village and almost in every house, it is of the utmost importance that this one particular question—the very heart of the Bill, that which makes it either worthy of acceptance by the people, or below contempt, as a measure of Reform—I say it is of the first importance that we should now have one, or even two nights' debate upon it, if not that we may comprehend it better, yet that the millions on whose behalf and at whose demand the Bill is offered to the House may understand what are their true interests in regard to it, and may express that opinion in a way which may help the House after the recess to a final determination on all the great points of it. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is said by his friends never to be wanting in courage, will be ready to go on with the discussion from day to day. He implored the House six weeks ago, in language such as almost to excite our commiseration, to come and take counsel with him and his Colleagues; and yet I find that on every occasion when the House presumes to give him the smallest advice upon this Bill, he seems to shrink from what it has to say—as if there was some great difficulty in his path, and he was afraid he could not accept the advice we were about to give him. I hope that he will not give his support to the proposition for adjournment; but that he will come manfully to the discussion of the principle in which I presume he believes, from the earnestness with which he discusses it. Let the House discuss it. Let the country understand it. Let us find at last what shall be the true principle on which the borough franchise should be based.

MR. WHITBREAD: I am not in the habit of addressing the House at any great length, and I should not have addressed it now did I not entertain a strong feeling on the question before the House. I am one of those who, rightly or wrongly, have clung to the hope that this question might be settled by the Government now in office—and for two reasons. First, that having after a fair trial last year failed ourselves in settling the question, we were bound to give hon. Gentlemen opposite the fairest and fullest trial, to exhaust forbearance, and to be ready to sacrifice anything but great points of principle; and secondly, looking to the differences which exist among the Liberal party, which no man but a madman can fail to recognise, I have thought it was likely that we might get a more liberal measure from the present Government than if the House again changed sides. I confess that I clung to that hope, and I cling to it now; but if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is so unwise as to allow himself to be persuaded by the noble Lord into postponing this question to-night, the last shred of hope I have will be gone, and I, for one, see it will be impossible to arrive at a solution of the question without changing the sides of the House. Now, Sir, I am not one of those who think it is necessary to come to a hurried and agitated decision to-night—indeed, I do not care if we do not come to a decision before the adjournment of the House—but what I want is, that some of those broad points about which there is difference of opinion should be elicited in discussion, and be put before the country for their consideration during the recess. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has made a wise and temperate suggestion on that question. I should like exceedingly that the constituencies of hon. Gentlemen opposite should have an opportunity of considering what the point is upon which they are taking their stand in reference to personal rating. I know that many men in the country attach great importance to the payment of rates before voting; but I do not believe that outside the House they attach any great importance to the question of whether the landlord or the tenant pays them; and it is only by a discussion of the question that there is any hope of our coming to an agreement on the point. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must be prepared to give as well as accept concessions. We want it to be fairly put before the country whether the Government are prepared to say that a man who rents below £10 per annum shall be placed in a worse position than the man above it. It is of great advantage to decide that, because I am still desirous and anxious to settle this question, if possible, by the present Government. I appeal to the noble Lord to withdraw this Amendment; for I hope it will not go to the country that any one on this side of the House had pressed a Motion to postpone this Bill, of which I am sure it will disapprove. I believe in the opinion of hon. Gentlemen on this side that we ought to go on from day to day as long as we can.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY, amid cries of "Divide," which had now become continuous, said, that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire might mean household suffrage to its fullest extent or it might mean quite a different thing. If therefore they came to a decision on it to-night, the whole country would remain for a fortnight in doubt as to what the House of Commons really meant.

MR. HUBBARD : Mr. Speaker—Sir, I have on the notice-list for to-morrow a Motion touching the Education of the People ; but I willingly postpone it in deference to the desire of the House to proceed with the still more important question—the Representation of the People. I take this opportunity of suggesting to the hon. Member for Honiton, whose Motion for Correspondence touching the cases of the Tornado and Queen Victoria stands first on the list for to-morrow, that he should postpone his Motion, if only upon the ground of the inexpediency of raising a public discussion on our relations with the Spanish Government as affected by their treatment of those two vessels. The Spanish people are brave, sensitive, and punctilious on points of honour ; and the adjustment of any differences with them would be rather obstructed than advanced by an exciting discussion in this House. I therefore advise him rather to delay his discussion and permit the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to bring to a satisfactory conclusion the correspondence which he has conducted with so much firmness and courtesy.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Birmingham had said that there would be numerous meetings in the country during the recess, and he was anxious that the House should come to a decision on this question before those meetings took place. Now, I think the noble Lord who has proposed the adjournment—seeing that it is totally impossible for us to discuss continuously during the recess—has done that which is most desirable according to the hon. Gentleman's view, inasmuch as I think it is more desirable that we should know the opinions and feelings of those meetings than that they should have the opportunity of advising us. My opinion is, that it is impossible to settle this question in one night's debate. The House may proceed to debate it ; in debating it it is doing its duty ; but as to the possibility of any arrangement being come to of the nature of which the House are not yet aware, I confess I have not seen any evidence of it. I think the House would do wisely to postpone this question ; but I do think that the noble Lord in making the proposition should have shown us something more of the grounds on which he did so. I am not one of those who are prepared to swallow the whole Bill ; and I take this opportunity of giving notice that before the House proceeds to the second portion of the Bill—that which relates to the redistribution of seats—I will call the attention of the House to the fact that the Bill of the late Government conferred a greater measure of direct representation to the majority of the people in this country resident in the counties than this Bill of the present Government. I have watched to see if any hon. Gentleman would try and touch this great question, that the majority of the English people have not more than one-sixth of representation. ["Order!"] I beg the pardon of the House for travelling out of the immediate question before it, but I have given my notice. I can only say if the noble Lord really believes on sufficient grounds that a clear understanding will be the result of his Motion, I will support him ; for I agree with Lord Grey that on this matter there should be no haste and no precipitation.

SIR GEORGE GREY wished to ask the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, whether it was with his concurrence the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was to make his Motion to-morrow on the Motion for the Adjournment. It must be known to the noble Lord that a Colleague of his in "another place" asked a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) to postpone a Motion of a precisely similar character to that of the hon. Member for Honiton, on the ground that he could not discuss the case of the Tornado without going into that of the Victoria, and that to discuss the case of the latter ship would be prejudicial to the public interests.

LORD STANLEY : I have had some verbal and private communication with my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, and when the hon. Gentleman first expressed his intention of bringing his Motion forward I used every argument in my power to dissuade him from so doing. But my hon. Friend told me he thought he could deal with the subject in such a manner as not to interfere with the prospects of a satisfactory settlement ; and he further said there were many other Members of that House who took a strong interest in the question, and who thought the House ought not to separate for the Easter recess without some discussion on it. For myself, I may observe that I have laid before the House of Commons every paper on the subject in my possession. I have kept nothing back; and I have really nothing additional to state to the House. Under these circumstances it is clear that if my hon. Friend brings forward his Motion, he cannot, in any reply I may make, give hon. Members any farther information. But, having laid all the papers in my possession on the table of the House, and thereby challenged criticism upon the course which I have taken, as set forth in these papers, I could not go further than to say that, on the whole, I should prefer that my hon. Friend did not bring the subject on at present.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I have studied the whole of the papers on this subject very carefully, and I declare to the House they present matters of great importance which must come before us in proper season; but I would not on my own responsibility come down to the House and say what I think of them, having regard to the actual state of circumstances in regard to the relations between this country and Spain.

MR. DILLWYN gathered from the speeches delivered that evening, including the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the House thought an adjournment of the debate in Committee on the Reform Bill would be desirable. ["No, no!"] Certainly he understood hon. Members to wish that there should be an adjournment after a full discussion. He could only say that he was in favour of moderate counsels, rather than excited speeches.

MR. DAVENPORT BROMLEY wished to ask, whether it might not be possible to come to an understanding that the debate was to go on, but that they were to come to no decision on the Amendment to-night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The appeal to me which the noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor) has made is one of that class which, on the part of the Minister, should, I know, be received with a certain degree of sustained silence, because every one must feel that it really is a matter to be decided by the wish of the House, and not by that of any Gentleman sitting on the Treasury Bench. Now, my own opinion is that it is expedient that we should proceed with the discussion of the Bill; but, at the same time, I feel and understand the reason which induced the noble Lord to make the appeal. I do not think that this question has been adequately discussed; but I do not see that there is any reason why, now that we have gone into Committee on a previous occasion, we should lose the opportunity at present before us. Whatever may be the better course, I feel that the course which the House should decide on under these circumstances is always to consult the feeling of the majority of the House, and I believe the feeling of the majority is that, whatever may be the result, we ought to proceed with the discussion to-night. I would now have sat down had it not been for some observations which have been unnecessarily made by some hon. Gentlemen, and particularly by that sincere Reformer the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne). That sincere Reformer has accused the noble Lord the Member for Chester of being in collusion with myself. I thought a few nights ago that the sincere Reformer was in collusion with Her Majesty's Ministers, for he was a very ardent supporter of ours; and now, with a celerity of transformation which, I confess, somewhat astonishes me, it certainly seems curious, after the course he has taken in discussing this measure, he should be so free in his imputations on other Gentlemen. The hon. Gentleman—this sincere Reformer—very boldly and unequivocally announced to the House three times to-night that I had declared I would not listen to any Amendment which might be proposed to the Bill in this House. That is a statement which, on impartial investigation, will be found to have no foundation in fact. I have from the first said that this measure of ours—if once permitted to go into Committee—was one only to be carried by the general consent of the House, and by the assistance derived from hon. Gentlemen on both sides. I have always invited that assistance and that cordial co-operation, and have promised a reciprocity of feeling and conduct on the part of the Government. It is very true, as the hon. Member for Nottingham has stated, that I expressed—[MR. OSBORNE: Hear!] —I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is so attentive, and, I assure him, I feel his attention as a distinction—it is very true that I expressed in my communication to my friends that I should certainly—if the changes proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire were sanctioned by the House—deem that they were fatal to the measure the Government have introduced; and for the very good reason that they really are not

Amendments, but propositions contrary to those which we have brought forward. They are not Amendments to our measure, but constitute a supersession of it. Therefore, it was necessary that there should be a clear understanding on that head; I said that after the Bill had been read a second time, and its principle had been accepted, and we were in Committee, we would be ready to consider Amendments which might be brought forward for the improvement of the measure; but when, upon the Bill going into Committee, notice is given of a series of Amendments which entirely change the character of the measure and alter its principles, then the most convenient course is that we should at once declare that we do not recognise those falsely-called Amendments as subjects which ought to be brought forward in Committee. I only wished it to be understood that the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire are looked on by the Government really as a proposition of a counter Bill. With this view and feeling, I thought it necessary that I should at once state the manner in which we regarded them, and the effect which we considered those propositions, if carried, would have on our measure. With that exception, I am not aware that I have shown any indisposition to receive advice or to listen to any suggestion from hon. Gentlemen opposite, for I feel sure that it is only by mutual concession that there is any prospect of bringing this question to a happy termination.

EARL GROSVENOR: In deference to the feeling of the House I will withdraw my Motion. With regard to the expression of the "sincere Reformer," the Member for Nottingham—

MR. OSBORNE: I rise to order. ["Chair!"] I believe the noble Earl has no right to reply.

MR. SPEAKER: The rule with regard to Motions for Adjournment of the House is this:—If the Motion for the Adjournment is made while another Motion is before the House, and during the progress of the debate, there is no reply. But if the Motion of adjournment is a substantive Motion, the right to reply has been admitted.

EARL GROSVENOR: I can assure the House that in proposing my Motion I had not the least desire to cause any delay in the progress of the measure of Reform. "Delays," it is said, "are sometimes dangerous;" but in this particular case I think a little delay would be safe. As the House is of the contrary opinion, I defer to that opinion and will withdraw the Motion for postponement. With regard to the expressions I was about to refer to when the "sincere Reformer" (the Member for Nottingham) interposed, I will simply say that I will take the first opportunity of answering his assertions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble.

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he quite concurred in the remark that had been made, that the Bill had not received that discussion which its importance demanded during its progress through the preliminary stages. Owing to accidental circumstances three different opportunities for discussion fell through; and the Bill passed into Committee almost without discussion, and the House found itself on the top of an inclined plane which led directly to the pit of democracy. It was startling to think that the same House of Commons which was last year so cautious should this year have become so utterly reckless. Last year a £7 rating was almost thought to be excessive; but when the present Government had to consider the question of Reform in the autumn, and to decide what was to constitute the suitableness of a man to enjoy the possession of the franchise, they arrived at the conclusion that the personal payment of rates was a sufficient guarantee. The attempt had since been made to discover a principle and a resting ground in this; but when they came to try it on its details, there was ample reason to doubt whether in truth any reliable principle was involved in the plan. The position of the compound-householder, under the Bill, could scarcely be said to be in harmony with any principle; and what ought not to be forgotten was the opportunities which his position would open to the influences of bribery and corruption. Suppose that a candidate set about to canvass a borough in anticipation of a General Election. He would find numbers of compound-householders who would say to him that they were too poor to be at the expense of placing themselves upon the register; but that if he would pay this expense for them, and recoup them the difference between the amount of the rates they would have to pay and the amount of the composition the landlord paid, they would be willing to exercise in his favour the franchise which they had acquired by his influence. Well, the candidate would be in a painful dilemma ; either he must lose a number of votes, or he must lay himself open to the imputation of corruption and undue influence. It was well known that, even at present, many Members of the House were expected to contribute to the expense of keeping up the municipal franchise in the boroughs they sat for ; and he believed that an hon. Gentleman was about to resign his seat on account of the increasing heaviness of this annual charge. But these points and others of equal importance had never yet been considered by the House, or by the country ; and he maintained that it would be well that they should have the opportunity of consulting their constituents, who were principally interested, upon them during the Easter recess, before committing themselves to the contest that must arise upon the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Another reason in favour of delay was that there was great uncertainty as to the prospects of a dissolution ; and he should be glad to know—and he thought it important that it should be stated—what was the exact meaning of the circular issued to his supporters by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House—whether it meant that a dissolution would take place in the event of the success of the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, or whether it was only intended as an expression of the personal opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This was a serious question. As the case now stood they might all be sent to the right about at a moment's notice. They were about to go into Committee upon a measure that must change the character of the Constitution to an incalculable degree, and he felt very strongly that this serious step had not been preceded by any adequate discussion upon the principle of the measure. But that discussion had been burked, or, he might say truncated, and the House had been deprived of the advantage of hearing the opinions of many hon. Members to whom they would have been glad to listen. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, for instance, was a statesman to whom they all looked with great confidence and respect. That noble Lord had said that this Bill would not be a Democratic measure, and it would be no doubt a great satisfaction to the House to hear from the noble Lord his reasons for entertaining that opinion. He thought they now required the recess calmly to consider the scheme of Reform, and they ought not to allow themselves to be hurried into a precipitate conclusion. Some hon. Gentlemen talked as if there was only one issue before them, and as if this House were divided into two hostile camps. But it was preposterous to imagine that. There were, at least, five parties in the House. There were the two extremes, the moderates on each side, and the centre, and yet it was expected that 600 Gentlemen selected from the whole country for their ability to exercise a calm and correct judgment on this matter were to move like so many soldiers by the sound of a trumpet, and to render an obedience to their leaders which was positively slavish and degrading. [Cries of "Agree!"] The natural impatience of the House on this point, as manifested by the interruptions to which he was at this moment subjected, furnished him with an illustration which was quite germane to the matter. The argument most commonly made use of here was what he might call an argumentum ad desperationem. Everybody said that something must be done ; they were all tired of the question, and therefore they were prepared to take the first measure that was offered to them. It was well known that Members were brought there under great moral compulsion, and that on great party divisions Members were induced to vote, not by the ordinary party inducements, but by others that were not quite so legitimate. It was only the other day that there had been a serious split in the party opposite ; but they were now given to understand that the wanderers had returned to the fold, and that they were ready to do penance for their backsliding. As they seemed now as anxious for a division as they were formerly averse to it, he presumed they were now better drilled than they were before. He was very certain that the country did not understand the distinctions that had so lately been set up respecting compound-householders. In many parts of the country they did not know what a compound-householder was. It was a mere jargon of debate that was bandied about from side to side. Then with respect to the Bill—it was represented to the other side as a Liberal measure, and that though it might be Conservative in esse, it would prove to be Liberal in posse. He believed that was true, and that before many years were over there would not be a compound-householder in a borough but by hook or by crook he would obtain the suffrage. But to that side of the House it was represented as strongly Conservative. It had all sorts of check—there was the dual check, the personal rating check, and the residence check; but they were all in the course of vaunting. He contended that if they came down to household suffrage pure and simple, it would be better to adopt the municipal franchise at once. Should the checks which had been proposed by the Government not be accepted as part of their Bill, the franchise given by the Government measure would differ from the municipal franchise merely in respect of the latter requiring three years and the former two years' residence. If such a result were probable the better course would be to accept the municipal franchise.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Boroughs).

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) was good enough at an early period of the evening to state his willingness to waive the moving of his Amendment until a later stage of the Bill, I need not go through the formality of making a fresh appeal to him. Before I state the purpose and object of the Amendment I am about to move, I wish, on account of the mingled difficulty and dryness of the subject, to observe pointedly to hon. Members that there are two very important questions connected with rating that are not in the slightest degree involved in the statement I have to make. The question we discussed last year, and which became decisive of the fate of the late Government—namely, whether the franchise should be measured by rateable value, or by clear annual value, is not now before us. Another question of very considerable importance is likewise wholly apart from the vote which I shall invite the Committee to give—I mean the question of payment of rates. The question whether the voter who is liable to the payment of rates personally shall have paid his rates before he is authorized to claim to be put upon the register, and the question whether the voter who pays his rates through the medium of his rent to his landlord shall likewise have had those rates paid by the landlord or, in default of the landlord by himself, before he is entitled to be put upon the register, are questions of considerable moment, which I do not in the slightest degree intend now to raise. My own personal opinion is that which was expressed by the Bill of last year; but I own that the question of the payment of rates is a question upon which any Member would incur great responsibility if, for the sake of it, he rejected a Reform Bill which was in other respects satisfactory. My Amendment upon the 3rd clause involves nothing touching that portion of the clause which requires the payment of rates. This Amendment, as has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is the first of a series which is intended to give effect to the views which I glanced at on the opening of the debate when the Bill was presented to the House, and which I more fully explained on the second reading of the Bill. They are not, indeed, complete, even as they stand upon the Votes, because any proposal to relieve from liability the smaller occupier is a matter in respect of which it would obviously have been impossible to deal with in a clause which relates to enfranchisement. It would require more than one clause, drawn with considerable care, and involving a considerable amount of collateral and subsidiary provisions, to deal with that question, and I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) will fulfil his intention of presenting clauses with a view of giving effect to a plan of that nature. My Amendments form a whole, and appear to constitute a mode of procedure which, I believe, would be satisfactory to the feelings, and would correspond with the widely-spread and deeply entertained convictions of this House. But in asking the Committee to concur in any one of the Amendments, I certainly cannot adopt the lofty language of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who says that they relate to the vital question of residence, and that if any one of them be adopted it will be impossible for the Government to proceed with the Bill. I have no authority to present these Amendments to the House. I may have my own opinion as to their connection with and adherents to the plan ; but I have no power and no inclination to bind any other person—they are entire and consistent in themselves, and unless I very much mistake, can stand on their own merits.

Now, Sir, so much has been said on so many occasions about our position with regard to this subject that I will state to the House what I regard that position to be. The paramount object we have before us is to pass a good Reform Bill, the secondary but still important objects are to pass that Reform Bill during the present year, and to pass it, if we can, by the aid of the present Government. I am not, however, prepared to sacrifice the paramount object to those of secondary importance. We should, in my opinion, commit a vital mistake if, because we have been laggard in former years, we should, I will not say hastily, but with insufficient care, piece together the clauses of a Reform Bill, and send forth to the country that which, while it professes to be a settlement, can only lead to new and fiercer agitation. Subject to the goodness of the Reform Bill, there is scarcely any sacrifice of time, feeling, or opinion compatible with higher principles that we ought not to be prepared to make in order to dispose permanently of this question.

Now, with respect to the Motion to which I am about to ask the House to agree, I must take leave to observe that up to Saturday last I had not the slightest reason to suppose that even the Motion I now make, and much less the innocent little proposal with regard to the two years' residence ["Oh, oh!"] would have been received as they have been by Her Majesty's Government. When I say "little," though it was not large in itself it was large in principle. Why, what happened on the second reading? Most certainly the objection to personal rating was not blinked. I myself detained the House for some time on the subject, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) followed me in a speech on the same subject, of which I will say nothing more than that it was worthy of his name, his character, and his talents. My hon. and learned Friend confined himself exclusively to this subject. He presented it in the clearest form to the eye and mind of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his speech of that night, did not hold the high and imperious language which he does now. To that speech of my hon. and learned Friend, his sole reply, couched in five words, was "Get out of Nisi Prius." By passing by in that manner what he now says is the gist and upshot of his Bill, the right hon. Gentleman raised the impression that he was willing to act with us ; but when he told us that he was prepared to enter into the consideration of this important portion of such Bill the terms are of little value, unless they are interpreted in a liberal spirit. If we cannot have the aid of the Government with respect to this matter of personal rating, I deeply regret it. I think we have shown on this side of the House, by the conduct we have pursued up to the present week, that we are entitled to the credit of having acted with sincerity. I should deeply regret the loss of the aid of the Government, and that they should fasten themselves—if they ultimately do so—to a proposition and scheme so unhappy in its whole conception as this of personal rating. Still, the withdrawal of that aid cannot affect the paramount duty of the House ; because, if we send forth a Bill with safeguards and limits we are answerable for the character of those safeguards and limits, and are bound to see that they are not constituted of flimsy and untrustworthy materials, utterly unworthy of the House of Commons. Now, when I look at the propositions of the Government with respect to the borough franchise—and for the present I will look no further—I find that its most prominent characteristics are an extreme narrowness of immediate enfranchisement, and the setting up of certain barriers, to which barriers we are invited to trust for excluding a great mass of householders below the limit of £10. These are the two prominent features of the plan. Now, let us look at the figures in order that I may make good what I say. As the figures stand in the Return which bears the name of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury, the number of direct rate-paying householders who would be entitled to the advantages of this Act would be 246,000, and, I think I understand, according to the computation of the Government, 50 per cent of that number, or 123,000, may be expected to get upon the register. I think that deduction of 50 per cent is not an undue deduction. The figures again show that there are 476,000 compound-householders who would be qualified under this Act, and according to the same computation that number would be reduced to 238,000 votes. But these figures are not correct, though their incorrectness is not owing to any fault on the part of the Government or of those engaged in their preparation. This incorrectness is due to the fact that in the first of those figures—the total of supposed ratepaying householders—there are comprised a very considerable number of persons who are not compounders under the Small Tenements Act, but who have their rates paid for them by arrangement between the parish officers and the owners. In Liverpool last year no less than 7,000 or 8,000—indeed, I believe a greater number—are affected by this mistake, and its results are in the same manner to be found in other towns, with whose names I will not weary the House. The consequence is, that the number who are to be admitted as ratepaying-householders will be still further reduced, and we shall in proportion have to add to the number of the compound-householders. As these figures stand it would appear that about two-thirds of the householders below the limit of £10 are, in the larger sense of the term, compound-householders—that is to say, they do not pay their own rates, but pay them in the shape of rent. With regard, then, to the persons who are to be immediately admitted to the exercise of the franchise, if you take the numbers at about 200,000 or 210,000, which will place upon the register about 100,000 voters, I confess I do not expect that any plan which contemplates as its proper or normal result the enfranchisement of that number of persons is likely to give the slightest satisfaction to the country, or will be accepted by those who earnestly and sincerely wish for Reform. But when I look beyond that point, I find the real gist of the question lies in the method in which we are to deal with the compound-householders. Insufficient enfranchisement in the immediate operation of the Bill is the first objection I take to the plan of Her Majesty's Government. It is absolutely necessary that we should find the means of enlarging that enfranchisement. And here I may venture to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), who has proved himself one of the stoutest and most consistent opponents of Reform in this House, and ask him whether it is proper to deal with the question on a plan so minute as that in which it is proposed by the Government to give direct enfranchise-ment. Why, Sir, I presume that he would say if this subject is to be dealt with at all, it must be dealt with in a manner which will make any measure that may be passed likely to prove lasting. Such a proposition, however, as that made by Her Majesty's Government could not last. It would merely be the earnest of what is to come and the incentive to further agitation. The limiting principle of the Government is what they call personal rating, apart from the question of payment of rates on the qualifying tenement. The question is whether the rating shall be laid on the man himself. The principle of this Bill is personal rating, and that this is the old constitutional principle of English representation. If we go back we shall find a vast number of other usages which prevailed in former times, and which have been wholly superseded in consequence of the improved machinery of Government. In former times, no doubt, there was no such thing as a local system which placed the owner between the occupier and the authorities who received rates; and it is not the truth that this supposed constitutional system formed the basis of our whole representative system; on the contrary, it was only in the scot and lot boroughs that that system can be said to have fully prevailed in number. These scot and lot boroughs were, I think, about forty-six or forty-eight, which is somewhat less than the whole number of boroughs, which is, I think, 214. There were other boroughs where the voters were burgesses, or had the burgage tenure, where, undoubtedly, they were ratepayers, but the foundations of their votes were not laid in the rating; and with respect to other voters there was no personal rating whatever in any manner connected with the franchise. The freeman is not necessarily a personal ratepayer; the freeman in many instances is non-resident; and as to one half of the boroughs of the country, it is not a fact—I apprehend I shall not be contradicted—that ratepaying was originally or at any period known as the basis of the franchise. I admit to you that in many boroughs it was; and what then? Is that a reason for rejecting all the lights and all the profit of experience? Modern usage and the wants of society have found that it was convenient, and in many cases necessary, to make a change in the law. So difficult was it found in many large towns to collect rates in small sums from small holders where the population was gathered together in great masses, that there sprung up in the best and most English of all methods—that is, spontaneously and locally—a system under which the landlord paid the rates and charged them to the occupier in levying his rents. Well, then, can this proposition be denied—that the man who pays his rates with his rent to his landlord as a compound-householder as truly pays rates as the man who pays them personally? Do not let us flinch from the trial of this principle. It is disputed by political economists whether the ultimate incidence of rates is upon the occupier or upon the owner. I have my opinion upon that question. I will not, however, discuss it now; but I will say that whether it be upon the owner or the occupier the ultimate incidence is precisely the same in the case where the occupier pays the rate as in the compound-householder—I hold that to be an undeniable principle of political economy—and if I were to give a descriptive definition of the Small Tenements Act, I would call it, as well as the many other similar local Acts, Acts for obtaining the payment of rates from persons from whom they could not previously be obtained, by substituting a new and secure process for a process that was slow, costly, troublesome, and vexatious. Thus we became acquainted with the class of compound-householders, and the measure was calculated to relieve the parochial officers from much trouble. But this compound-householder system, which is, in point of fact, a great improvement of modern times, a great legislative social and economical Reform, comes out in the Bill of Her Majesty's Government as something approaching to a note of moral inferiority. Was there ever such a paradox propounded in Parliament? Will any man tell me that you can draw a distinction as to the moral character of any two places, because one has adopted the Small Tenements Act and the other has not? Yet in the one case we are told, with great laudation, that virtue prevails, duties are performed, and men are worthy of the franchise; in the other, the citizens are inferior in character, and, unfortunately, corrupt; they are given to cheating their creditors and getting drunk. This is the character we have given to us of the compound-householder. But the compound-householder has no choice in the matter. He goes, as we go, where his occasions call him; he goes where his duties or his professions requires him to go. Do you think a father of a family will perform his duty to his wife and children if, instead of going straight to the town where he could find the best market for his labour, he was to inquire whether the Small Tenements Act operated in that town, and, if it did, to avoid it as he would the plague? What is the meaning of this doctrine of testing by compound-householding? I contend, and I challenge contradiction, that the individual man is not in any respect measured by it. When the local Act is obtained, or the Small Tenements Act is adopted, they are accepted under the overpowering influence of property and parochial authority; the compound-householder himself has nothing to do with it; he is not a compound-householder by his own act or choice; and therefore it is preposterous to attempt to use that condition as a criterion of character, and as an occasion for creating a distinction between men of the same class. How has this principle of compound-householding been received in the country? It is one of the most remarkable instances of rapid extension of a new system that I know of. Under the form of overpowering reasons of convenience and local benefit the Small Tenements Act has been adopted in about 5,000 parishes in this country, and the only reason that checks its further progress is found in the feeling of the landlord that the reduction on the full rate, 25 per cent, is insufficient, and because the small householders are jealous, and I think justly and laudably jealous, of their right to be acknowledged as payers of rates. But, notwithstanding that these impediments stand in the way, I believe that the Act, which is not more than sixteen or eighteen years old, has been adopted by 5,000 vestries. In how many has it been abandoned? We have heard now and then of a stray parish, amounting to something like one in 1,000. Thus public convenience has declared in favour of the Small Tenements Act; the system rests on the ground of convenience, and has no connection whatever with the character of persons; and can you, since it forms no test of character, say to 500,000 of your fellow-countrymen, "I will pass an Act which shall enfranchise 100,000 or 110,000 men of your class and condition of life as yourselves—persons not differing from you in any circumstances of education or independence, and I will refuse to you that which I give to them on account of your being compound-householders; and, having passed that Act, I shall expect you to be perfectly quiet and contented, and say I have settled the question of Parliamentary Reform?" In the course of the last debate the hon. and learned Solicitor General and the President of the Poor Law Board, who followed me, made no reply to the astonishing figures which I fairly selected from the catalogue of towns, showing the ludicrous inequality of this method of proceeding. Some of those figures are fresh in the recollection of hon. Members. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) is in the predicament of having fourteen persons out of his 100,000 qualified by the liberal and comprehensive measure of the Government, and I rather think there was one large town where a single unit was qualified by the Bill. If that unit was the gross number qualified, it would be very difficult to say what would be the net result. I have spoken of the inequalities between different towns; let us look for a moment at the inequality which would exist among persons of a similar class in the same town; let us look at the elements of trouble, confusion, strife, and disturbance this principle, forsooth, of personal rating is going to carry throughout the boroughs of the country. When we find that one-half of the boroughs of the country are partly under the Small Tenements Act and partly not, this becomes a very serious question. Let us, then, see how the Government Bill would operate in some of those boroughs. The Bill would take from those parishes which have the majority of the population the chief power in determining an election, because they are under the Small Tenements Act, and hand over that power to a minority of the populations of the same town, because the Small Tenements Act does not operate in that portion of the town where the minority lives. Is that the way in which we are to seek a solid and permanent settlement of the question? I will give three or four instances. The great town of Bristol is very evenly divided. But the 78,000 persons living in the portion which is under the Small Tenements Act yield only 5,493 persons qualified to become electors, while the 76,000 persons living in parishes not under the Small Tenements Act yield 10,431 persons so qualified. Half the population of Bristol, therefore, living in parishes not under the Small Tenements Act will be invested with exactly double the electoral power possessed by those in parishes governed by its provisions. Is that the way to give contentment? Is there not something strange, something almost ludicrous, in calling this "legislation," in sending an Act of Parliament like this into towns and parishes to establish inequalities which are entirely new and perfectly capricious, and then expecting these inequalities, the fresh creation of our own brains, to be accepted by the people of this country as if they were surrounded with the venerable halo of ancient usage, or as if they presented those advantages of diversity of system which men undoubtedly are sometimes contented to enjoy, even at the expense of anomaly, when they are handed down to us from many generations? In Grantham the open parishes have 3,926 inhabitants, qualifying 773 persons to vote; the close parishes have 7,915 inhabitants, or double the number; but only 688 persons are qualified to vote. In Leeds the open parishes have a population of 35,561, qualifying 7,358 persons to vote; the close parishes have a population of 171,604, but of these only 9,200 would have votes. So that one-sixth of the population of Leeds has four-ninths of the voting power of that town. These figures, of course, are only to be taken by approximation; because the Return laid on the table does not give the number of male occupiers in each town, and we are, therefore, obliged to make a computation from the number of inhabited houses, after the ordinary average deduction. The figures, however, must be nearly accurate. The next case is that of the town of Pontefract. I do not know how my hon. Friend the representative of that town (Mr. Childers) likes the figures, but here they are. The open parishes contain a population of 5,486, qualifying 723 persons to vote; the close parishes, with a population of 6,250, would only qualify 447 persons to vote. A minority of the population, consequently, would possess two-thirds of the voting power. You may go through the process of writing down something on a piece of paper or parchment and calling it a law, but it can never attract the respect due to law when its operation would be partial, capricious, unfair to such an extent as this. And these inequalities are to be securities of the Constitution, guarantees against democracy; are to be the firm, solid, well-built walls, which are to stem the tide of agitation! This strange emanation of some ingenious mind, fanciful as if displayed upon the stage, but wholly alien from the spirit and history of British legislation, and for which there is nothing approaching to a precedent in the annals of this House, is to supply the new governing power of the nation. Shoreham is the only other town to which I will refer. In the open parishes there are 13,346 persons, of whom 2,244 are qualified to vote. A population of 19,276 in the close parishes will only qualify 1,455. The Solicitor General will perhaps say, let these parishes cure the evil by throwing out the Small Tenements Act, or by bringing in its operation, as the case may be. But I object altogether to making our political measures a means of interference with the social and economic arrangements of the people. Whether the Small Tenements Act is or is not to be put in operation in a particular borough ought to be decided by considerations of local convenience or advantage, and not by the sentiments of political partisans, who may wish to obtain influence or power for the quarter in which they themselves reside. Irrespective of those still graver and more conclusive objections for which the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman offer no remedy whatever, the legislation which he insists that we shall adopt, and declares that if rejected it will be fatal to his plan of the borough franchise, has this serious drawback, that the constituencies all over the country will depend on the will of the local authorities, assembled in their vestries and corporations, and not on the will of the Imperial Parliament. I must own it appears to me these are considerations of very great weight, and I wish it were in my power adequately to explain to the House the real social working of these changes. I may be allowed to say that I think much prejudice exists upon this subject at the opposite side of the House, and I will state how I think that prejudice has arisen. Many hon. Gentlemen opposite are familiar with the law of ratepaying in the country and in the open parishes of the country. Now in the country I am by no means prepared to assert that readiness to pay rates may not be a very good test of a man's character in other respects; but in the towns, where these arrangements of compound-householding are adopted wholesale, the principle affects, not the individuals but the parishes themselves; and to visit the individuals with penal consequences for not paying rates by excluding them from the franchise, or by erecting barriers which it is in our power to remove, is a course founded neither in policy

nor in justice. There are many persons who still think that there is something which degrades the workman in becoming a compound-householder. May I be allowed to point out that there are many good and valid reasons affecting persons in that position in life which may tend powerfully to make the workman prefer to be a compound-householder to being a ratepaying-householder; and further, which may make a skilled workman of high character, intelligence, and industry wish rather to be a lodger than either a ratepaying or a compound-householder? It is the view of the workman to simplify the transactions connected with his affairs. The workman receives his income weekly; what more convenient to the workman than that he should pay weekly the whole charge connected with his house? You think you have got another test of character in residence. Ah, Sir, little do the gentlemen know of the necessity incumbent on the workman to follow his work; little do they know the cruel infliction laid upon the working man when he has to walk two, three, or four miles each morning before he begins his work, and again in the evening the same distance before he rests from his labour. A workman wishing to be near his work often has occasion to change his abode. What can be more inconvenient to a man who so changes his abode than to be perplexed with small questions as to the amount of rates due upon his house, to be compelled to sacrifice time—time being to him money—in order to find out what is due, and what amount the incoming tenant has to pay. And how are they to ascertain this? Are they to employ lawyers to divide their respective proportions of the rate? No, Sir, these are matters which to us are very light; they come in the solicitor's bills, and are disposed of; but to them they are very serious indeed. I have said that to the working man having occasion frequently to change his abode, the position of a compound-householder is greatly preferable to that of the ratepaying-householder, and that he often prefers to be a lodger. And reasonably so. In this metropolis, this great home and hive of lodgers, a working man cannot be a householder in the simple sense. He must either be a lodger or a lodging-house keeper. The workman householder, who occupies a house for himself, his wife, and family, hardly exists, as a class, in London. If a man takes a house, he must undertake the position of a lodging-house keeper. Cannot you conceive that a most intelligent working man, desirous to devote his whole energies to his trade, is often very reluctant to hamper himself with the business of a lodging-house keeper, and therefore becomes a lodger? In mentioning the case of the lodger I may make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman on a point, which stands in most intimate relation to the one I myself have introduced. It has been said by everybody, uncontradicted, as far as I have heard, by him, and therefore I may suppose he will redeem his pledge—that he has conceded the lodger franchise. If he has conceded that point, what becomes of the principle of personal rating?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I never conceded the lodger franchise. I said that I would consider any fair and proper proposal on the point. But neither the right hon. Gentleman himself nor anybody else has made such a proposal.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has contradicted me upon a matter as to which I gave him no occasion. I might, indeed, have said that the right hon. Gentleman, when he proceeded to deal with the lodger franchise, became heroic in his style, and said—"What! Suspect me of indifference or hostility to the lodger franchise? Why, I am the father of it!" We shall see now what kind of paternal tenderness the right hon. Gentleman exhibits towards his offspring. What I said was that the right hon. Gentleman had permitted that statement to be circulated everywhere, without contradiction or qualification of any kind. He must have been aware that it was spread through the press all over the country, greatly to his advantage. Everywhere it has been said, "Oh, don't talk of the lodger franchise, we all know that it is conceded." What I want to know is this—is it conceded or is it not? If the lodger franchise is conceded, I rejoice at it; but if it is conceded, I want to know what becomes of your principle of personal rating. Do you mean to say that in every parish in London there is to be a new survey, and that not only every house, but every floor of every house is to be rated? I think not. But if not, you cannot have a lodger franchise and the principle of personal rating. The right hon. Gentleman must come to some means such as those proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr.

M'Cullagh Torrens), and I think some other hon. Gentleman; but it is clear that the lodger class cannot come into the electoral body by the right of personal rating. What becomes, then, of the principle of personal rating in the borough franchise? The importance of this point cannot be overstated; for this Bill has been described in peculiar terms within the last few days by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote). My right hon. Friend says, "Do not accuse me of inconsistency. We do not propose to lower the franchise. All we do is to create certain species of franchise, some above the line and some below the line where it is at present placed by law; but as to lowering the franchise I am as much opposed to that as ever. If I were not I would be in the white sheet." Does my right hon. Friend forget that poor Bill which out of compassion—for I did not like it much—I once or twice tried to express some regret for—I mean the Bill with the £6 franchise? Did that lower the franchise? I should not wish to see my right hon. Friend in "the white sheet," for I do not think it would become him; but when the £6 Bill was the proposition of the Government, he must have been in that garment though he is out of it now, because the franchise is not lowered. That is the declaration which the Secretary of State for India made in presence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Let the country know whether it be so or not. The franchise is not lowered; but special franchises are to be given. Let my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) rejoice, for there is one man at least entirely with him—there is one other man entirely opposed to Reform in the only sense in which the people understand it, and the only sense in which they care a pin about it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has printed certain new clauses; and from these I think it clearly appears that when myself and my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) contended that on the compound-householder below £10 this Bill would inflict a fine, we used no rhetorical figure, but kept within the bounds of strict and literal justice. Those clauses—or, I believe I should say, the clause, for there is only one clause, though it is composed of several sections—this clause considerably mitigates the difficulties. It requires the compound-householder to pay up the full rate assessed upon his house on his first application, and having once done that the compound-householder becomes a ratepaying-householder. Is that the principle on which the Government propose to stand? What has the right hon. Gentleman said to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert)? The right hon. Gentleman cannot endure any portion of the Amendments proposed by me—he holds them all to be intolerable; they must stop the Bill, and they must entail all those public calamities and disasters which have been so skilfully shadowed forth by the right hon. Gentleman and his satellites, and which have been made use of to act on the public mind. Well, Sir, I was saying—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The satellites,] but as the right hon. Gentleman appears so taken with the expression, I will perhaps come back to it by-and-bye. I have done with the satellites for the present. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems not to have made up his mind whether to assent to it or not. He is ready to come to some conciliatory arrangement which may be satisfactory to both parties. But the meaning of the proposal of my hon. Friend cannot be mistaken for a moment. His meaning, as regards personal rating, is exactly the same as mine; he wants to place the compound-householder substantially and for every purpose connected with the franchise on exactly the same footing as the ratepaying-householder. He wants that no arbitrary rule as regards the personal payment of rates shall stand in the way of the compound-householder; he objects to allow any arbitrary barriers raised by Parliament to stand between a man who is declared worthy of the franchise and his enjoyment of the franchise; so that if the right hon. Gentleman holds my proposal to be so objectionable he will find a rather formidable opponent in the Member for Oldham. My hon. Friend is not the person to be put off with soft words. He objects to personal rating as a barrier; and therefore his object is the same as mine, which the right hon. Gentleman has declared—but I trust not irrevocably declared—to be wholly inconsistent with his views. Now, I object altogether to the clause of the right hon. Gentleman. I admit that he gets rid of certain difficulties; because I think it would be more difficult to employ the registration agent to convert the great mass of compound-householders into ratepaying-householders than to act on the principle of the clause. But the right hon. Gentleman says to the compound-householder, "I have no spite or malevolence whatever towards you; I am willing you should vote; but, in order that you may vote, you must cease to be a compound-householder." Why, three-fourths of the householders under £10 are in the position of compound-householders for economical and social reasons; and when the right hon. Gentleman says to them, "You shall have the franchise, but you must cease to be compound-householders," I ask him why are we to inflict a punishment on those persons as the price of the franchise? How should we like to endure that? Has the right hon. Gentleman considered what will be the effect of this class legislation—this imposing a fine and where not a fine, difficulty, and loss of time, which is loss of money—has he considered what will be the effect of such legislation on our humbler fellow-subjects? We should not endure it for a moment. Why should this punishment be inflicted? I say if Parliament wants to limit the franchise, let it limit the franchise openly and manfully. Let it not send forth a two-faced Bill, with a face of Toryism on one side and a face of Democracy on the other, and vainly hope and expect that we can induce believers at one point of the compass to worship one of the masks and believers at the other point of the compass to bow down to the other mask. It appears to me that such a measure is not worthy of being proposed by the Government; but if, unfortunately, the Government do propose it, the very best course for them to take is to amend their proposition while there is yet time. Of this, at least, I am certain—that such a principle is not one worthy of being entertained by Parliament. It is our duty, even at this the eleventh hour of our Reform discussion, to object to such a proposal. If you think it expedient that there should be an unlimited franchise, let it be unlimited. If, on the other hand, you think it ought to be limited—and I have expressed my opinion upon that point—say so and leave it to the people to judge—as they always do judge—fairly and candidly our actions; but do not let us adopt provisions which convert a boon into an offence from the nature of the conditions by which it is accompanied. Do not let us inflict a wrong on any portion of the community, which wrong will inevitably be avenged on the community at large, in the shape of trouble, strife, and controversy, and in the shape of renewed and continued agitation — agitation which will begin from the day which sees such a law placed on the statute book, and never cease till the last vestige of such senseless legislation becomes a relic of the past. I now beg to move in Clause 3, page 2, lines 3 and 4, after “and 2,” to insert, “whether he in person, or his landlord, be rated to the relief of the poor.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, any one who heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and the Amendment with which he concluded, would suppose that, up to the present moment, there was no Act of Parliament in existence under which persons are obliged to be rated to the relief of the poor in order that they may obtain the electoral franchise. Any one who heard the right hon. Gentleman's speech would suppose that up to this time no one need be rated for the purpose of enjoying the franchise; and that by this Bill the Government propose some new law which will make the obtaining of the franchise more difficult, while the measure is one purporting to extend the franchise. A greater mistake cannot possibly exist. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech delivered, not with reference to this particular Amendment, but a speech intended to be read out of doors with reference to some new Bill of his own, says, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated there are vital principles in the Bill, but that they will be abandoned, and that a measure, of which he has now given us the first instalment, is to be brought in by way of amendment, and carried by gentle, and, if necessary, by strong pressure. That, it seems, is what is to be done for the purpose of getting rid of this Bill. Now, the condition that an occupier is to be rated personally and pay his rates is no new principle in connection with the franchise, and I could hardly have believed that the right hon. Gentleman would have represented it as the semblance of a grievance; for is it a new proposal? Why, the right hon. Gentleman admits that prior to the Reform Bill of 1832 there were forty-eight boroughs in which the right to vote was conferred by paying scot and lot — that is, by being personally rated and paying the rates; and the Reform Act, following that old-established principle, enacted not what the right hon. Gentleman proposes — the payment of rent simply — but that the occupier should not only be rated, but should pay the rates in order to obtain the right to vote at the election of Members of Parliament; and, in addition, the 27th section requires him to have occupied the house for one year, to have been rated, and to have paid all the poor rates and assessed taxes due upon his occupation. And yet it is now said to be a new principle that a person should be excluded from the franchise unless he pays his rates. Then, as to the compound-householders, I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman into other parts of the present measure, but at once proceed to the history of this compound rating. Let us see what legislation has taken place with regard to them. In 1819 Sturges Bourne's Act passed, the first Act, as far as I am aware, which enacted that the landlord should, with the consent of the vestry, be rated in the case of houses of between £6 and £20 annual value. The operation of that Act was expressly excluded from those boroughs in which there were scot and lot voters. Those voters consequently retained the suffrage until the Reform Act of 1832, when Parliament laid down the principle that no man should enjoy the electoral franchise unless he was not only rated but paid the rates. As therefore, up to the present time, the payment of rates is necessary, except in certain cases, for the exercise of the franchise, I cannot see how the right hon. Gentleman can complain of our proposal, which puts the new voters on precisely the same footing as those enfranchised by the Act of 1832. It must be borne in mind that neither Sturges Bourne's Act nor the Small Tenements Act contemplated the slightest interference with the electoral franchise; and if the principle that the rate and the vote should go together be correct, the existence of those Acts is a mere accidental obstacle, which may be overcome without disturbing that principle. Now, what do we propose? We do not think it right that a man who merely rents a house should be entitled to vote, if the landlord is found on the rate book, and actually pays the rate; but we provide machinery by which a compound-householder, whether below or above £6, is enabled to get upon the rate and so acquire the franchise. We propose to place them in the same position as those above them — the £10 householders — are placed by the Reform Act of 1862. These compound Acts, of which we have heard so much, it is hardly necessary I should remind the Committee, never contemplated

when they were passed to interfere in the least degree with the franchise. If therefore the principle be correct that a man who is rated and pays his rates has a right to vote, it is no argument to say that the Compound Householders Act, a mere accidental obstacle, should come in the way of carrying out that principle; and if it is overcome the person who has a right to vote cannot complain. The Small Tenements Act has, in fact, nothing whatever to do with the question before the Committee, because we provide a machinery whereby a person who shall have the right to vote is enabled to get on the rate and exercise the electoral franchise; but if he does not comply with the old and well-established test of being rated and paying his rates, he will not have the franchise. The argument adduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would lead to the inference that we were introducing a new principle instead of an old-established principle of the English Constitution, which was adopted by the Act of 1832, and which, if adopted now, will put the occupier under £10 per annum in the same position as the occupier above that sum. I will not now discuss the proposed clauses to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and which he admitted met his objections to a considerable extent, for we shall arrive at them in due time; but I will confine myself to the Amendment which he has moved, and which proposes that, whether the landlord or the occupier be rated and pays the rates, the latter shall have a vote. That Amendment is clearly in opposition to the Act of 1832; and if it is right that the £10 householder shall be rated, I am at a loss to conceive why the £6 householder should not be subject to the same condition. As to the calculations which the right hon. Gentleman went into the other night at so much length, they may be disposed of in one word. The right hon. Gentleman stated that 420,000 persons would be excluded from the franchise by the test that we propose; but the fact is that there is not one of those 420,000 who may not enjoy the franchise by putting his name upon the rate, through the easy process provided by this Bill, and by then paying the rates to which he is assessed. If he does that he may enjoy the franchise as freely as those who are now enjoying it. The case which the right hon. Gentleman has attempted to make out for rating the landlord instead of the occupier is founded on the Small Tenements Act. Now, that Act is in operation in certain boroughs and not in operation in others; it being open to the vestry to decide whether or not the owners shall be rated instead of the occupiers. But what is the object of that Act? Why, it was passed to facilitate the collection of the rates, and without the slightest reference to the electoral franchise. And how does it operate? The overseer does not ascertain whether a particular occupier is respectable and likely to pay the rates; but the Act, if adopted at all, is adopted for the whole parish, and all houses under £6 are rated to the landlords. How do we deal with that Act? We alter it to this extent—that any person living in a house for which the rates are paid by the landlord, and desiring to exercise the electoral franchise, may come forward and say that he is willing to take what is given him under this Bill upon the terms on which it is given, and thus may obtain a vote. And we do so on these grounds—that persons who are likely to accept our terms are also likely to be men, not of migratory habits, but men of stability, residents in a place, and ready to take their share of the parochial burdens. Such men may take the enfranchisement provided for them by this Bill; but those who do not choose to comply with the terms we offer may not. Now, is there any hardship in that? I do not intend to follow the right hon. Gentleman in his somewhat diffuse speech—for he argued five or six questions ahead of that which is before the Committee. I will not stop here to discuss with the right hon. Gentleman whether a lodger franchise is to be granted or not, or to enter upon the various other questions which he raised. Looking to the number of Amendments on the paper, I must confine myself to the question before the Committee—namely, whether the franchise is to be given to a man whose rates are paid by his landlord—whether you are to do away with the principle of the Reform Act of 1832, and of the Municipal Corporation Act of 1836, which was passed exactly on the same principle; or whether you are to have, as regards the electoral franchise for the boroughs, those who are now to be placed on the list of voters, placed there on the same terms, as far as regards their liability to payment of rates, as those who claim under the 27th section of the Reform Act. I will now call attention for a moment to the Small Tenements Act. The effect of that Act and of another passed in 1858 was to cast upon the boroughs, as far as municipal elections are concerned, a very large body of new electors, and the question arose as to whether an alteration in those Acts might not be beneficially made. Upon this question of personal rating and payment of rates I do beg the attention of the Committee to the Report of the Select Committee of the Lords in 1859, on the occasion of Lord Derby's Reform Bill. That Report has been laid upon the table of this House, and I may therefore refer to it. It is immaterial to my purpose to consider the question as to what was the state of things in 1832 as regards compound-householders, to which I addressed myself the other night. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) and I were at issue as to the practical effect of the composition of the rate with regard to the electoral franchise; I had the good fortune, however, to find that the view which I took was adopted by the hon. Member for Birmingham, who entirely concurred with me as to the construction of the Act. But we all know the effect that was produced by the operation of the Small Tenements Act—namely, that a large number of occupiers voted although the landlord paid the rates at municipal elections. The question arose whether a man who was not rated and did not pay his rates ought to be allowed to vote at municipal elections. The question was gone into at great length by the Committee of the House of Lords, and I beg to call the attention of hon. Members to what was their opinion on the subject. At page 4 of the Report the Committee comment at considerable length upon the character and condition of the new class of voters. I am not going now to argue whether or not a hard line should be drawn below which no one should vote. I am now only anxious to show what was the effect of the Act as far as a certain class of persons are concerned. After referring to a class of migratory occupiers, the Report proceeds—

“There is a class of electors of a different stamp, who now vote under the Small Tenements Act. A higher order of artisans often quite as intelligent and independent as the small shopkeepers generally occupy tenements, the rates of which are paid by the landlord, and anything depriving them of the right to vote would be undesirable.”

An alteration was accordingly suggested in many respects the same as that proposed in this Bill. The Committee say—

“The Committee are of opinion that as a test of fitness for municipal affairs as well as a security against corrupt and fraudulent practices actual, direct, and continuous payment of rates should be an indispensable condition of the municipal franchise.”

That is what we find to be the opinion of the Lords' Committee of 1859—that in order to winnow away a certain number of electors who were not fit to exercise the right of voting, we should allow those who were willing to be placed on the rate book and paid their rates to have votes; and to exclude the rest. That is what we propose to do now. I have adverted to what has been the course of actual legislation. Now, let me call attention to what has been attempted in what I may call abortive legislation. I have already said that a part, and no small part, of the right hon. Gentleman's speech went to show that it was wrong that the franchise should depend upon a man's being rated and on the payment of rates, and he contends that a man has as much right—whether the right hon. Gentleman means a birth-right or a moral right, or what other right I do not know—but, at all events, he contends that it is just and consistent with our legislation and practice that he should have the franchise granted to him whether he pays rates or not. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman did not say that any other proposition was “preposterous”—at all events, he contended that it was utterly absurd, and that the House ought to reject it. Well, there were four Bills submitted to the House, in 1852, 1854, 1859, and 1860. I believe the right hon. Gentleman who has told us to-night that the principle of rating is so utterly absurd and ridiculous, had an important share in framing some of the measures produced in those years. I have looked into those Bills to see what was done in each, not dreaming, however, that it was possible that anything like what we now propose could be found in them. The first was the Bill of 1852; and I believe it will be found that it was made necessary then to pay the rates for the purpose of obtaining the extended franchise proposed in the Bill. I come now to the Bill of 1854; and, having heard so much about inequality and the great device of making the occupier be rated and pay his rates, I beg to call attention to Clause 18 of that measure, which I assume the right hon. Gentleman assisted in manufacturing. I find there that, though lowering the franchise in certain cases, the Bill proposes to leave the £10 householder as he was before—to extend the franchise to occupiers of the yearly annual value of £6, but insisting as a test on a residence of two years, and, moreover, that the occupier should be rated during the time of such residence to all rates for the relief of the poor of the parish or township to which he belonged. Such was the Bill of 1854 in which this ridiculous, “preposterous” principle of rating was upheld! I am going to pass over the Bill of 1859, with which the right hon. Gentleman had nothing to do, and I come to the Bill of 1860. When that Bill was prepared I suppose the right hon. Gentleman was quite as prominent a member of the Government, and took as active a part in framing it, as he did the Bills of any previous time. Well, I find in a clause of the Bill of 1860 that the occupier of premises within any city or borough of the clear annual value of £6 and rated to the relief of the poor should be entitled to a vote. Was it “preposterous” that under this Bill of 1860 a man was to be excluded unless he was rated in respect of occupation, and that he was to have a vote precisely upon the same terms as the votes now conferred upon persons who occupy premises of the yearly value of £10? I am not discussing questions which are not involved in the first Amendment; but the right hon. Gentleman, in making a speech, which will no doubt produce a proper effect throughout the country during the recess, mixed these and other matters up; and, forgetting a promise he had made, entered into the whole question whether his new suggested Reform Bill is better than that of the Government, and whether the clause he proposes is better than that submitted by the Government. We have, then, in 1860, the determination of the Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a prominent Member, that there should be rating of the occupier and payment of rates and assessed taxes as the condition of exercising the franchise, lowered as it was proposed to be to £6. That was the “preposterous” state of things in 1860. I am not referring to all the Amendments which have been placed upon the paper; I am on the single question—is it consistent with former principles, with former legislation, with the former workings of the mind of the right hon. Gentleman himself, that the landlord is to be rated and to pay the rates, and that, nevertheless, the occupier is to exercise the franchise? Down to the year 1860, so far as I can judge, this new light had never broken upon the right hon. Gentleman. For so many years the treatment of the compound-householders by the Legislature has been intolerable. If he has paid his rates he has got no recoupment from his landlord; yet no helping hand has been extended to him in the Bills of the right hon. Gentleman who now pleads the woes and wrongs of the compound-householder; but now, for some reason, it is discovered that gross inequality and wickedness are attempted to be practised in saying that he is not to be enfranchised unless he pays his rate. What an extraordinary thing it is that this should only now have occurred to the right hon. Gentleman! How was it that in 1860 it never occurred to him? So it is; all this never occurred to him before; but now, in 1867, it does, when he is anxious to pass the Government Reform Bill, and will do everything he possibly can to facilitate its passage through Parliament! He does this by putting a “gentle pressure” upon the Government to withdraw their clauses and promote others which he will bring forward, and by finding out, for the first time, what had never been discovered by any other human being, that there is some intolerable hardship in rating the occupier, although in his own Bills he has made it one essential provision that not the landlord but the occupier should be rated. I am sorry to have had to discuss at such great length so very dry, and perhaps difficult, a subject. We have seen what the law is with respect to these compound-householders. Now, looking at what has been done before the Reform Act and since, and in the Bills to which the right hon. Gentleman has been a party, I ask whether the alteration in the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes is a just and fair one? When you are granting a large measure of enfranchisement to persons living in houses of the lowest rental, is it not right and proper to require that they should be rated to the relief of the poor and pay their rates, rather than that they should pay something extra in the shape of rent to the landlord? With regard to the alleged inequalities and the abstract question by whom the rates of the compound-householders are paid, let us look at the facts. There is a contract between the landlord and the tenant, and the latter pays so much a week. Does the amount vary from time to time as the poor rates rise or fall? I apprehend not. It is a fixed sum; but the amount of the composition changes according to the exigencies of the parish. Although the sum paid as rent includes the rate, I deny altogether that the rate is paid in the rent in the sense in which the term "payment of rate" is ordinarily used. Without going any further into the question, I say that, in proposing that the occupier shall have a vote upon being rated and paying the rate, and that every facility shall be given him to get upon the rate book and to pay the rate, notwithstanding any obstruction offered by the landlord, the Government have adopted an old-established principle, and not, as the right hon. Gentleman would lead the House to suppose, an altogether new one, which is too "preposterous" to be acted upon.

No hon. Member rising to address the House—

SIR EDWARD BULLER said, he was greatly surprised at the indisposition evinced to discuss adequately the provisions of the Bill. He had anxiously examined the whole question, and he had arrived at the conclusion that here was an attempt to reduce to nothing a great measure, not by clauses in the Bill, but by a reference to Acts of Parliament which were entirely alien to its object, and which had been passed entirely without reference to the question of the franchise. An important question might be asked. Where were we? We had been travelling at a railway pace under the dangerous guidance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer). What was really the great principle of the Bill? And what was there to prevent that right hon. Gentleman from accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the principle of the Bill was personal rating. He denied it. There would be many occupiers of houses, shops, and warehouses who were rated, and paid their rates, and yet were without votes. Still further would this principle of personal rating be abandoned if the lodger franchise were adopted. He had taken a course which the press had called both immoral and pusillanimous. He had been anxious that the Government should have the fullest opportunity of laying their measure before the House; and looking to the language of a noble Earl in "another place"—looking also at the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—having regard to the existing differences of opinion, and being anxious to settle the question—he maintained that he had a right to say that the Government had agreed to submit themselves to the opinion of the House of Commons. For what was the language of the noble Earl at the head of the Government? He said the course of the Government was purely tentative. Well, what was the meaning of "tentative?" Why this—that in a question of great difficulty, they threw themselves on the wisdom of Parliament, and called on Parliament to determine what should be the conditions under which the Bill should be passed. He (Sir Edward Buller) asserted that the principle of the Bill was household suffrage. It was household suffrage, subject to such conditions as the wisdom of Parliament might impose. And the fact that it was so, only proved the truth of the adage that "reality was stranger than fiction." If twelve months ago any prophet had foretold that a time would arrive when a Conservative Government would bring forward a Reform Bill based on household suffrage—if any person, donning the garb of prophecy, had ventured to address the hon. Member for Birmingham and said, "If you look for the success of household suffrage and the dawn of your principles you must look to the Conservative quarter of the horizon"—any one venturing so to prophecy would have been ridiculed and scouted, as having no attribute of a prophet, but insanity. In the language of the Cumæan sybil—

"Quod minimè reris, Graiâ pandetur ab urbe."

He could not understand why the Government, who had invited the House to assist them in introducing limitations into the Bill, should now say that this question of personal rating was one of such vital importance that it could not be abandoned. Having used the small influence which he possessed as a Parliamentary unit to procure the consideration of the Bill, he felt exceedingly disappointed now with this decision. After the declarations of the Government, he thought the proper course for them to have adopted would have been to have stated that while they approved of the plan of personal rating they were willing to abandon it if the sense of the House was against it. That they had failed to do this was a great disappointment to him and to every hon. Gentleman who desired the progress of the measure. It was not the declarations of the Government, but their actions, which induced the belief that they were prepared to adopt Amendments to the measure. The dual voting had been abandoned. ["Question!"]

MR. BAILLY rose to order. He considered that the hon. Baronet was out of order in referring to the principle of dual voting, which had no reference to the clause under discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the clause opened up the whole question of the borough franchise, and it was open to any hon. Member, in discussing it, to compare the different plans that had been introduced.

SIR EDWARD BULLER: The scheme of the Government had been properly characterized as a double-faced scheme, having one Conservative and one Liberal aspect, and appealing on different and conflicting grounds to the support of both sides of the House. Some of the Members of the present Government were remarkable for their literary lore; now it appeared to him that they had now set up a Pagan divinity, had done him into modern English, and had presented him to the House in the shape of a Reform Bill. This idol, with its two faces, had, however, met with sorry treatment at the hands of its worshippers. The duality of its faces had been destroyed—they had knocked out both its eyes, and he was inclined to think that, before they had done with it, there would be hardly one of its Conservative features that would not be so maimed and battered as to be altogether past recognition. He would not travel over the ground so well occupied by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire; but he considered that one of the principal objections to the measure was that the compound-householders could not get upon the register without an additional payment over and above the rates that were due, and that this payment afforded an opening for an enormous amount of corruption. The electioneering agent would place upon the register the poorest and least independent among the whole constituency, so that the very men whom the House most wished to exclude would be admitted, while those whom they most wished to admit would be excluded. The barriers raised by the Bill were, in his opinion, utterly insufficient. The fancy franchises were quite valueless to counteract the democratic portions of the Bill, and on every ground he felt constrained to support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire.

THE O'DONOGHUE could not agree with the hon. Baronet who had last addressed the House in thinking that the Bill was very wide in its scope. If he were of that opinion, he should regard it much more favourably than he did at present. No one would gainsay the truth of the assertion that the task of satisfactorily settling the question of Parliamentary Reform was one of extraordinary difficulty, and had led to repeated failures; and some hon. Gentlemen might, perhaps, shelter themselves behind such an admission from the reproaches to which their own repeated failures had exposed them. Now, he was disposed to inquire whether those failures were to be ascribed to something inherent in the question of Reform—something complex and inscrutable, with which the human mind could scarcely grapple—or whether they were not the result of the manner in which the subject had been approached? If the former assumption were correct, failure could be easily accounted for; but if the latter were the true cause, the House would certainly bring upon itself the well-merited contempt of the country, and would forfeit the confidence reposed in them. He believed that the people of this country had endeavoured to ascertain why it was that the question of Reform had made so little progress; that they had mastered the subject, and had arrived at a conclusion upon it. For his own part he had always held the opinion that this was in reality a question of the simplest character, and that there was only one way of settling it, although he confessed that the events of the last and the present Session had so perplexed him that at times he found it required no ordinary effort to retain his original belief. He acknowledged that after listening to the speeches of the hon. Gentlemen opposite, and more especially to those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had frequently left the House much oppressed with what appeared to him to be a manifest want of comprehension, and with very exalted notions respecting the powers of the right hon. Gentleman; and he had sometimes fallen—though only for the moment—into the not uncommon error of imagining that wise men were seldom, if ever, understood by plain mortals, and that to be unintelligible was one of the most certain indications of wisdom. He had only recovered his equanimity on discovering that he was not singular in his inability to comprehend the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends. It was a matter of congratulation that the Reform discussions this Session had been greatly facilitated by the circumstance that no one thought of maintaining that the people of these kingdoms did not want Parliamentary Reform. That they did want it was recognised by all—even by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had refused to recognise it long after it had become perfectly clear to everybody except themselves. At the present crisis, however, it was important to recollect the obstinacy of hon. Gentlemen opposite last year upon this point; and, bearing that in mind, it was obviously necessary to receive their proposals with caution and reserve. The Tory party had, in defiance of the most overwhelming evidence, persisted in denying that the country was in favour of Reform; and they had done this not from incapacity to judge of the wishes of the country, but because they themselves were opposed to Reform. After persevering in that course as long as they could do so without endangering the public peace, they turned round and announced that they had discovered the true solution of the question. They had contrived to get into office; and then, acting in consequence of pressure to which they must either succumb or sacrifice their places, they had brought in a Bill. Let not hon. Gentlemen opposite, however, suppose that he even insinuated that they had abandoned their hostility to Reform. On the contrary, he gave them credit for the most remarkable consistency on this point, and for an unalterable determination to defeat the objects of those who are Reformers in the sense in which the words were understood by an overwhelming majority of the people of these kingdoms. It was most important at the present crisis to keep in view the fact, now that the Tory party had brought in what was termed a Reform Bill, that there was no more agreement between them and the Liberal party, or the country generally, as to the principles which ought to govern the settlement of the question than there had been at any former period. In proof of this statement he needed only to refer to the present measure, by the leading principles of which—namely, the personal payment of rates, the two years' residential qualification, and the provision for voting papers, or, in other words, by every provision which made the measure something worse than valueless as a Reform Bill—the Government were determined to stand. In his opinion the question of Parliamentary Reform was one of the simplest character. When the working classes—that was to say, the great mass of the people in town and country—asked for Parliamentary Reform it was well understood that they were asking for an extension of the franchise. In their judgment the extension of the suffrage was the very essence of Reform. The question, then, was how the House should meet that demand on the part of the working classes. The parties in the House at that moment might be divided into those who advocated a limited extension of the suffrage because they could not help it, and those who advocated a wide extension on principle. The Bill before the House rendered it plain that those who were in favour of restrictions were represented by the Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench; and the dangers and difficulties which encumbered the question of Reform were solely attributable to what appeared to be the insuperable objection of hon. Gentlemen opposite to sanction such an extension of the franchise as would be accepted even as a temporary settlement of the question. The lateral and fancy franchises, the checks and counterpoises, the philosophical theories about the franchise being a trust, and about the excellence of the British Constitution, depending on the incongruity of the electoral system, had all been schemes invented to prevent the House arriving at a simple issue in respect to this subject. The party opposite objected on principle to any suffrage which might have the effect of opening for a considerable number of working men a straight and smooth passage to the polling-booth. He was, however, certain that no dexterity, however great, could check the onward march of Reform; and it would be unbecoming the dignity of Parliament to accept a Bill which, besides being of an ambiguous and doubtful character, amounted to an evasion of a simple and righteous demand—even if the Reformers in that House should fancy that by some ulterior process, which would, however, entangle them in fresh complications, they might be able to turn the tables on their opponents, and get the better of them by the exercise of superior cunning. The first thing that those who undertook to settle the question of Reform had to do was to establish a character for sincerity and plain dealing. There was only one way of settling the Reform question, and that was by extending the franchise; and though there might be diversity of opinion as to the form and degree of the extension, there existed great unanimity on the point that the extension should be considerable, and that the creation of votes should not be left to any chance agency whatever. According to the plan of the Government, every man who lived in a house should exercise the right of voting if he personally paid his rates. There were multitudes of persons living in houses under a certain value who were debarred from the right of voting, and were most deeply interested in the settlement of this question of Reform. These were the very persons to whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer affected to offer the franchise, though he proposed as necessary for its attainment a condition almost impossible to be complied with; for in the case of the municipal franchise the direct payment of rates had proved almost a complete barrier against obtaining the franchise. He could not understand how any one favourable to such a liberal extension of the franchise as was necessary for the settlement of the Reform question could sanction a Bill like the present. He thought that in no case should the personal payment of rates be necessary; and therefore he should vote for the Amendment, believing it to be essential to the further progress of Reform, believing it to be proposed in a spirit of sincerity and wisdom, and hoping that it might prove the fortunate means of bringing together the friends of Reform, who, unless he was greatly deceived, formed the majority of that House.

MR. KENDALL said, that as regarded this question of Reform, he was desirous to place on record his justification for the step he was about to take. So far as his individual opinions went, he was very sorry when he heard that the Government had thought it necessary to bring in a Reform Bill. In 1859, when a Reform Bill was brought forward by a Conservative Government, he opposed it, for he thought it came badly from them. That Government lost office, and was succeeded by one under the Premiership of Lord Palmerston; and when he (Mr. Kendall) looked round the House and saw Lord Palmerston, he used to think that the noble Lord was the best Conservative in the House—that he was the only man who knew how to manage the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). He knew how to thwart him—and hence the hon. Member for Birmingham entertained for him as much hatred as one man could harbour towards another. Before the noble Lord died, a coalition had taken place between the right hon. Member for South Lancashire and the hon. Member for Birmingham—a very powerful combination he was quite ready to admit; but as so long as the noble Lord lived it was unsuccessful. But no sooner was the noble Lord lost to the country than the question of Reform assumed another phase, and the Bill of last year was the consequence. The real author of that Bill, as of the present Bill, was the hon. Member for Birmingham. But for that coalition there would have been no Reform Bill—no Reform League—no meeting in Hyde Park, or in Trafalgar Square. The Bill of last year was lost, and a new state of circumstances had arisen, and he (Mr. Kendall) found himself placed in a situation of some embarrassment. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that there were very many sensible, hard-headed, unyielding Conservatives who were of a different opinion now from that which they had expressed when they saw that there was no desire for Reform. Things were very different now, they argued; and as there was a deep-rooted feeling of discontent planted in the minds of men, it was desirable that a large measure of Reform should be introduced by Her Majesty's Ministers, whose motives should be above suspicion. The Government introduced a large measure of Reform. Then it became necessary for him to ask himself, "What shall I do?" He held very strong Conservative opinions. When he met his constituents, who were a very independent body of men, three or four months ago, he told them that he earnestly hoped that the Government would not bring in a Reform Bill, and that they would not take the speeches delivered at the meetings that had been held represented the opinions of a large proportion of the people; but he added, that if the Government should in their discretion determine to bring in a Reform Bill, they would find that he had changed his opinions, at least that he had supported the Government. He (Mr. Kendall) had been anxious to test whether all the appeals that had been made to the people and for the people were genuine or not. He had heard the other evening that the hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, at a meeting held in the house of the latter, had tried to strangle the Bill before it got to the second reading; and from the same quarter he had heard phrases which struck him as peculiar, such as an "unskilled peasantry," the "substrata," and shortly afterwards the "residuum." He should like to know what some of the lower orders would think when they heard of such terms being applied to them by Members of Parliament? He had associated during the last forty years with all classes of his countrymen, and his honest belief was that household suffrage would bring in a large number of men, honest, simple-minded (using the word in the best sense), who in disposing of their votes would look to men of respectability and character, and would vote for them in preference to excitable men. But this did not suit hon. Gentlemen opposite. He protested against the franchise being dealt with as if it were to be put up to a Dutch auction. He did not think that such a course was dignified. There was this thing to be said for household suffrage—that it presented something simple and intelligible, and that could not easily be mystified. In large towns a workman, who was a good workman, need not to seek for work, for he was known, and respected, and employed; and therefore the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as to such a man having frequently to change his residence in order to follow his work was futile. He was satisfied that the whole question of Reform had been brought about by agitation in the country; but still, if Her Majesty's Ministers thought that they ought to give the franchise to the working classes, he thought that they ought to go to some good resting-point; and, in his opinion, the resting-point which they had chosen was a very good one. He understood this point to be household suffrage, accompanied by residence and payment of rates. He hoped that the Government would stick to their colours so far as the main points of the Bill were concerned, and that they would rather go to the country than be driven into adopting any course which they did not think was a right one. At the same time, he hoped that they would be ready to cede points which did not involve any principle; and he was sure if they acted in this way that they might either carry their measure, or, in the event of defeat, appeal with success to the country.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, it was absolutely necessary, in dealing with the Amendment now under consideration, that it should not be regarded as an isolated proposal for dispensing with the personal payment of rates, but as combined with the subsequent Amendment, by which no householder below £5 a year of rateable value should be admitted to vote at all. The two modes of extending the suffrage, which were offered on the Opposite sides of the House, must be considered each as a whole. The Government proposed household suffrage absolutely unlimited by any test of value, but subject to the conditions that the house should be rated and the rates thereon paid by the occupier. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), on the other hand, proposed that the suffrage should be given to such householders only as were rated at £5 a year and upwards, but that the payment of the rates thereon should equally qualify the voter, whether it was made by the landlord or the occupier. In the whole course of a long Parliamentary experience he had never felt himself in a more unsatisfactory position; because he could give an unqualified approval to neither of the two alternatives. He nevertheless felt bound to deal with them in the best way he could, for he concurred in the opinion, so generally expressed, that it was most desirable that the question of Reform should be settled during the present Session. He did not profess to be a believer in Reform in the sense of believing that of the varied and sometimes conflicting forces which gave impulse to the great and complicated machine of English Government, it was the popular portion which most required to be strengthened at the time; nor in the sense of believing that any Reform which they were likely to pass would produce, or have any tendency to produce, improvement in the composition or quality of that House, or in the thoughtfulness, wisdom, and impartiality of its legislation—still less that it would tend towards greater sagacity and self-control in defining clearly, and maintaining steadily, the limits between due watchfulness over the Executive Government, and that usurpation, to which popular assemblies are prone, of arrogating to themselves Executive functions. But he still recognised the position in which he found the country; and, as a practical man, he admitted the pressure of facts. He saw the position into which Parliament and the country had been brought, and he was ready to accept the remedy to which eminent men on both sides of the House had committed themselves—that of Parliamentary Reform. This being so, when he said that he would accept Reform as the remedy, he intended to do so frankly and fairly. He did not desire to go very far or very fast on what he thought a doubtful road, and he did especially desire to make the resting-place, wherever they stopped, a safe one; but, with this consideration in view, and even especially on account of it, he wished that whatever was given, should be given without grudging, and not in a manner which might suggest a doubt whether they were pretending to give what was, in fact, withheld; and, above all, he was unwilling to incur the risk of introducing provisions by way of safeguard, which were charged with elements of discord and irritation, and would contain in them, from the very beginning, the seeds of their own dissolution. Approaching this subject in this frame of mind, he was not satisfied with the Bill of the Government, which, with reference to the borough franchise especially—that franchise being for the purpose of the present discussion, in effect the Bill—failed to satisfy the conditions which he had laid down. It seemed to him that, with remarkable infelicity, it combined faults which apparently were inconsistent with each other; but they were not such as to neutralize each other and to produce some middle term, but such as would develop their own mischiefs independently, but not without mutual aggravation. He was in dread of this Bill, because it was grudging, and because it was lavish; because it was timid, and because it was rash; because it irritated by capricious and unnecessary restrictions, and because, at the same time, it put weapons into the hands of the very men whom it irritated, and tempted them to sweep away the restrictions, and probably, in the heat of contest, a great deal more. The suffrage which this Bill professed to confer was household suffrage absolutely unlimited, and descending to the meanest cabin which could be used as a human habitation, subject only to a certain condition as to rates. But this condition had no reference to the amount of rates as a test of value, but only to a question wholly collateral and governed by considerations of social convenience—namely, the question whether the occupier paying the rates, as he must, in one form or the other, did, in fact, pay them in the shape of rent to his landlord, or directly to the parish collector. The answer to this question would depend on no uniform rule, but sometimes on local Acts of Parliament, and more often on the special and varying circumstances of each borough, and of every separate parish within it, and on the judgment, or it might be the caprice, or the political bias of each parish vestry, adopting, rejecting, and adopting again, as they might think fit, the provisions of the Small Tenements Act, and thus in neighbouring boroughs, and even in adjoining parishes of the same borough, there would be men of equal position unequally treated in this respect. Nor would this inequality be ordinarily corrected by enabling the householder whose rates were paid by the landlord—the compound-householder as he was called—to claim to be himself rated, and thereby to acquire a vote. He would claim under disadvantage, and even under the direct pecuniary penalty of having to pay more than the amount of the composition, which alone could be recovered from the landlord, without in turn fining him. The end of all this would be that, except under special stimulus, the numbers claiming would not be great; but when passions were excited, or corruption was at work, it would be easy to flood the register with voters, who, whatever else they might do, would combine as one man to get rid of all restrictions which depended on rating. Probably two years would not elapse before this Reform of the Conservative party would be found to have ended in household suffrage pure and unlimited, and wholly unconnected with rating in any form. He could not therefore support the proposal of the Government in its present form; but must look for some amendment of it. There was in the House a prevalent opinion, in which he did not altogether concur, that the Government Bill should be accepted as the instrument by which Reform was to be effected, and that even those who most disapproved of its provisions should endeavour rather to remodel them, than to reject the Bill and begin de novo. He doubted whether this had been wise; whether time had not been lost; and whether, in dealing in Committee with fragmentary and partial Amendments of which the mutual connection was not always clear, we might not drift into legislation less clear and less consistent than if the original conception and the ultimate development of the measure had proceeded from the same mind and had been governed on the same principles; and he was quite sure that even if the second reading was allowed to pass, it would have been very advantageous if at a subsequent stage; but still, before the discussion was reduced to one of mere clauses in Committee, the subject of the borough franchise could have been presented to the House as a whole. For that reason he should have been glad if his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) had moved the Instruction of which notice had been given. Having gone into Committee, however, hon. Members must make the best of their position. He could not himself expect to obtain such an enactment as he should entirely approve; but in the proposals of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), taken together as a whole, he saw something more hopeful than in that of the Government—a definite point below which there should be no rating of the occupier, and no voting for him under any circumstances, would be at least intelligible—not capable of capricious variation, and not establishing a perpetual blister of irritation; while it would remove the most dangerous part of the new voters. The removal of the necessity for personal payment of rates above that limit would be the removal of a security of which the importance was, in his opinion, greatly exaggerated, and even in the most favourable circumstances, where compound-householders existed, it was the source of serious evil. He thought the £5 annual rating limit would be likely to endure for many years; but he saw nothing in the proposition of the Government which would prevent its being assailed with success next year. It was impossible for him, holding as he did these views, to hesitate a moment as to the way he should vote. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have stated that it was impossible for the Government to accept the proposal of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire on the ground that it was inconsistent with the principle of the Bill. There were two ways in which a Government might deal with questions of this nature. Thus, a strong Government which had long considered a certain subject might bind up its existence with a certain definite point, and consider an adverse vote as a Vote of Want of Confidence. But when a Government was confessedly in a minority, having assumed the Government under very difficult circumstances, and having brought forward a Reform Bill, with respect to which, its manipulation and ultimate form, they had avowedly called the House of Commons into counsel, it would be no disgrace to them if they had declined to pin their existence upon the fate of one or two of the provisions of that Bill. Such a course was unnecessary, and was not required by their honour. But he must confess, with all the regard he felt for the Government, he could not allow himself to be affected, so far as his vote was concerned, by the consequences of a defeat which had been held out by the Government. Amongst all the claims which the Members of the Administration had to his confidence, he certainly should not put in the most prominent place the manner in which they were endeavouring to deal with the question of Reform.

MR. HILBERT said, he was sure the House would grant him a few minutes of their attention whilst he stated the object of the Amendment which he had placed upon the paper. He confessed he should have been released from a position of great difficulty if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given him a definite answer to the question he had put to him in the earlier part of the evening. He must say he felt some difficulty in voting against the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire while those restrictions in respect to the compound-householders were allowed to remain in the Bill. If the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his question had been in the affirmative, he should unhesitatingly have voted against the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, because he decidedly objected to the restrictions which a portion of that Amendment would impose upon all those who were rated under £5. A great deal had been said about the disfranchisement of certain classes under the Government Bill; but he thought that a much greater disfranchisement was proposed by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. If facilities were given to the compound-householders to get their names upon the register in the way it had been suggested, he believed that a great number would be added to the constituency; whereas, if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire were accepted, no householder rated below the line of £5 could by any possibility obtain a place upon the register. He therefore looked upon the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman as a disfranchising clause. The first Amendment placed hon. Members in a position of great difficulty, because, if carried, it would seriously interfere with the principles of the Bill, and would therefore endanger its passing. What had been the history of rating as regarded £10 occupiers under the Act of 1832? By that Act every voter was required to pay the rates due in April before July; but by another Act he was only required to pay the rates due up to the previous January. The Reform Act of 1832 also contained a clause which enacted that, where the owner was rated and paid the poor rates, the occupier should be entitled to have his name placed upon the register upon paying or tendering the full amount of his rates; and thus he had to pay his rates twice over, which was a serious hardship. Then came the Compounders Act, which enabled compound-householders to have their names placed once for all upon the register by paying the amount of the compound-rates, instead of, as formerly, the full rate; and this was a point that he trusted the Government would concede in reference to the present Bill. He did not desire to interfere with the wish of the Government in respect to personal rating. What he wanted was to avoid putting the compound-householder in the position of paying a fine. When paying his rent he also in effect paid his rate. If therefore he was called to pay the rate in order to qualify himself for the suffrage, they would really be calling on him to pay the rate twice over. If they took away the fine they were imposing, and said that the compound-householder should only be compelled to pay a compound rate, the Government would be doing away with a great grievance in regard to the compounder, and allow him to obtain the franchise easily and without those restrictions which were so objectionable. In the new clause respecting compound-householders it was proposed, when the overseer received the claim, that he should insert the name of the occupier on the rate book; the overseer then would give notice to the owner that the occupier had claimed; and thenceforth the owner would be discharged from his liability. It was further set forth that the occupier should be enabled to deduct from his rent the composition rate; while another clause provided that if the occupier did not pay the rate the overseer should give notice to the owner, who should be again called upon to pay the composition rate. Now, this arrangement was one that would import great difficulty into the question, because there would be, on the one hand, the occupier paying the full rate, and, on the other, the owner paying the composition rate. He was sure that the mode of carrying out the proposal of the Government would be much facilitated if they gave way on this point. In reference to the £5 rating Amendment, he could state that in the borough he represented the Government Bill would qualify 11,000 additional voters, of whom practically not more than 7,000 or 8,000 would come upon the register; but if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire were carried, the effect would be that 5,000 or 6,000 would be disfranchised and no longer qualified to be put on the register. That was the reason why he thought the Bill of the Government so elastic and so expansive; and that though it contained some strong restrictions which ought to be got rid of, yet it would afford a wider base than the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. On that ground he felt anxious that they should come to some arrangement on the question, and not again make the same mistake they made in 1859—throwing the Bill overboard—and then having another Government bringing in another Bill in the next Session only to be shelved in its turn, thus getting no further on with Reform than they had done years before. The country desired a settlement of the question; and although the Government had not given them so liberal a measure as they would have wished, yet it was one which was capable of expansion, and might be made acceptable to the country.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham, who had just sat down, had put the case before the House in a practical light, which was more than could be said of many of the speakers they had heard that night. He had hoped that the House, or at any rate that the independent Members of the House, had fully determined, if possible, to come to some amicable and just settlement of this important question; though he could not say the speech delivered by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) was calculated to effect that object. That hon. Gentleman had said everything he could to upbraid and abuse hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House for doing what they believed to be right on this subject, with a view to the peace and happiness of the country. But surely if they had formerly done wrong, and now evinced a disposition to meet the views of our fellow-countrymen who were anxious for Reform, and saw that the time had arrived when an endeavour should be made to settle the question, they ought not to be upbraided for attempting to do that which would tend to produce the peace, happiness, and tranquillity of the country. Many topics had been urged that night which would have been more appropriate on the debate on the second reading. The Question now before the Committee was that of the borough franchise; and with regard to that, he might say that they were all agreed that the franchise ought to be lowered, the only question being how it was to be done. The Government proposed one plan for doing it; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire another. The right hon. Gentleman proposed an Amendment which, if carried, would overthrow the main proposition of the Government—namely, rating and residence. By that principle he believed the Government and its supporters were determined to abide, though they were willing to give way on other points. They believed that rating and residence were absolutely necessary and essential. To them they intended firmly to adhere; but on other points they were liberally disposed to give way to the opposite side of the House. He hoped that the propositions which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would be found to be just and fair. A great deal had been said about compound-householders, and no doubt it was a very important question. They ranged from £30 in some boroughs to £5 in others. Originally the composition was for houses from £6 to £20 per annum; but by many local acts the amount ranged in various boroughs so high as from £10 to £30. Now, he thought the system of compounding was altogether a mistake—that it was bad in principle—unjust in its effect—and ought to be entirely done away with. When the Parochial Assessment Act was passed the right of compounding ought to have been got rid of as being unjust in principle and bad in practice. As was stated on a former occasion by the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, there were upwards of 5,000 compound-householders in Lambeth on the register, while those in Camberwell were not on the register, and therefore had no votes; and he perfectly agreed with the right hon. Gentleman when he said it was unjust to leave it to the local authorities to decide, and it was therefore high time that something should be done to alter the law in that respect. In Lambeth the local rates were excessively high, and as the Committee was aware, the county rate was becoming a very serious matter. He found from a correct Return of the amount of rates collected in Lambeth that there was collected for the poor rate, £92,904, of which £10,616 was for the county rate, and £17,260 for the police rate, making in all £92,904 collected upon the poor rate. He would not take the other rates. Well, how did the system of compounding work in Lambeth? In Lambeth, for house property, 20 per cent is deducted from the rateable value, which reduced a £30 house to £24; and the compound-householder was only rated at one-half that amount; therefore, he was rated at £12 only instead of £24. The consequence of which was that the parish of Lambeth paid the poor rate on that composition, householders over £30 paying the full amount, and compounders paying at the rate of only one-half. Therefore, with regard to the county and the police rates, those rates were paid by the parish over again, because the people compounding had only paid a certain amount of their rate. As everybody knew, the county rate was a fixed sum asked for upon the parish, and, consequently, if these people paid only one-half, the rest was distributed over the whole parish, and the parish had to pay over again what the compound-householder ought to have paid. If they abolished the compounding system there would be no pretext for saying that the smaller occupiers would have to pay a fine if they wished to get the suffrage. It was the same in many other cases; and therefore it was that he said that the compound system was unjust and unfair, and should be abolished altogether. Then, with regard to the Small Tenements Act, which applied to houses of £6 and under, every one who was acquainted with its working must admit that it was a law which benefited the landlord and not the poor man; because every one knew that a man was charged with the full amount of the rates in his rent. The man, therefore, who came upon the register by this Bill should deduct from his rent the full amount of the rates he had been called upon to pay; and where, then, was the injustice complained of? If they lowered the franchise down to household suffrage they had a right to say, in the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, that the man who exercised the privilege should be a respectable man and not a wanderer. Calling upon him to pay rates was no injustice to him, but the payment showed that he was a fit and proper person to exercise the franchise; and if this Bill was carried, it would be a great boon to the country. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would persevere in his course with regard to the rating and residence clause; if he did, and put his horse straight at the fence, his following would be large; but if he swerved, it would be impossible to say what it would be. If he persevered, which he was sure would be the case, he would be followed by a large number, and he would then carry to a successful issue a Bill for which he would deserve the thanks of the House, and for which he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would receive the gratitude of the country.

MR. COLERIDGE thought it would now be admitted that at last they had a clear and intelligible issue to debate and go to a division upon. Whatever might have been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to the difficulty in understanding the terms of the Instruction which stood on the notice paper on Monday last, but his difficulty was not shared by the Secretary of State for India or the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, who both said it tendered a distinct and intelligible issue—though the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he could not understand it. At all events, the issue now before them was short, clear and distinct. Everybody could understand what they were going to vote upon that night, and he supposed that every hon. Member had made up his mind pretty well what his vote should be. But he much regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have thought fit to make that the articulus stantis aut cadentis Administrationis; for he must repeat what he had said with perfect sincerity on Monday, that he should regard it as a calamity if this Bill were not passed in some shape that year, and a great misfortune also if it were not passed by the present Government. He would support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire not from the slightest desire to change the side of the House on which he sat—[“Oh, oh!”] What! Did hon. Gentlemen opposite forget what occurred last year? Were they utterly incredulous as to the possibility of tendering Amendments to the Government without having a factious object in view? They could scarcely, after their own conduct last year, receive such a statement with taunts of incredulity. Why should they taunt him? Was it the recollection of their conduct last year? He thought better of hon. Gentlemen, and repeated that those on his (the Opposition) side of the House would support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire with no desire to cross the floor of the House, but because while they were bound in common honesty and consistency to obtain, if possible, a liberal measure, they were equally bound, in common honesty and consistency, to refuse any measure that did not bear that character. He perfectly agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that this subject ought to be dealt with broadly, and not, as he believed the hon. Member expressed it, in any pettifogging spirit. But the hon. and learned Gentleman would also probably agree with him in the opinion that broad views were apt to become shallow unless founded upon something like an intelligent comprehension of the facts of the case, and a complete mastery of the whole of the details. It might, therefore, tend to clear the view of the question if they ascertained fully what objects they desired to achieve by the Bill now before the House, and if they ascertained whether the Bill and the clause, in their unamended shape, would be likely to effect the object they had in view. Now, probably, all desired an extension of the franchise—at all events, hon. Gentlemen sitting near him required a considerable lowering of the franchise. And that for many reasons. First of all, there had grown up since 1832 a great body of the people, whom they on that side of the House believed to be fit to exercise the franchise, and which had not been extended to them; that being so, they said it was not wise, it was not just, and he would take the liberty of saying it was not safe, to insist upon their further exclusion. The constituents who had sent them to that House as their representatives expected them at least to do something to attain that object. And, while any Bill fulfilling the requirements to which he had alluded ought to pass, no Bill ought to be accepted if it failed to meet these requirements. Now, he ventured to think that as long as the clause they were discussing continued in its unamended form, these requirements were not met. He believed, however, that they would be met if the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire were adopted. It was upon these grounds that he accepted these Amendments, believing that they would make the measure satisfactory, and one which the country would readily accept. And it was clear, to his mind at least, that by the present clause in its unamended form, and by the 34th clause, which must be taken in connection with it, that a large number of persons who were entitled to the franchise would still be excluded by the operation of this Bill. Therefore, for the reasons he had given, he said the Bill ought not to pass. A good deal had been said—he was not going to detain the House on the subject—about the operation of those two clauses on those householders who paid their rates in their rent. It was said that they would have to pay a larger sum for rates than they did now if they desired to exercise the franchise. That was a point which lay upon the surface of the Bill. It had been denominated a fine upon the tenant; but that was a merely verbal matter, and he would not detain the House upon it now. The only answers to the statement had been made by the President of the Poor Law Board, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sussex. As far as he could understand their answer, it was that this was no objection, inasmuch as the operation of the Small Tenements Act would be applied to this Bill, and as applied to this Bill, whatever a tenant so paid, he would be entitled to deduct from the payment to his landlord. But, whatever else the Bill did, it could not do that, because that would most distinctly be a fine upon the landlord; because, by the hypothesis the landlord had already compounded for his rates, he already paid them; and to make him pay over again would certainly be a fine upon him for that which he had not got but which some one else had obtained. He thought, however, that the question was one not worth much discussion, inasmuch as it was, after all, merely a verbal one. It was evident that more money would have to be paid by such person, if he desired to vote, than was paid by him before, and that that was the fact was evident from the Report of the House of Lords' Committee, from which his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had quoted that evening, so that, in point of fact, those clauses would exclude many persons from claiming the franchise to which they were otherwise entitled. He ventured to submit that it was idle to argue that that ought not to be the case, because they knew that, in point of fact, it would be so if this Bill passed. They must deal with men as they found them. Living as they did among the friends of Romulus it was idle to argue questions as if they had to do with the citizens of Plato's Politeia. The answer was merely a verbal one. If by paying the rates men were still excluded who ought to be admitted, the mischief was done which ought not to be done, and ground for future agitation was laid which ought not to be laid—a result which might be avoided, he believed, by the adoption of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. But, further, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made that the very ground upon which the Bill was recommended to the great Tory party, of which he had told the House last year he was the Leader, and of which this year he was the honoured, trusted, he might almost say the worshipped Minister. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to assure his friends that there was no cause of alarm, that though a rush of new voters might result from the Bill at Stoke-upon-Trent and some other large towns, yet, on the whole—taking the whole country—the operation of the safeguards introduced would afford sufficient protection to the party over whose interests the right hon. Gentleman was bound to be especially careful. The right hon. Gentleman might recommend his followers to pass it as a really Conservative measure. That was, however, all very well. Such arguments might be excellent good reasons why hon. Gentlemen opposite should pass the Bill—they might be excellent good reasons why it should recommend itself to their understanding. But they were also excellent good reasons why

Gentlemen on that side of the House should regard the measure as a bad one—why they should refuse to pass it, and in common honesty and consistency refuse to accept such a Bill presented to them by the right hon. Gentleman. But more than that—the exclusion which was to be applied by checks, was necessary to the object of the Bill. If the exclusion was fully carried out the numbers admitted would be ridiculously small; if the principle of inclusion was adopted they would be landed in household suffrage pure and simple. Now to household suffrage pure and simple, he had individually no objection. He viewed such a result without the slightest fear or apprehension, because, on the whole, he thought that intelligence, wealth, education, station, and other social distinctions of that character would exercise their due influence in the country, and would keep us pretty well where we were at present. But though he did not personally object to household suffrage, pure and simple, he thought that such a consummation was not one for which hon. Gentlemen opposite were yet perfectly prepared, and he very much doubted whether it was one for which the country was altogether prepared—reasons why, in his opinion, a progress in that direction ought to be slow and gradual. But, further, he would submit to the House that the combination of rating with the franchise was a bad thing, as it tended to confound two matters which were essentially distinct. Rates were affairs that appertained to parishes, to counties, and to municipalities, while voting was an affair of the State. Persons practically acquainted with the law of rating would agree with him that it would be extremely inconvenient to carry the present system any further. He might perhaps be permitted to mention a matter which had fallen under his observation a few years previously. In one of the largest places in the kingdom there had been a semi-political quarrel which disturbed the peace of the inhabitants and interfered with the prosperity of the town. Both parties agreed to refer their disputes to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, in whom they had confidence, and he (Mr. Coleridge) acted as assessor in the arbitration, and therefore had none of the feelings of a partizan in the matter. It was proved, and not denied, that it being deemed important to disfranchise a large portion of the population—not the Parliamentary, but the municipal voters—the political party which had the ascendancy made certain regulations about the payment of rates which practically disfranchised about one-half of one of the political parties in the city for two or three years. The time for the payment of the rates, the coin in which the rates were to be paid, and other conditions were made as inconvenient as possible. In vain were checks tendered for payment of the rates. The answer was that there must be personal payment of rates; and the result was that many of the ratepayers did not go to vote, and were practically disfranchised. Any one who had had experience of the working of the Revision Courts must know that under Sir William Clay's Act there must still be a claim, and that this claim once made was valid until some objection was taken to it, and the man's name was removed from the rate book. The way in which the matter worked in boroughs in which there was anything like political excitement was that the whole thing was done by the Parliamentary agent. And if what they heard was true, he also paid the rates: and if this Bill passed it would become a question whether, the rates being small, the landlord or the candidate should pay them, and being one and not the other, he should for himself prefer that the landlord should pay the rates. He might be told that there was a clause declaring the corrupt payment of rates to be bribery, and providing for the prosecution of parties guilty of these practices. But who was to prosecute? How was it to be done? It would become a dead letter. It was idle by such migratory provisions to think to prevent the corrupt payment of rates. He did not blame the Government: all that they could do they had done: but any one who knew the working of these matters must feel convinced that such a clause would be utterly and entirely inoperative. The Solicitor General had been rather contemptuous towards his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, and those whom he was pleased to call his satellites or followers, and he referred to certain Reform Bills in which there was not to be found this provision for the payment of rates. Having never had the good fortune to be a Law Officer of the Crown, he did not know whether the Solicitor General was a satellite or a follower; but he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman might have been a little more courteous in his treatment of his right hon. Friend. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not have read his brief, or else he would have known that although in three or four Bills, the details of which he had brought before the House, there had been no exemption from rates, yet so far back as 1847, Sir De Lacy Evans and other Reformers had put their fingers on this blot, and from 1847 to that hour they had been persistently agitating for the removal of the ratepaying clauses, as not having anything to do with the franchise. This was one of the great objects of the Parliamentary agitation of which Mr. Hume was at the head. The hon. and learned Gentleman might have told the House that from 1847 to the present time the opponents of the removal of the ratepaying clauses on that side of the House were men of whom he desired to speak with respect, but who were bound up with the principle of the Bill of 1832, in which payment of rates had been insisted upon, and therefore in most subsequent Bills the principle was included. His hon. and learned Friend must have known that up to 1832 rateability—namely, liability to pay rates—was a Common Law incidence of the franchise, but that the actual payment of rates was first made a qualification by the Reform Bill of 1832. That qualification had been struggled against from 1847 to last year, when it disappeared from the Reform Bill of that year. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman ought in common fairness and candour to have mentioned this fact to the Committee, for that Bill did not make the payment of rates any part of the qualification for the franchise. The argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was in fact nothing but a miserable ad hominem argument. What was still worse in the Bill of the present Government was that it did not appear to him to afford the elements of a settlement of this question. Assuming the correctness of the figures quoted by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) last year, did they suppose they had got in this Bill the elements necessary for a settlement of this question for even five years? He believed that, on the contrary, they were laying the foundation of a most dangerous, because a justly founded, agitation. They were introducing into some parts of the country a principle which they dared not refuse to others: and he would go further, and say that they ought not to refuse it. He did not pretend to be one of those who, on the principles of the rights of man, held that every one was born a voter. He agreed with the opinions expressed in the work recently published by the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), that right was the creature of law, and that it could not have any existence antecedent to the law which created it. But did the hon. and learned Gentleman—did any one—deny that there were great moral equities in politics which no prudent and sagacious politician would disregard? Would he say that if the franchise were granted to a great number in one part of the country it could be refused to persons similarly situated in another part? It was to his mind idle; and therefore was plain to him that this Bill could not and ought not to satisfy the country. He might be foolish, but he confessed he viewed with alarm the passing of a Bill of this kind. The people of England had up to the present time conducted themselves with singular forbearance and self-control. He passed by certain stormy and tumultuous meetings:—he did not forget the use of strong, perhaps violent and even unjustifiable, expressions: those things did and would occur in every great political agitation: but, on the whole, the attitude of the people of England had been marked by singular dignity and moderation. It could not be said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the public had shown no interest in this question of Parliamentary Reform. Both parties now agreed in this—that the Reform question had assumed proportions which rendered the immediate dealing with it a matter of great political necessity. They knew that the House of Commons was at last in earnest in the matter, and he did not think it either wise or safe to disappoint the people. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, fresh from the study of the statutes of Henry VI., should have taken a corresponding dose of Hume before he told the House with airy gaiety how easy it was to pass a disfranchising Bill without causing an insurrection. If he had studied Hume he would have found that there were such persons as the Earls of Northumberland and Warwick, and Barons of that class, who would have had something to say to a popular uprising—in whose presence the manifestations of popular discontent would not have been tolerated, and who, if he might venture to parody the famous saying of Macaulay, would have refuted a discontented voter by about the sharpest possible argument that could be addressed to a human being. It

behaved the House to remember that when once the flood-gates of popular passion were set wide open, order and reason, and holier things still, were sometimes borne down and swept away by the angry torrent; and that there was the greatest difficulty in stilling the troubled waters. This was not spoken as a threat or anything of the sort; he hoped he knew his duty as a Member of the House better than to menace or threaten, which would not only be utterly discreditable, but most foolish also. There was no safer mode of confirming a high-spirited and honourable man, in his opinion, upon any subject, and of making him shut his ears to argument with reference to it, than by making the question one of personal peril. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when dealing with this question, accepted the figures for the nonce, told a capital story in a cynical way about Sir James Graham, who once exclaimed, "Let us get out of the region of Nisi Prius." If, however, clever Nisi Prius was to meet one point by point, to travel over the argument and destroy one's facts, and show a man upon his own ground that he was wrong, where was the reason for the sneer of the right hon. Gentleman? But if clever Nisi Prius consisted in evading the point at issue, turning the laugh against one's antagonist with extreme adroitness, so as to keep a delighted audience borne along by a limpid current of eloquence, made up of brilliant epigrams and the fruits of a boundless imagination, then undoubtedly the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the greatest master of Nisi Prius in the House. But, apart from the jests and jokes of the right hon. Gentleman, which were always delightful save to the subject of them, what were his arguments? In the first place, he said there was no principle in numbers. Without discussing what was meant by principle, he (Mr. Coleridge) insisted that in this case numbers were the very essence of the question, because numbers were declared fit for the franchise, and numbers claimed to have it. The numbers so claiming created the importance of the question, and had given it proportions which it had never before assumed; and if a sufficient quantity of the numbers was not dealt with by a Reform Bill the question remained unsettled. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that variety of representation was an excellent good thing, and that barren uniformity in a Reform Bill was bad. He (Mr. Coleridge)

was ready to admit that variety in a Reform Bill was itself a good, and ought not to be given up without a struggle. Possibly if it had come down from antiquity it would be a thing to be much contended for; but he did not believe that could be obtained by the direct enactments of a modern Act of Parliament providing a variety of franchises would be satisfactory, or would be even tolerated. Did any one believe that if there were a large number of persons in one borough admitted to the representation, and a large number of persons in another borough forty miles off excluded by the operation of checks, that those excluded could be pacified by the assurance that variety was a good thing, and that their exclusion insured variety. The House of Commons was not a School of Philosophers but a body of practical men; and, accordingly, he would not pursue so simple an argument as this further. They came to this, then, that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was a great improvement on the Bill; because, as his hon. Friend opposite had said, it proposed to give the franchise freely and confidently, without irritating checks, and without a suggestion that those to whom it gave were unworthy. He hoped, then, most earnestly that the Committee would pass the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and that the Government would accept it. Some, indeed, had said that the Government would not accept it; but he (Mr. Coleridge) hoped they were in error in that respect; and his hopes increased when he remembered the course the Government had pursued hitherto. Considering what had occurred from the beginning of the Session, till now, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, if gently pressed—having accepted so many suggestions—deal with this suggestion also, and accept the Amendment. As for this point being regarded as a substantive feature of the Bill, he could scarcely credit it after seeing the dual vote cast off. The dual vote, one would have thought, was the very essence of the measure. It held a prominent place in the Resolutions now lost in the mists of February. When the Bill was first under discussion the Solicitor General and the President of the Poor Law Board made much of the dual vote, though it was doubtful whether either of them was the stray philosopher. The lodger franchise, too—when that was made a point of, the right

hon. Gentleman said he was the father of it and would take any proposition for it into his best consideration. Altogether the course the Government had taken showed that if the Amendment now before the House were pressed respectfully, though firmly, the Government would accept it, and amend the Bill accordingly. Acknowledging the dauntless courage of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he insisted that in attempting to pass the Bill as it stood the right hon. Gentleman was attempting an impossibility. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was endeavouring to persuade both sides of the House that the Bill was equally acceptable to each, not only upon points on which both sides agreed, but upon points on which the greatest difference of opinion existed. The right hon. Gentleman insisted that the Bill could not be pronounced at once Tory and democratic—that it gave too much and withheld too much. Yet that was precisely what he (Mr. Coleridge) said; the Bill was Tory in this place and democratic in that; it raised unfounded expectations in one class and did not satisfy reasonable expectations in another; and on both grounds he objected to it. He quite admitted that if a Bill were to pass it could not be one that would satisfy extreme desires at either side of the House. He agreed with hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side, that it must partake of the character of a compromise—both sides must give and take. But to be a settlement satisfactory and honourable to the two great parties, and one which it was equally for their interest to agree upon, the principles which it embodied must be reasonable in themselves and capable of universal application. The measure must be at once Liberal and democratic in its character, it must preserve the just relations of the governors and governed, it must uphold the aristocracy and satisfy the people.

MR. HENLEY: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter asks the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept this Amendment, and by way of inducing him to do so has adopted the somewhat curious course of using against him and those who sit beside him, as taunts, all those points on which he seems willing to yield to the wishes of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman may consider that a ready way to coax people; but I doubt whether he will find it successful in this House. He said, in the early part of his speech, that now we have a clear issue—that the Amendment of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire is a clear and definite issue. But if ever there was an Amendment that was less definite, or less capable of being so treated, it is this very proposition. And why do I say that? Because the Amendment is supported, on grounds exactly opposed to each other, by my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote), and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter. The hon. Member for Oxford says he will take this Amendment, because there is something else to follow it—a hard and fast limit of the franchise. But if we are to look at this Amendment by itself, with reference to the Bill in our hands, the hon. and learned Member for Exeter says I want an extension of the franchise, and I want a lowering of the franchise; and as this Bill will not give me that I will support this Amendment, because without it the Bill will not be sufficiently extensive, and will not sufficiently lower the franchise. Both, therefore, support the Amendment on grounds exactly opposite. And yet we are told that this Amendment raises a most clear and definite issue. I complained in the early part of the evening that I thought we ought to have the whole Instruction before us. A plain and definite issue as whether the franchise is to be limited by a hard and fast line, or whether it is to be open to all who choose to qualify themselves and comply with certain conditions would thereby have been raised. But that issue is not raised by this Amendment, although it has been argued as if it were so raised. We therefore are placed in this difficulty—the Amendment would be of no consequence one way or the other if a hard and fast limit be imposed:—it will be fatal to the Bill if the measure is to stand as proposed by the Government. Therefore, after the manner in which it has been debated this evening we are placed in a position which justifies anyone in saying that the Amendment has been framed evidently with the view of catching votes. All those who want to fix the limit will vote for it, and all those who want to see household suffrage pure and simple without paying rates will vote for it. Therefore, it is calculated to catch votes on both sides. We have been told some rather curious things by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter in the course of his speech. In speaking of this Bill, he says, "What is the result? Here are persons compounding, and it is a question whether they will go on to pay their rates." Now mind that is a Liberal opinion. The hon. and learned Gentleman in his own mind is in favour of household suffrage pure and simple. And what is his opinion of the persons whom he wants to enfranchise? He says, "These parties will not seek the franchise for themselves," and yet we are told everybody wants the franchise. He next says, "If they are seeking it, who will have to pay for it—the landlords or the candidates?" That is his opinion of the people of this country—a Liberal opinion be it observed. The Liberal opinion is that the people care so little for the franchise that if they seek it they will ask other people to pay for it. These opinions have been stated on the other side of the House, and I was quite astounded to hear them. I cannot understand persons saying with one side of the mouth that the people are anxious to be enfranchised, and ought to be enfranchised, and with the other saying that they will not avail themselves of it unless it is paid for. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said a good deal about rating. He says that the payment of rates has never been practised in this country. I do not believe that the scot and lot voting depended upon Acts of Parliament; I do not exactly know how it came to pass that scot and lot voters were rated, but certainly scot and lot voters were rated and paid the rates. The hon. and learned Member says, also, that it was a common law principle that people should be rated. That I believe to be true. Well, then, a class of gentlemen called Reformers made an Act of Parliament in 1832. And what did they do? They not only confirmed the principle of rating, but, to make the matter plain and simple—for it was useless for a man to be rated unless he paid the rate—they said he should pay. Everybody has accepted that principle. There have been one or two attempts, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, to alter that system, but they did not succeed, and it has gone on uninterruptedly until the right hon. Member for South Lancashire omitted the rating in his Bill of last year. So far with respect to the question of rating. A great deal has been said about evasion. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Gentlemen on the front Bench have evaded

the questions that were put to them. But is the course taken this evening altogether free from evasion? It would have been better if we had had this definite issue—whether the franchise is to be fixed on a hard and fast line, or whether it is to be an open franchise obtainable on certain conditions. That would have been a question to be argued fairly and with advantage, and when we had decided it we should have been in a definite position. But, instead of that, we have heard a great deal about compound-householders and the inconveniences to which they are subjected. Sometimes it is said they can and will vote; at other times that they cannot and will not. We have had a formidable array of figures from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, showing how many men will be on the rate in certain boroughs and how many will not be on the rate; but he did not condescend to go into the question how many might get on—and that is the real point. Talk of evasion! He evaded that altogether. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is of the same way of thinking as the hon. and learned Member for Exeter as to the wish of the people to get on the lists. He did not touch that question, and left us wholly at sea respecting it. He says, here are a certain number of people who are on the rate and others who are not on the rate; but he did not give any estimate as to the number capable of being placed on the rate. I will not presume to say that it is not an arguable question, whether it is better to fix a definite line or have an open one, like that fixed by the Government. And when you talk of a fixed line what is it? The only figure that has been named is £5. The Small Tenements Act only touches houses at £6. Between the £10 and the £6 all the tenements are rated. So that in comparing the numbers of which so much has been made, account can only be taken of those floating between £5 and £6—for if you fix the hard limit of £5, you entirely shut out all below that amount. And these are the parties—and I hope the Liberal Gentlemen will attend to this—who swell these great numbers to which the right hon. Member for South Lancashire referred. The position of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University is quite intelligible, and I can understand his arguing as he does, because he does not want an extension of the franchise; but I cannot understand how these Liberal Gentlemen are agreeing together, and how all these numbers are thrown like pieces of dirt into the water to muddle it so that we cannot see anything clearly. All that is plain is that the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition will absolutely disfranchise all those who are rated below £5, and the numbers between £6 and £5 who may come in, but who do not choose to come in, are what the hon. Member for Birmingham may call the "residuum"—and coming from him I suppose that expression may be used. I therefore do not think that the figures of the right hon. Gentleman are as conclusive as he seemed to think, and as he tried to make the House think. Then, again, a great deal has been said about the so-called unfairness of this House not settling absolutely the matter of the franchise, but leaving it, in some degree, in the hands of the local authorities. But I should like to ask whether a hard £5 limit will not confer as much—yes, and more—power in this respect upon the local authorities? The Small Tenements Act has been described by the right hon. Gentleman opposite as one of the greatest social and economical improvements of the age. But what is the Act? I say that it is a device of Old Nick to oppress the poor. Before that Act the poorest and most helpless portion of the people virtually paid no rates at all—they were not asked to pay them—they were struck off the list. A great many Gentlemen, here or elsewhere, have talked very much of the importance of building suitable houses for the poor; but I maintain that there cannot be a greater hindrance to this than the making the landlord pay the rates for them, instead of leaving them to pay them themselves, if they are able; and if they are not able they ought to be excused. This Small Tenements Act altogether destroys that wise and humane distinction. It makes every one pay rates, however poor he may be; even though he is in receipt of outdoor relief he has to pay all the same—and in proportion as he is poor, and his payment uncertain, in the same proportion does the landlord screw more out of him, to make up for the chance of his not getting paid at all. I wish the Act were swept away altogether, for it oppresses the poor; though I admit that in some cases the personal payment of rates might give rise to some slight personal inconvenience. Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has expressed his apprehensions that pranks will be played in arranging the rating under the Bill, for the purpose of disfranchising some people and enfranchising others. The hon. and learned Gentleman has had a larger experience in these matters than I have had: but I am quite sure of this—that pranks of this description can be played with a great deal more ease and success against a line of £5 than in the case of isolated persons scattered here and there under the suffrage proposed in this Bill. In the other case there would be a line to go against, and a good stroke of business might be done. You might put a whole lot below the £5 line by skilful arrangement. The operation would assuredly be easier than it will be under the proposition of the Government Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has taunted the Chancellor of the Exchequer by asking what became of the principle of personal rating in the case of the lodger franchise? Well, the right hon. Gentleman assumed that this franchise would be introduced, and ought to be introduced, in order that he might argue upon it. That is a very convenient mode of dealing with the question; but, in point of fact, there is an enormous difference between the two cases. The right hon. Gentleman himself, if I remember rightly, in his Bill of last year, while he would have let in the householders at £7, proposed that the lodgers should come in at £10. This was a grand distinction—no less a difference between the figures that were to enfranchise the two classes than one of 50 per cent; and I think, therefore, that it was rather out of place for the right hon. Gentleman to taunt the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the ground that because in the present Bill there was the principle of personal rating for householders. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not with consistency attach to his scheme a lodger franchise. It could be said with as much truth that the savings bank franchise was inconsistent with that principle; but every one knows that the two things are essentially different. The question of the lodger franchise is a large and open one. I have never expressed an opinion upon it one way or the other; if the right hon. Gentleman really wishes for a lodger franchise is he adopting the most likely means of procuring it when he argues that it is fatal to the principle of the Bill? I have touched upon most of the points on which I was anxious to speak ; but I cannot sit down without making an observation or two on what has fallen from the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue). Sir, the hon. Member for Tralee has used strong language on this question ; but I think the only answer it is necessary for me to give to him is that which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) made last year, when he said that on this question of Reform neither side of the House could say much to the other. I cannot help remembering that till 1866 a Liberal Government sat on the Treasury Bench, with a powerful majority at their back ; but the hon. Member for Tralee sat quiet, as far as I know, and never raised his voice or took any course to influence the leaders of his party in respect to Reform. Well, but hon. Members on that side of the House are professed Reformers ; they were all Reformers at the hustings ; but that is not the case on this side of the House. I have always been in favour of an enlargement of the franchise, and I supported the Bill of 1859, and I am still of the same way of thinking. But I could not support the Bill of last year, for I thought it a bad Bill, and I am in favour of no attempt to settle this question upon the principle of a fixed, arbitrary line. I have asked, here and elsewhere, on what argument it can be proper to give to a man whose rent is £7 the vote which you refuse to him who pays £6 10s. ? I have asked this publicly and privately, but I have never succeeded in getting an answer—and I do not believe that I ever shall. Nor why a man who pays £5 shall have the franchise while it is refused to the man who only pays £4. There is no resting-place in such a plan. You must descend from one figure to another ; you will not be able to stop till everybody—even all that has been called “the residuum” of the population—comes in without any qualification whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire told us last year that his Bill would admit, I think, about 200,000 of the unenfranchised, and (said the right hon. Gentleman) “they will not hurt you.” Well, I thought that rather a curious way of putting the case. I would say if they are good let them all in ; if they are not good,—none ; and I believe that a fair test of fitness or unfitness is the bearing his share of the burdens of the State. I know of no test so honest, no test so fair. If a man desires to exercise the privileges of citizenship let him bear the burdens of citizenship. If there are particular clauses in the Bill which in consequence of anomalous laws interfere with men who are anxious to obtain the franchise on that condition, let the House amend those clauses so as to give every man the privileges of citizenship who is prepared to bear its burdens. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford says, “Do not profess to give and at the same time not give.” There is no profession at all in the matter. The Bill opens the doors to every man willing to avail himself of the offer made to him. How, then, can any one say—what right has any one to say—that the Government are tendering a thing with one hand and taking it back with the other ? I believe that the people themselves will understand it. There may be a greater wish among men in some places to avail themselves of the rights of citizenship than there are among persons in other places ; but that is not the fault of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire insists very strongly on the migratory character of the people inhabiting the smaller class of houses, and objects to the term of residence fixed by the Bill. It may be argued that any term of residence is necessarily a difficulty and a hardship. No doubt, in some large places there may be that difficulty ; but in this country regard has always been paid to local feelings, and a certain term of residence must be required. Whether the term fixed by this Bill is a fair one is a point for discussion ; but I cannot think that condition ought to be altogether abrogated, for 10,000 men who may be employed here to-day and there to-morrow ought not to come in and swamp the actual residents in a borough. Local feelings and associations are the very cradle of our institutions, and I should be sorry to see any step taken which would impair them.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE : I think my right hon. Friend who has just spoken (Mr. Henley) was very appropriately selected to support the Bill of the Government, for there are few Members of the Conservative party who can defend household suffrage without prefacing it with an apology. Eight years ago my right hon. Friend announced in this House that he was prepared to go as far as household suffrage. [Mr. HENLEY : No !] I am sorry if I misrepresent my right hon. Friend ; but, at all events, we were informed at that time that such was his view ; and I think we are bound in our present condition to recognise the foresight with which he took up so advanced a position, foreseeing, as no doubt he did, the probability that when next his party came into office they would have to come up to that point. The foresight of the right hon. Gentleman, in taking a very advanced position, at all events, on this question eight years ago must have exposed him to some doubts in his own mind, and his patience in waiting for his party to come up to him must have exposed him to severe trial. He must have felt some despair when he heard us last year urged to resist a Bill which was comparatively mild, on the ground that we were Americanizing our institutions. But his foresight was justified, and it is of no use now to discuss these matters. I sometimes hear the Bill of last year mentioned with a feeling of regret, and, perhaps, of something like penitence ; for I feel that if we had accepted that offer, though perhaps I might not have been standing on this side of the House, yet that the prospects of the British Constitution would have been a great deal brighter than they are now. I have no doubt, however, that those who then urged us to resist that Bill had calculated in their own minds the course they intended to adopt. I have no doubt that a Bill such as that which has now been brought before the House was in the minds of the heads of the Conservative party. Owing, however, to what no doubt was our misapprehension we have been bitterly disappointed, and the result is that we now find ourselves committed to a Bill which is in every sense more democratic than that which was introduced last year by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I am not going to dwell on this subject of democracy ; but I rather demur to the line taken by my right hon. Friend in twitting the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford University, and the hon. and learned Member for Exeter, because they advanced to an attack on this Bill from different quarters. He seemed to think that because one had been educated in a school opposed to Reform, while the other was a strong Reformer, it was impossible that both could with any fairness oppose the same Bill. Now, I protest against the doctrine that in dealing with Reform we have only the question of what is called democracy to consider. Last year I contended earnestly against allowing such an increase of the franchise as would, I thought, disturb the balance of classes. I have not altered my opinion as to the dangers to be apprehended from such a disturbance ; but I will not go over that ground again, for it behoves us to be practical men, dealing with practical questions, and it is useless to argue on behalf of a position which both sides of the House have agreed to abandon. But there are other dangers, and dangers which seem to me equally formidable, in the measure which the Government have proposed, and with those I think my right hon. Friend has not attempted to deal. It has, for instance, been repeatedly stated to-night that the measure gives no promise of permanence. Now, my right hon. Friend says, "Do not fix a hard and fast line, because there will be an ugly rush at that ; but have a line that represents some principle. Open the door to every one who is fit to enter." Well, holding that opinion, what does he propose to vote for ? Why, for a measure that admits people, not according to any moral qualities which they may display, but according to the fact whether they live on one side or another of a street in Bristol—according to the fact whether a vestry has or has not resolved to apply a certain Act of Parliament. Now, the only excuse—I was going to say the only reason—for passing a Reform Bill is that it should stay agitation. But what are you going to do with this Bill ? You are going to make the Small Tenements Act a disfranchising Act, and you are going to make it the interest of all who are for enlarging the suffrage to agitate in every parish vestry in order to rescind the Act wherever it is now in operation. It now operates entirely in fifty-eight boroughs, and it has been adopted in some parishes in ninety-eight boroughs out of the remainder, so that it is in operation in three-fourths of the boroughs of England. If this Bill is passed that Act will have an enormous disfranchising operation, and you will transfer the Reform agitation from this floor, where it has troubled you so much, hindered you so much, and produced so much heartburning, to three-fourths of the parishes in the boroughs of this country. Can you say that a measure which has this for its result is one likely to produce peace and quietness in the country ? Then look at the effect which the principle of this Bill will have—if you can call it a principle. It will build a great wall of exclusion, shutting out the great majority of those who would be included in a household suffrage. But in this wall there are two doors. The first door is the power of the vestries with respect to the Small Tenements Act. Just see the effect which that will have on the seats of Members of this House. I see in his place the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines). Now, the Bill will about double his constituency to start with; but when it has done that, it will leave more than twice the existing constituency in the condition of compound-householders. Thus the hon. Member will never know from Parliament to Parliament what his constituency is to be. He starts with a present constituency, say of 10,000 electors; but he will never know whether any agitation, or the efforts of any registration association, or any electioneering agent, may not double his constituency and entirely alter its character. I cannot imagine anything more trying to the repose of Members of this House than the knowledge that their constituencies are constantly liable to vary in this manner. It will be like living in a country where earthquakes are frequent, and where it is said the courage of the strongest man is unnerved. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) will be another victim. He will have only fourteen additional constituents at the first operation of the Bill; but he will be liable at any moment, by the action of any external cause of the kind to which I have referred, to have a large mass of voters thrust into his constituency. Now, surely, the object of a Reform Bill is repose. What you desire is to get rid of agitating and irritating questions which set class against class; but, instead of doing that, this measure, in almost every constituency where it operates at all, will operate to the increase of agitation and unsettlement. But that is not the only point which I have a right to ask my right hon. Friend to consider. In the adjustment of a Reform Bill there is something to be said for the quality of the constituencies. This residuum of which we have heard is not in itself the most valuable part of the community; and whatever we may think of it we must be aware that in education and independence it is considerably behindhand. But what are you going to do with it? The second door is the power of every man to rate himself if he pays a certain sum and takes a certain amount of trouble. Now, you know perfectly well that the mass of the working men of this country will not pay a sum of money regularly to get on the register. Therefore, with regard to this door, for any

working man to move of his own impulse, you will not have that which I presume Reformers most desire—the independent, uninfluenced opinion of the working man. The door will be closed as to him; but it will yield easily enough to an association agitating some public question, or else the rich man will for his own purposes force it. There you have the two elements of corruption and passion. If the rich man thinks it worth his while to put all these men on the register, you have given him a cover for corruption. You know very well that when money begins to be paid by the rich man, even if only for the rates, the end of it is corruption. But I do not think that the worst part of it. I fear the other action of the Bill much more. What is it that we dread in democracy? What is it that we on this side of the House have been resisting for years? It is not that we dread in ordinary times to take our countrymen into our councils, or to see their feelings and wishes represented in this House. On one-half or three-fourths of the questions that come before us, we know it is as desirable that their opinions should be represented as those of any class in the community. We do not fear the opinions of the lower classes upon the ordinary questions of policy. What we have to fear is that on particular subjects upon which classes are pitted against each other the balance of classes should be disturbed by the overwhelming power of the lower portion of the community, and that then you would have legislation of a kind which no wise man would approve. Well, then, what are you going to do? In ordinary times, when there is no agitation in the country there will be no working men on the register; but let some great question be agitated in which they take a deep interest—say the Maine Liquor Law—the change of indirect for direct taxation, or any great social question that will set class against class—and then you will see leagues formed, a vast machinery of agitation organized, money collected; then you will see these compound-householders put in large numbers on the register, and they will carry all before them. Well, you look to political education as the means of averting the dangers which may result. You say that though these men may be occasionally influenced by passion, if they are trusted sufficiently long with the suffrage they will learn by a sense of its responsibility the dangers they have to avoid, and in that way power may safely be placed in their hands. If you gave it to them freely and fully that might be the case—I do not say that I advocate such a course; my opinions are well known—but you might have that recompense; by the constant exercise of the vote they might at last learn in some degree how to use it, and thus to avoid the temptations by which it is surrounded. But practically by this Bill you decide that they shall only exercise the franchise in troublous and not in quiet times. You say, “No, they shall possess a vote only when it is worth some agitator’s while to put them on the register.” When they are calm and uncorrupted you refuse to give them facilities for getting on it; but as soon as they are tempted by bribery, or swayed by passion, then you put political power into their hands. I cannot conceive any course more calculated to bring on us the dangers of democracy—a result which Gentlemen on both sides of the House are equally anxious to avoid. It is for these reasons that it appears to me that I am bound to prefer the course recommended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire to that of Her Majesty’s Government. I do not say the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman are such as, if made last year, I should have liked—I do not say that they are proposals which in all respects I approve; but it is because they are pitted against others which seem to me to involve all the evils of democratic measures with none of their advantages, which seem pregnant with future irritation, and to give a cover for corruption—it is on that account, and without concealing my regret that we have arrived at such a stage, that I am compelled to make that choice—that I feel bound to vote for the Amendments, for I take them as a whole, which the right hon. Gentleman has placed in your hands.

MR. ROEBUCK moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. AYRTON asked, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to resume the Committee? Was he prepared to do so the first thing to-morrow, if Members were agreed to waive their rights?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: To-morrow is not under my influence; I have reason to believe that Gentlemen who have Motions on the paper for to-morrow will not be indisposed to give way; but I cannot presume to press them.

MR. HORSMAN: The right hon. Gentleman has given Notice that to-morrow, at half past four, he will move that the House, at its rising, do adjourn for the Easter holydays. I presume he will not make that Motion until late in the evening, when the debate is finished.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I see no reason for deviating from the usual course.

MR. EARLE said, that this question had now for five hours been under discussion upon its merits; but there were some who were anxious that it should not be decided upon its merits. A few days ago everything was concession, conciliation, and candid co-operation. They had now come upon a period of threats, of defiance, and of daily ultimatums. It was true that early in the evening the wind seemed to be veering round to the old quarter; but last Monday, at any rate, they had more than their share of menace, and even the Secretary of State for India, under circumstances somewhat disconcerting, found courage to send them an ultimatum of his own. There had been deputations. The working man had been to Downing Street to see the working man’s friends. He doubted, however, whether the argument as to fitness would be strengthened by the interview; because the working man came away deeply impressed with the broad distinction between popular privileges and democratic rights. A dissolution of Parliament had been threatened. He wished to know to whom Her Majesty’s Government intended to appeal. If they addressed themselves to the Conservative party in the country, were they to say with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that popular privileges were not democratic rights, or with the Secretary for India that household suffrage was a fancy franchise? If a constituency were found to listen to such things, they would schedule it by acclamation. It was said, however, that an appeal was to be made to the Liberal party, and that Gentlemen on the other side were to be outbid by the Government. He, for one, did not believe that such tactics would succeed, or that the Liberal constituencies would desert their old friends. Let them therefore, without any fear of a dissolution, decide the great question before them, which was, whether, be the measure of enfranchisement large, as the Opposition desired, or moderate, as they (the Conservatives) would prefer it—whether its extent should be determined in the old constitutional way by Queen, Lords, and Commons in Parliament assembled; or whether they should leave it to fluctuate according to the caprice of municipal cabals, by adding to the normal constituency a sort of constituency of reserve, which at any moment might be called under arms by the competition of opulent candidates, the violence of political passions, or the corrupt manœuvres of organized agitation.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that in deference to the wish of the House, he would postpone the Motion which stood in his name (on our relations with Spain) for to-morrow evening until Friday, the 1st of May.

LORD STANLEY: The hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) has given notice of a Motion with reference to the claims arising out of the American civil war. I intended to-morrow to have made to him an appeal, to which, from what I have heard to-day, I believe he would listen favourably, to postpone the Motion for the present, on the ground that negotiations are still going on. We are anxious, I believe, on all sides that these negotiations should be brought to a favourable conclusion, and I believe that a discussion at the present time would not tend to promote it. If the hon. Member be in the House, I would address my appeal to him now; if not, I must repeat it to-morrow afternoon.

MR. OTWAY said, he had no hesitation in responding to the appeal, and postponing his Motion; which, however, he should feel bound to propose after the Easter recess, if no other Member took up the subject.

MR. AYRTON hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would re-consider the answer he had given, and not proceed with the Motion for Adjournment for the holidays until this discussion was concluded. If the right hon. Gentleman could not take a course so obviously convenient, he hoped the sense of the House would be taken on the matter. It was quite impossible that the House should adjourn before the Motion before the House was brought to a conclusion.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had consented to postpone his Motion only on the understanding that it was the wish of the House to adjourn as usual for the Easter recess.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that as the hon. Member had given way under the apprehension that there was to be no further alteration, if any were made, they were bound to put him in the position he had yielded.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is justified in saying that the ordinary practice has been to move the Adjournment for the Easter recess at half past four o'clock; but, at the same time, the present circumstances are somewhat peculiar. I apprehend we all feel much indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) for having cleared the ground for the continuance of the discussion on the Bill of the Government. There is a great desire, I believe, in the House that it should be prosecuted to its conclusion. Therefore, it appears to me we are reduced to one of two things—either the Motion for Adjournment should not be taken until later in the evening, or else, if it is taken early, it should be with the understanding on the part of the House that the discussion will be prosecuted to its conclusion. If there is not such an understanding, difficulty will be raised on the Motion for Adjournment.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

METROPOLIS GAS BILL—[Bill 45.]

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time. upon Monday 29th April."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. CRAUFURD said, he desired some explanation with regard to this Bill, which he believed would be unanimously opposed. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to say, when asked whether he would proceed with the Bill before the recess, that he had made certain proposals to the Gas Companies, and that he proposed to withdraw this Bill and bring in another, differing only from the other in the extraordinary particular that the price and dividend should be left in blank. The question involved in the Bill had been treated as though it were merely one between the thirteen Gas Companies of the metropolis and the Board of Trade. But there was far more than this in the Bill, the principle of which was the principle of confiscation. It was a piece of legislation unprecedented in the history of Parliament, and ought never to have been introduced by any Government. The right hon. Gentleman might just as well come down to the House and propose to reduce the Three per Cents. The petitions which had loaded the table of the House for the last few nights showed how the measure was regarded out of doors. Such legislation was really monstrous. It had depreciated the value of gas property throughout the kingdom by £2,000,000; gas companies were in some cases unable to raise fresh capital, and shareholders could not realize their property. He was not satisfied with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the Bill for three weeks, and should move its postponement till that day six months.

MR. WYLD seconded the Amendment, and said the Secretary of the Board of Trade, whose discrimination and sense of justice in public matters were well known, could not have read this Bill, which was a disgrace to the Department.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Monday 29th April," in order to add the words "this day six months."—(Mr. Edward Craufurd.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the course which had been taken was peculiar, but he was quite ready to answer the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. Craufurd). When the Bill was brought in considerable opposition was offered to it, and a deputation from the London Gas Companies, and from water and railway Companies, waited upon his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) and stated their objections. He proposed to withdraw the Bill, and introduce another which should be similar but with the figures entirely left out. To this proposal the Companies would not agree, suggesting the withdrawal of the Bill and the introduction of another with certain alterations. One of these was the omission of the clause giving to the Metropolitan Board of Works and the City of London an optional power to purchase the gas works, and of the clause which was described as limiting the profits of the Companies to 7 per cent; while there was to be a clause allowing an increase in the charge for gas if the price of labour or coal were to rise. The Government promised to consider these points, and state, after Easter, what they would do in the matter. He could not now state the counter proposals of the Government; but it was probable they would propose an arrangement which the Gas Companies would be willing to accept, and which would form the foundation of a Bill. In his opinion, it would be very much for the advantage of the Gas Companies themselves that the matter should be dealt with during the present Session in the impartial spirit in which it had been taken up by the Government. But as the question had been raised to-night, he was obliged to remind the House of what had occurred. In 1860 an Act was passed giving to the metropolitan Gas Companies certain privileges in the nature of a monopoly, but subjecting them to certain restrictions intended for the public protection. Three or four years after that Act was passed, the gas consumers complained that though the Companies had received the full benefit of the Act, the public had not derived from it the protection which was intended. Last year, therefore, the City of London promoted a Bill enabling them to make gas for themselves. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, who were also empowered to consider the effect of the Gas Act of 1860. The Committee took a certain amount of evidence and presented a Report, which stated that the conditions of the Act of 1860 had not been fulfilled, that the price of gas ought to be reduced, the quality improved, and better security provided that the public should be properly served. When the present Government came into office, the Report of this Committee was laid upon the table, and various deputations waited upon the Government from the Metropolitan Board of Works, vestries, and gentlemen representing consumers. The Government had no interest in the matter; but, feeling that the question was in an unsatisfactory state, they volunteered to bring in a Bill. On the other hand, the Gas Companies came to the Government and said, "We were not fully heard before the Committee. We had reason to suppose that the Committee were going to decide in our favour, so that we did not offer the evidence which we might have offered, and our case was not complete." The Government were anxious that the parties should come to a friendly arrangement and endeavoured to bring about a compromise, but were not successful. They therefore introduced a Bill based upon the Report of the Committee, intending that after the second reading it should be referred to a Select Committee. They thought that if the case of Gas Companies had not been fully heard before, those Companies would be delighted to go before a Committee, in order that it might be heard. But as soon as the Bill was introduced, objections of a most extraordinary nature were taken to it. Instead of courting inquiry, the Gas Companies challenged the Bill on the second reading, and petitions were presented containing the most unfounded allegations. Nothing, for instance, was more untrue than that the Bill was drawn with the object of reducing a guaranteed dividend of 10 per cent to one of 7 per cent. The Act of 1860 limited the profits of the Gas Companies to 10 per cent; but it had been suggested to the Government that an alteration should be made in this respect. The suggestion, he might remark, was first made to the Government by a Member of a Gas Company, who thought there ought to be a sliding scale. The Bill, accordingly, allowed the Gas Companies to carry their dividends up to any amount they could make, taking away the limit of 10 per cent, provided that after a certain amount was reached there should be a reduction in price at the same time that there was an increase of dividend, so that both the Companies and the public should be the gainers. He had been obliged to state what was the position of the Bill, on account of the objection which had been raised to the proposal for the adjournment of the second reading till after the holydays. The Gas Companies had made certain proposals to the Government, and the Government hoped to come to terms with them before the end of the Easter recess, and he therefore now proposed that the Bill should be adjourned over the holydays.

MR. ADAIR said, that the Companies did not object to the question at issue being decided by some competent authority; but they did object to the Parliamentary guarantee being destroyed, and this principle of confiscation introduced. There was, however, an arrangement between the Companies and the Government that the matter should stand over until after Easter, and therefore he could not vote for the Amendment.

MR. POWELL thought the Bill ought not to be set down for the first day after the recess, but that more time should be given for hon. Members to consider its provisions.

MR. AYRTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 48: Majority 37.

Debate adjourned till Monday 29th April.

Sir John Gray.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should not oppose the consideration of the Amendments on that occasion; but he hoped that the hon. Baronet who had charge of the measure (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) would postpone its further progress until after Easter.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Amendments made; Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

RAILWAYS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the provisions made by Parliament for securing the completion of Railways within a prescribed time, and to report whether any and what alterations should be made in the Standing Orders of this House requiring such provisions, or the Act 9 Vic. c. 20."—(Mr. Dodson.)

And, on April 29, Select Committee nominated as follows:—Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. CAVE, Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. DODSON, Mr. WOODD, Mr. WHITBRAD, Sir COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN, Colonel PACKE, Mr. SCHOLEFIELD, and Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders under "The Local Government Act, 1858," relating to the districts of Gainsborough, Farsley, Bideford, Canterbury, Chipping Wycombe, Worthing, and Wednesfield, and for other purposes relative to certain districts under that Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 121.]

RAILWAYS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, Bill to define the duties of the Assessor of Railways in Scotland in making up the Valuation Roll of Railways, and to amend in certain respects the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 122.]

House adjourned at a quarter
after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, April 12, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Fire Protection, Mr. Tite and Mr. Laird added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Church Discipline Act Amendment.*

Committee—Representation of the People [79] [R.P.]

IRELAND—RIVER SHANNON.

QUESTION.

MR. W. ORMSBY GORE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Report of Mr. Lynam, Civil Engineer, on the state of the River Shannon may be expected to be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that no Report had yet been received; but that when any information reached the Government it should be laid on the table.

INDIA—FAMINE IN ORISSA.

QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he is willing to put upon the table of the House all the Correspondence that has passed up to the present time with the several Governments in India relative to the Famine in Orissa, and to the alleged enormous loss of human life from starvation in that Province in the year 1866; a subject prominently noticed in Her Majesty's Speech to Parliament at its opening upon the 5th of February last, but upon which no official information whatever has been communicated by Government to the House of Commons?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, in reply, that the late Secretary of State for India had appointed a Commission for inquiry into the subject, but they had not yet reported. The Report having been so long delayed, the Secretary of State had telegraphed to India to know when it might be expected. The correspondence, so far as it had gone, would be laid on the table immediately after Easter.

ARMY—THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If it be true, as stated in the papers, that General Sir Henry Storks has been appointed head of a new department under the War Department, notice having been given in the House for a Committee on the re-organization of the latter?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must beg to inform his hon. and gallant Friend that no part of the rumour in question was true. No new department at the War Office had been created, and no appointment of the kind made.

ARMY—REWARD TO MAJOR PALLISER.

QUESTION.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What are the recommendations of the Ordnance Select Committee with regard to the reward to be given to Major Palliser; whether the Treasury has approved of those recommendations; and, whether the Secretary of State for War will lay upon the table of the House all Correspondence between the War Office and Major Palliser on the subject?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, the Secretary of State for War did not act under the advice of the Ordnance Select Committee. He had authorized a reward of £10,000 to be paid to Major Palliser; and a further reward of £5,000 would be charged on next year's Estimates. It was not usual to refer these questions to the War Office. He must decline to lay the correspondence on the table, it being of a confidential character.

IRELAND—ESCAPE OF JOHN KIRWAN.

QUESTION.

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he can give to the House any additional information relative to the escape from the Meath Hospital in Dublin of John Kirwan, a reputed Head Centre of the Fenian organization, and whether any of the Police force who had the care of the prisoner are in custody under the charge of complicity in the escape?

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would also beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has received a report of the escape from Meath Hospital, while under the charge of a police constable, of a man of the name of Kirwan, supposed to be a Fenian Head Centre, and if he is prepared to state the particulars of his escape; and if he is the same Kirwan who escaped from the police on two previous occasions?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that the report which had appeared in the papers was substantially correct. The police constable who had charge of the prisoner had been committed upon a charge of being privy to the escape. There would be an inquiry into the whole transaction, and till that had taken place he could not state what had really occurred. He was not prepared to say whether Kirwan was the same person who had escaped on two previous occasions. The prisoner was in the charge of the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

MR. GRANT OF KETTLEBURGH— CHURCH RATES.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Grant of Kettleburgh (Suffolk), now in gaol for a disputed Church Rate, and the costs of contesting the same, which he is unable to pay on account of poverty; and whether he will be entitled to be released under any Insolvent Debtors Act now in force?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that no information had come to his department respecting this case.

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been directed to a public letter on the subject of the assignment of a portion of Greenwich Hospital to the use of the "Seamen's Hospital;" and whether he has any objection to state the reasons which have induced the Admiralty to select a quarter described to be the most unsuitable, upon sanitary grounds and general convenience, for the accommodation of sick and infirm sailors?

MR. CORRY said, he was very glad his hon. Friend had given him the opportunity of disabusing the public mind of the most unfounded impression which the letter to which he alluded was calculated to convey. The writer of the letter, adverting to an undertaking on the part of the Board before he (Mr. Corry) went to the Admiralty, said, "Since then there was a new Lord;" but he omitted to state that the new Lord of the Admiralty had been the first to urge on the late Government to assign a portion of Greenwich Hospital to the use of the Seamen's Hospital; therefore, it was not likely that he should be the person to throw any obstructions in the way. When he went to the Admiralty his right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for War had, according to the usual course, called on the Medical Director General and the Admiralty Director of Works to report on the subject; and, as the matter had created some agitation, he might, perhaps, be allowed to read one or two extracts from their Reports. The letter to The Times stated—

"The Admiralty have now the assurance to offer to the Seamen's Hospital Society a part of Queen Mary's quarter, which for the reasons I am about to describe is wholly unsuited as a hospital for the sick, and which the Admiralty know perfectly well cannot possibly be accepted by the society."

Now, he held in his hand the Report of the Medical Director General, one of the ablest and most experienced Medical Officers in Her Majesty's service. He said—

"I previously visited the Dreadnought in order to ascertain the probable amount of accommodation that would be required. I next, accompanied by the Captain Superintendent and the Medical Inspector General, examined the entire range of buildings in Greenwich Hospital known as Queen Anne's, facing the east, and Queen Mary's, also facing the east and south. In the first-mentioned range of buildings the wards or floors are divided longitudinally by a massive wall, and again subdivided by wooden partitions into small cabins or compartments, each capable of containing two beds. These, though they may have been suitable for old men in good health, are by no means suited to the kind of patients admitted into the Seamen's Hospital, even if all the cabins and bulkheads were removed. Besides, in this quarter there is no kitchen or means of cooking for so many patients. On the opposite side of the public road which passes through the hospital is Queen Mary's quarter, forming an angle facing east and south. The ground-floor in the eastern portion contains an excellent kitchen, in good repair and fit for use, capable of cooking for 800 men, with a good scullery, laundry, and washhouse, ample cellerage, and store rooms. It also contains a large number of baths, besides foot-baths, with an abundant supply of hot and cold water. In the first, second, and third stories above the ground-floor, extending round to the centre of the portion facing the school-ground, there are nine large wards, capable of containing upwards of 300 patients. I would, therefore, for these reasons, beg to propose that the portion of the building called Queen Mary's quarter, with the exception of the western half of the south block, might be offered to the Committee of the Seamen's Hospital."

The Director of Works generally concurred in this Report. He might also state that the letter in The Times had been laid before the Board, and they decided to write to the Lord President of the Council and request him to permit Mr. Simon, the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, to visit Greenwich Hospital and give his advice on the subject. As soon as the Board receive his Report they will pronounce their decision, but that decision will not be at all influenced by the anonymous letter which appeared in The Times.

TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the serious inconvenience to Irish Members of being present in the House on Monday the 29th instant, the first day after the recess, he will not consent to postpone the Tenants Improvements (Ireland) Bill to a more convenient day?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would beg leave to interpose a question upon this subject. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it was not expressly agreed the other day that this Bill should be taken on Monday, the 29th instant, and whether the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had not expressed his readiness to be in his place on that day for the purpose of this Bill being proceeded with, and whether all the Irish Members had not concurred in the wish that this Bill should be taken on that day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am sorry to learn from the statement of the hon. Baronet, that the arrangement I made for taking this Bill on Monday, the 29th instant, will occasion serious inconvenience to the Irish Members. Her Majesty's Government had no personal interest in fixing that particular day for proceeding with this Bill. They consulted, as they supposed, the convenience of the Irish Members in doing so. Of course, if it should turn out that to proceed with the Bill on that day would be inconvenient to Irish Members generally, I should have no desire to enforce the arrangement. But unless there is a general expression of opinion upon the point, I cannot do otherwise than regard myself as bound by the arrangement I have made. I can only regret that the hon. Baronet did not at the time that arrangement was entered into express the objections his friends had to it. Under existing circumstances, I have no power to change the day for proceeding with the Bill without a general expression of consent to such a proposal by the Irish Members.

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether in the case of a rupture with Spain, sufficient previous notice will be given to British shipping to enable them to leave Spanish ports?

LORD STANLEY: All I can say, Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, is that I most sincerely hope that the contingency his Question contemplates may never arise. Should it, however, unfortunately arise, every means will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to give warning and protection to British vessels in Spanish ports.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE EASTER HOLYDAYS.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I rise to make the customary Motion that this House will at its rising adjourn till Monday, the 29th instant, and in doing so I cannot of course omit noticing the remark of the right hon. Gentleman opposite that this Motion might interfere with the continuation of the debate upon his Amendment. Sir, the debate did not originate on this side of the House, and therefore it would be presumption on my part to guarantee that the debate should terminate to-night. All I can say is that as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned they are most desirous that the debate upon the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment should be concluded and the division upon it taken to-night. I shall use all the influence I may possess to secure that object; and I hope, under these circumstances, there will be no opposition to the Motion for the Adjournment.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, before the House assents to that Motion, I wish to bring a little matter under its consideration. I think that little matter will have some effect upon the debate, and probably also upon the division about to take place upon the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. Sir, I will put it in the form of a question, because you ruled last night that an hon. Member moving the adjournment of the House as a precise Motion early in the evening has the opportunity to reply, and as the reply in this case may be very important, I am very glad to make use of this opportunity. I accept the right hon. Gentleman's words with reference to me, and as "a sincere Reformer," speaking to a recent convert, I trust that I shall be listened to. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has commissioned the Secretary for the Treasury and the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin to enter into any arrangement with one or two Members on this side of the House professing peculiar opinions. ["Oh, oh!"] If the House will not be impatient I will lead them gradually up to the little matter. I will give my evidence and I will shrink from nothing. It will be in the recollection of the House that in the course of the debate last night the hon. Member for Oldham made a speech in which, although he expressed himself in favour of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, he yet held out hopes to the other side of the House, and to the Treasury Bench in particular, that circumstances might arise in which he would vote against the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment and would give his support to the Government measure. Now, Sir, a document has been put into my hands for which I am not responsible; and I hope, for the honour of Parliament, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to deny its authenticity. We have all heard in past times of a thimblig Administration, and if this document be authentic—and I have no reason to believe that it is not authentic—and possibly the hon. Member for the Anglesea boroughs will corroborate my statement—there is indeed the commencement of a thimblig Government. Now here, Sir, are the minutes of a conference—a conference or conversation—which has taken place between the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin and the hon. Member for Swansea, who sits below the gangway, together with one or two other hon. Members of the Liberal party. And it is this:—"At the request of certain Members Mr. Dillwyn has committed the terms to writing, and, at their request, he has shown it to Colonel Taylor to know whether it is correct. After reading it over, Colonel Taylor has admitted it to be correct—the purport being that Colonel Taylor undertook, as a gentleman and a man of honour, to press upon the Cabinet the desirability of adopting Mr. Hibbert's Amendment; and further, he gave an intimation that Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli were personally in favour of accepting it." Now, what I want to know is, was that hon. and gallant Gentleman commissioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to enter into such an agreement? I wish to know whether he was commissioned to make this arrangement; and, if so, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has consulted his Cabinet upon the propriety of such a proceeding? I put to the right hon. Gentleman that question. The document I have read to the House has been placed in my hands, and the statement I have made will be authenticated by the hon. Member for the Anglesea boroughs.

MR. OWEN STANLEY : In answer to the appeal made to me, I have no hesitation in saying that I, in common with many other Members of this House, have seen and read this document ; and I believe that its contents, or the purport of them, as read by the hon. Member for Nottingham, are substantially correct. At the time I saw it I stated to the hon. Gentleman from whose hands I took it and read it, that I hoped he would not confide in such a loose document ; but that he would take the earliest opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin was authorized to make the statement referred to in the document.

MR. DILLWYN : As my name has been brought under the consideration of the House, I cannot but express my surprise that it should have been so used by the hon. Member without making any communication to me. And I am also surprised that the hon. Member for Nottingham should have brought forward this question without having given notice of his intention to do so. I have no hesitation in explaining the part I took in the matter, and in stating to the House exactly what occurred on the occasion referred to. I had some conversation with the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin respecting the adjournment of the House for the Easter holydays. I told him that I was one of those who were very desirous—as I still am—of seeing some sort of compromise come to upon the question of Reform, and of seeing a Reform Bill carried this Session ; and that I wished to see whether or not some arrangement might be made by which the views of the different parties might be met. In repeating private conversations with gentlemen, it is very difficult to say whether one is betraying confidence or not—especially if documents like the one I showed to the hon. Member are to be brought forward in this manner. But I believe I am not violating any confidence when I state what took place between the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin and myself, in which there is nothing of which either he or I have any cause to be ashamed. I met the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin county, and I mentioned to him that the acceptance or non-acceptance by the Government of the proposition of the hon. Member for Oldham might influence my conduct with respect to other clauses of the Bill. We talked over the matter together, and it was said that there was great difficulty in discussing some of the questions at issue, in consequence of the illness of an eminent Member of the Cabinet—I hope I am not saying what I have no right to say, but an eminent man may be ill without being ashamed of it. In consequence of the illness of that distinguished person, I understood that the Cabinet were in some difficulty with regard to matters which required discussion ; and it was then suggested that an adjournment of the debate over the holydays might be proposed—not for the purpose of delay or of throwing dust in the eyes of the House, or of postponing the question of Reform—but to secure the careful and deliberate consideration of a question which had been suddenly brought under the attention of the House. The notice of the Amendment which we are to discuss to-night was not handed in until about one o'clock this morning ; and the Cabinet were desirous, as I understood—although I am not in the confidence of the Cabinet—of having an adjournment for the consideration of that and many other questions, and not for the purpose of throwing dust into the eyes of the House, or for the mere convenience of adjourning the question of Reform over the Easter recess. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin gave me the assurance frankly, and as between two gentlemen, that those were the only objects desired ; and, in order that I might be accurate, I jotted down a minute of the conversation on some paper in the lobby. I showed this memorandum afterwards to the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin, and he agreed that it correctly represented what had taken place ; I also showed it to some hon. Members among my friends, and that is the sum and substance of what occurred ; and I do not see that there is anything in what I did that I have any reason to be ashamed of.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS : As the hon. Gentleman the Member for Nottingham has asked a question this afternoon, may I be allowed, in my turn, to put another question to him ? I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman, whether he has given notice to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin, as in common fairness he ought to have done, that he intended to refer to this subject to-night. [Mr. OSBORNE : Yes, I did.]

Unfortunately, the hon. and gallant Gentleman has met with an accident which will probably prevent him from being in his place to meet the statement that the hon. Gentleman has brought forward. I cannot, however, help designating the attack which the hon. Member for Nottingham has made upon the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin as most unfair, uncourteous, and improper. I would therefore ask the hon. Gentleman if he has had the common courtesy which is usually exhibited by Members of this House to give notice to the hon. and gallant Gentleman whose conduct he has attacked this evening?

MR. OSBORNE: Yes, Sir, I have had that common courtesy.

MR. AYRTON: All, Sir, will admit that no one renders a greater service to his country than a gentleman who in times of great crises endeavours to mediate between contending parties, and to arrive at a solution of great public difficulties. It is, however, necessary that a gentleman who acts that part should take a course consistent with his own honour, and consistent with the honour of the party to which he belongs, and if my hon. Friend below me thinks that he has taken such a course, I should be the last person in the world to question his conduct. But it is always desirable that when transactions of such a character take place they should be attended with as much publicity as possible, and that no one should be afraid of the purport of their communications being made known either to this House or to the country at large. But what I particularly desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to before he answers the question put to him is the fact that the Amendment to which this minute of conference refers is one of extreme ambiguity; and I wish particularly to know in what sense that Amendment is understood by the right hon. Gentleman, who has made it the subject of negotiation, since it is capable of two very different constructions. The hon. Member for Oldham has placed an Amendment on the paper which will have the effect of maintaining the clause to which it refers exactly as it now stands, superadding, however, a condition repudiating what I have always understood to be the fundamental position of the Government—the personal payment of rates by the occupier and voter; but the Amendment also assumes that any occu-

pier of a dwelling-house irrespective of the question of value is to be qualified to vote. It proceeds upon these two assumptions—first, that the clause shall give to every occupier of a dwelling-house in a town the right of voting; and secondly, it assumes that the Government abandon the personal payment of rates as a condition of enjoying the franchise. Now, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he accepts the Amendment, whether he accepts it in that sense, or whether he accepts it in the sense that it will put a limit upon the right of voting very different from that put by the clause in its original form. If he accepts it in the one sense the Amendment amplifies the franchise conceded in the clause by striking out the conditions in the latter part of the Bill; if in the other sense, the Amendment is a further and greater restriction than that which is offered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. It has been authentically stated in the House that this Amendment has been the subject of negotiation between the Cabinet and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn); and I therefore want to know in what sense it has been the subject of such negotiation, and I wish to put this consideration forward before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question. If he answers that he intends to accept the Amendment, I should like to know in what sense he does so, whether as an Amendment to the clause as it now stands, or as an Amendment to the clause as it may be very materially modified by the adoption of other propositions? I hope we shall have a very distinct statement on this point, as it would be a deplorable thing if some hon. Gentlemen who sit here, and who are not perhaps familiar with the forms of the House, should only be led into error through an imperfect understanding of what is proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid that my communication will disappoint the curiosity of the hon. Member for Nottingham, for I have very little to say. This negotiation was quite unknown to me, and the matter seems to have been much exaggerated. All I know is, that on coming into the House yesterday, I was told that the hon. Member for Oldham would ask me a question with regard to an Amendment. I had not even read the Amendment at that time; but I said the hon. Member might ask the question whenever he liked. The House will remember—if they remember anything I say—what was my answer to the inquiry; and that is all the opinion I have expressed on the subject to the hon. Member for Oldham, and the only discussion I ever had upon it, either directly or indirectly. I regret very much that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the county of Dublin is not in the House. I am sorry to say that he has met with a very severe accident to-day, which has prevented his attendance as yet. With regard to the statement as to consulting Lord Derby, and other statements of that kind, it is hardly necessary for me to say that they are absurdly erroneous. I have had very little opportunity of consulting Lord Derby of late. He has been seriously ill, and he is only now recovering, and I have thought it best not to trouble him with matters of business of any kind. I should presume, therefore, that he is perfectly unacquainted with the circumstances of any such negotiation as has been alluded to by the hon. Member for Nottingham. I would venture to make one observation to the House upon this matter. I have always found it a happy characteristic of this House that, notwithstanding the severe emulation of our life, and the severe competition that prevails here, and notwithstanding the excited feelings sometimes, to which none of us are superior, there has always been among us on both sides of the House that trust and confidence which only can exist where there is the thorough breeding and feeling of gentlemen. I wish the House to consider carefully what may be the consequences of too critically examining conversations that may take place under such circumstances. I may say for myself that the moment I leave the House and get into the lobby, I readily converse with any Gentleman, whatever his opinions may be, with the same freedom that I should in society, and I should feel extremely embarrassed, and I must adopt a habit of very painful reserve, if every statement which is so made by us is to be afterwards the subject of conversation in Parliament. When I remember the frankness with which I have communicated the opinions of the Government to Members, I may say that I have had no cause in the course of my life, and having been in this House for thirty years, to regret having treated Gentlemen on both sides of the House with the utmost social confidence; and I always thought that this frankness has a great charm and consolation of its own. I do hope, though I have no wish to avoid an inquiry into the present matter, which is really a mare's-nest, that the House will not forget that which has always been our characteristic whatever may be our struggles and encounters, that there should always exist between us the sentiments of gentlemen, to soften the necessary asperity of political warfare.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not think that we should pursue this question further in the absence of the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin, an absence which we all naturally regret; and I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there ought to be that confidence existing between one Member of the House and another to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. But I think that this document, of which I have heard for the first time from the hon. Member for Nottingham to-day, can hardly be considered in the light of a private communication; for, if I understand it properly, it refers to a conversation which has been reduced into writing, and professes to give the opinions of most distinguished Members of the Cabinet upon a question upon which votes of hon. Members may depend, and that with this view it had been shown to hon. Members to influence their minds. A communication coming from a person, known to be in the confidence of the Government, and made use of for such a purpose, should have been made use of openly, and the whole House should have been put in possession of the matter.

LORD ELCHO: Sir, I do not wish to prolong this discussion; but I rise to ask a question of the hon. Member for the Anglesea boroughs (Mr. Owen Stanley.) It is a question which occurred to me and to other hon. Members amongst whom I have been just standing at the Bar of the House. I ask the hon. Gentleman, then, why, when this letter came into his possession, he did not give notice to the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) of his intention to have it submitted to the House? And why, since he thought it a matter of such grave public importance that it was right to bring it before the House, he did not bring it forward himself instead of asking the hon. Member for Nottingham to perform that duty?

MR. OWEN STANLEY: If the House will allow me I will answer the questions just put to me by the noble Lord. In the first place, I wish to assure the House that the document in question was not shown to me as a private document. I was passing through the lobby when I met the hon. Member (I believe) for Lincoln and the hon. Member for Swansea talking together. They called to me, and asked me to look at a paper which they had just been perusing. I looked at it, and read it twice over. As I have before informed the House, all I said at the time was:—"I hope that you will not be satisfied with such a document." That is the history of my becoming acquainted with the document. And now, in answer to the question of the noble Lord, I have to remark, that it was not necessarily my duty to bring the matter before the House. [Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?] Why, because I was not the only person to whom the document was shown. I believe, for example, that the hon. Member for Derby, and several other hon. Members, have seen the document. I had no desire, nor had I asked the hon. Member for Nottingham, to bring this matter before the House. The fact is this:—The hon. Member came to me and asked me whether that was correct, meaning the document. I said it was. The hon. Gentleman then said, "If I refer to you in the House, and ask you if you have seen the document; will you get up in your place and say you have?" I stated that I should be perfectly ready to do so. I repeat that I did not consider it a private document; but rather one that was intended to influence the votes of Members upon one of the most important questions that could be brought before the House or the country. I am therefore ready fearlessly and openly to justify the share I have had in this matter.

MR. O'REILLY: I have no desire to prolong this discussion. I think now that we all understand the facts of the case. I will merely say, in reference to a remark made, that notice ought to be given to the parties immediately concerned before a letter is produced in this House—that this document is not a letter at all, but a memorandum made upon a public matter, and intended to be shown to various Members for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are likely to be induced to give their support to the Government. But I wish to state to the House what the moral is which a great many Members like myself, who are deeply interested in the question of Reform, draw from the matter. It is in the memory of the House that the noble Lord the Member for Chester recommended us yesterday to adjourn our decision upon any of the grave points of the Bill until after the Easter holydays, on the ground that in the interim a satisfactory understanding might be come to or compromises made. Now, Sir, I am just as anxious as any others to see a fair compromise come to by both sides of the House, so that this important measure of Reform might be carried. But I hold that such compromise or compromises should be openly and publicly arrived at after fair discussion in this House, so that the manner in which they are arrived at may be made known to the country. The conclusion I draw from the transaction is this—if we do adjourn over the recess without disposing of the critical part of the Bill which we are to debate to-night—if the compromises hoped for or anticipated are not such as may be publicly offered or accepted in this House, then it is much more becoming of us to come at once to a decision upon the question before us. I arrive, therefore, at the conclusion, and I think the House will also arrive at it, that it is more essential than ever to come to a conclusion this night upon the question now under debate publicly and in the face of the House and the country, and not leave it to be settled by any such compromises as those of which we have just heard.

MR. DILLWYN: I wish to explain a matter in justice to the noble Lord the Member for Chester. Not only did I not show the document in question to the noble Lord, but I believe it was not drawn up until after the noble Lord made his Motion yesterday.

LORD STANLEY: I wish to say that I knew absolutely nothing of the communication to which reference has been made until I entered the House this evening. Whatever may be the nature of the communications that have passed between the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin and certain hon. Members on the other side of the House, in whom he seems to have confided, they will form a question which will doubtless be explained when that hon. and gallant Gentleman is able to resume his seat in this House. That point we can afford to set aside for the present—it can wait; but there is another point respecting which we cannot wait; it is an urgent and important matter, because it affects the position of the Government and the position of the House as regards this question, and is to us a matter of personal honour. We should deeply regret, Sir, that any vote should be given to-night under a false impression; and therefore I wish distinctly to say, and I am authorized by my Colleagues to state, that we go into this debate perfectly free and unpledged, and upon no understanding direct or implied between Her Majesty's Government and any individual Member of this House as to any concessions that will be made in this Bill. I think, then, it is due to the Government and to the House that that fact should be distinctly stated. As to the propriety of certain concessions, I have my own opinion, which perhaps I may on some future occasion express. We, however, desire that the vote to-night upon the question before us shall be taken upon its merits, and upon its merits alone.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that the speech which has just fallen from the noble Lord is one in every way worthy of him, and that it has been heard with universal satisfaction on both sides of the House. I have no doubt that when the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin is happily able to resume his seat amongst us he will be able to explain satisfactorily the part which he has taken in the transaction introduced to our notice by the hon. Member for Nottingham, and the apparent discrepancy, so far as I can gather, between the contents of the document which has been read, conveying his view of the matter, and what has just fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have only one word to say upon the Question of adjournment. The right hon. Gentleman expressed his desire that discussion upon the Amendment which I have moved in Committee upon the Representation of the People Bill should terminate to-night. I believe that it will be for the general convenience of the House that this result should be arrived at. I know that it is impossible to obtain an absolute pledge from hon. Members; but as the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded without any contradiction or expression of dissent from any quarter, I apprehend that we may safely assume it is the intention of the House that the debate should terminate to-night. If any doubt exist upon this point, I think it would be the wiser course to postpone the Motion for Adjournment until the debate is concluded. I think, however, after the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman, and the silence of the House in respect to it, it may be taken to be the general desire of hon. Members that the debate should close. For my own part, I am ready to assent to the Motion and to allow the Question to be put.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: For my own part, Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that I draw a diametrically opposite inference from that expressed on the other side of the House from the event that has occurred this evening. We have heard with great sympathy of the unfortunate illness which has overtaken the head of the Government—an illness which prevents Lord Derby from taking his legitimate place at the head of the Cabinet. Such a circumstance is, of course, calculated to impede any of those concessions or compromises of which we have lately heard, and which I believe a very large proportion of the House is desirous of effecting fairly and honourably in the interest of the country as well as of this House. The Leaders on both sides have expressed a wish to settle this question without been obliged to resort to the extremity of a party conflict. The unfortunate circumstance of the illness of Lord Derby has, however, interfered to prevent any such settlement being arrived at.

ARMY—SUPPLY OF BARRACK STORES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the table a Return of the Rugs and other Barrack Stores put on board the Lady Eglinton steamer which sailed from Dublin for Tilbury Fort, Gravesend, on the 27th March, with the Depôt 83rd Regiment, and to show what provision was made for the men's comfort during a voyage of four days and nights?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that, in consequence of the notice of the right hon. and gallant Member's Question, he made inquiries on the subject at the Horse Guards, and he found that the circumstances were such as he had mentioned. He regretted to find that the depôt of the 83rd Regiment were put on board the Lady Eglinton without the usual supply of rugs and barrack stores ordinarily supplied to troops under such circumstances. He was unable then to say who was to blame for it; but inquiries were being made into it by the Quarter-master General.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday the 29th day of this instant April.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL—[BILL 79.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Boroughs).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 3 and 4, after the words "and 2," to insert the words "whether he in person or his landlord be rated to the relief of the poor."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, in prefacing what I am going to say I may be permitted to enter my protest against the language used in this House, but more especially on this side of the House, and by persons out of doors, with respect to the difference of opinion which prevails on this Bill. Every person who is supposed to differ from the majority on this side of the House is at once branded as a sham Reformer, as a traitor to the cause, as a fool or a knave, or both. Against this I enter my protest. I have heard many things said in this House, many strange things have occurred, and not among the least strange is this of to-night. But, Sir, I am bound to say that, as far as I myself am concerned, I claim the right to have an opinion, and also the right to express that opinion. In making that statement I do not mean to dictate to anybody. And though I may be called a "mushroom" ["Oh, oh!"]—yes, that was the phrase—and though I am obliged to put up with that elegant phraseology, I have a duty that lies before me straight in my path—a duty that I will perform to the best of my ability—and that duty is to state the reasons why, in my opinion, of the two propositions before the House at the present moment, one is better than the other. Of these two propositions one is made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the other by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South

Lancashire. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to add to the constituencies of this country; with what occurred in 1832 he says that he does not meddle; but there are persons now existing whom he wishes to add to the constituencies, and as a means to that end he proposes to extend what in 1832 stopped at the £10 householder, to the other end of the scale, so as to take in all householders. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—and we are obliged to look at the whole matter and not at the small piecemeal fashion in which it is put before the House—his proposition, as a whole, is that we should stop at a £5 rating. He does not express himself plainly as to what he intends to do with this £5 rating; he frames his proposal so as to catch votes on both sides of the House, and all the rest he leaves in darkness. Now, Sir, I have to ask myself which of these two plans is the better one. The thing that recommends itself to me in the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this—that it draws no invidious line of distinction between one class and another of voters. He gets over that difficulty, which is the difficulty of the £10 household franchise. You stop at £10; but there is no principle in stopping at a particular sum, £9 or £10. The £9 householder may be as good as a £10 householder. The £10 franchise therefore is based on no principle, and the consequence has been that all persons below the £10 householder have been angry and wrath at it. Now, what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer say? "I will take away that distinction; I will make applicable to the lowest class of householder the law that stops at the £10 householder, but that which has been required of the latter I will require of every man." But the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and the hon. Member for Birmingham—[MR. GLADSTONE: Nothing of the kind]—I assure the right hon. Gentleman that he need not be so very angry with me as he appears to be. I mean no offence. I merely mean to speak of him with the same freedom as he speaks of other people. I was saying, Sir, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to extend to all classes of householders the same privilege as that which is now enjoyed by the £10 householder. But "No," says the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and those who act with him; "there is the Small Tenements Act in the way, and there is that irrepressible person called the compound-householder." Now, let us see what all this means. I will just make a simple statement, and I will ask any one to give me an answer to it. Suppose town A, with a proprietor of certain tenements. We will suppose that these tenements are £6 tenements, and we will suppose that the proprietor compounds for them. Then, taking a hypothetical figure, suppose that each of the £6 houses would pay 20s. poor rate, but that, by compounding for them all, the proprietor has to pay only 15s. for each—the difference being 5s. It is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, by a provision in this Bill, the compound-householder may send to the overseer and say, "I wish to be rated in future; make me responsible for the rate." If he, the tenant, does this, the result will be that, instead of paying 15s. to the landlord, he will pay 20s. to the State, deducting 15s. from the landlord. But then comes the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who calls that a fine. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Oh, yes—a fine; there is nothing like a catch word. But, let me ask the right hon. Gentleman, what is the difference between the position in which that process will place the man who goes through it, and the position of the uncompounded-householder, who lives in a £6 tenement, and pays the 20s.? Why, because a man is a compound-householder is he to be favoured to the extent of 5s.? Now, I want an answer to that. I do not want minute arithmetical calculations; I do not want mellifluous language; I do not want verbose statements; but I want a plain answer, and I say that it cannot be given. The right hon. Gentleman says, "No; I won't accept it. This is holding out a boon with one hand and taking it back again with the other." When the Chancellor of the Exchequer talks of personal rating, he does not mean it to be essential that the man must with his own hand pay the 20s. He means that the man himself must be answerable for the 20s., and get a receipt for it. But that is the case of the £10 householder; and yet it is only now we find out the hardships of such a condition. I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was in the House at the time of the passing of the Reform Bill; but I never heard anyone object to the £10 householder being placed in that condition except the Radicals, of whom I was one. I have, however, seen the error of my ways. Now, Sir, I do not know that there would be danger in taking away the ratepaying clauses from the £10 householder; but I am sure, and I think the people of this country, people of property, wealth, and virtue, will feel that they have security in the payment of rates, without which you would let in that beautiful residuum which the hon. Member for Birmingham has so artistically described, and you will have all sorts and descriptions of people voting for Members of Parliament. I want to prevent this. I do not want the rabble to vote, but I do want those of the labouring classes who have honour, feeling, and virtue to vote. But then it may be asked, how can you point out those who are the virtuous men? I do not intend to point them out; but I say that in all human affairs you must be guided by general principles, and if you find that a man has a settled home, in which he has lived with his family for a number of years, you have a man that has given hostages to the State, and you have in these circumstances a guarantee for that man's virtue. I say then that there is good reason for making the distinction. There is one thing in which almost all persons agree. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not want to admit every one. There is a large party whom he wants to keep out—that portion of the population whom, for want of a better phrase, I have called the rabble. On this point the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire says the same thing as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the hon. Member for Birmingham says the same thing as the two right hon. Gentlemen. But there is another view of the proposition of the Member for South Lancashire. It is a Conservative proposition. It is far less popular, to use an expression of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, than the Bill of the Government. Then it has the effect of lessening and cutting down the constituencies; and a very significant thing happened last night, which I beg hon. Gentlemen on this side to recollect:—Last night the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was supported by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford. Why? Because it is a Conservative proposition. Well, the very thing which makes the noble Lord support it makes me oppose it. I want a measure more liberal and more popular, and I want an answer to what I have said. I do not want exclamations, in the form of running comments, by hon. Gentlemen behind me, which are very easy for any one to make, and impossible for any one to answer. It appears to me that the matter is a very simple one. I will not go any further into detail; but before I close, Sir, I will say that observations are made very often on conduct like mine by Gentlemen who have suddenly started up in the character of Reformers. Now, what possible interest have I in the matter? Why, this—the interest of my country. ["Oh!"] That comes from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. [Mr. Lowe: No!] Then I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have no earthly object in view except the one I have mentioned. I never have been in office, and I know not the sweets thereof; I never have been turned out of office and kept out of office, and therefore I know not the bitterness thereof. It is strange the lengths that these circumstances lead men to go. They become rampant Reformers, and play Jack Pudding before this House; they do anything to please; and by their noisy advocacy they seek to regain power. I am not one of those. I never have been in power, and I cannot hope to attain to that position now. My object is to get for the people of England a Bill during the present Session. Can those who propose this Amendment say the same thing? They mean decidedly the opposite, and it appears to me some of them are so anxious for office, that they are ready to jump over the table on any pretence whatever. It is all very well when anything in their favour comes from the other side to give shouts of exultation; but when the recoil comes it is not so pleasant. I have made my observations, short and simple as they are. I want an answer to them. I believe that answer can only with difficulty be given, and I shall vote for the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: If I wanted a further reason for voting for the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, I should find it in the speech which we have just heard. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has proved, by his own confession, that the Bill is an appeal to the ambitious passions of the working classes, with its lure of virtual household suffrage; at the same time it is, with its sham restrictions, an appeal to the timidity of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, who are afraid of anything they may fancy a large extension of the suffrage. It is recommended to us because we are told that the question of Reform must be settled; but how can any one in his senses expect that Reform can be settled by a policy which professes to provide a sliding scale franchise—a franchise which cannot be defined within the four corners of the Bill, but which is to be left to the discretion of every vestry, acting under all conceivable impulses of narrow and corrupt feeling, to give or to withhold according to its fancy? Some boroughs, we know, have adopted the Small Tenements Act, and some have not; so that, let us pass this Bill, then there will be, in every borough which has come under the operation of the Small Tenements Act, a perpetual wrangling contest on the part of those who wish to get the franchise which will redound to the sole advantage of the election agent, who will, we may be sure, be always urging them to pay the fine and finding the means for them to do so. Hon. Gentlemen have been told that if they do not pass this Bill a dissolution will follow. But I ask what are we to be dissolved for, and what is to be the cry? On what principle does the Chancellor of the Exchequer propose to go to the country? Is it to be household suffrage or personal rating? Conservative restriction, or Liberal progress? I do not believe that the occupants of the Treasury Bench could have the effrontery to go to a dissolution. A great question like the first Reform Bill, or Catholic Emancipation, was a fit subject for a dissolution; but the fight over the compound-householder is a struggle of quite another class. Although Parliament has occasionally been dissolved on some comparatively trivial defeat, as was the dissolution of 1857, on the alleged insult to the Lorcha Arrow, which indirectly proved fatal to the first Government of Lord Palmerston, still, in the history of the world, no dissolution will ever have taken place on so miserable a cry as the pretended principle of the rights of the compound-householders in the hands of a Conservative Ministry. Hon. Members may not yet have forgotten some amusing story books which came out several years since, in which two gentlemen, named Taper and Tadpole—subordinate Members of the Government, or of the Opposition, it is immaterial which—are introduced, laying their heads together to devise some cry on which to go to the country at a General Election shortly after the Reform Bill. These worthies at length settled on some alliterative and jingling clap-trap which I will not quote, because allusion is made in it to an illustrious person whose name ought never to have been introduced in such a connection. This story gives us some idea of the system of administrative trickery which passes for statesmanship with some who are now in power; but I believe it would not succeed if put into practice at the present moment; and sure I am that if the Government goes to the country it will find it difficult to frame any cry which will serve its purpose. I do not think “our new institutions and our old compound-householder” would be successful. Those on this side of the House have been informed by the hon. Member for Westminster that we are the stupid party; but it is to be hoped that we are at least an honourable party of Gentlemen, and that we shall not, for the sake of a longer tenure of the Benches on the Ministerial side of the House, sacrifice those principles on which alone we can exist as a party. These principles may be summed up in this formula—that the best test and rule of Government is its results; and that, in the organization of the Constitution, we ought not to inquire so much regarding the comparative numbers of those who possess votes and those who do not, as we should respecting the qualifications likely to produce a class of persons who will return Members to Parliament capable of governing the nation upon enlightened principles. These may not be the old Tory notions on the subject; but the old Tory notions, like the old Whig notions, have been buried long ago. These are, however, the principles of the enlightened Liberal-Conservatism of the present free trade generation, cradled in the days of the great Reform Bill. This generation ought to have learned, during the last thirty-five years, the importance of relying on the middle classes. It ought to appreciate the education and competence of that class, and to understand the elements which are needed to create a good, stable, and enlightened Government. This is the Conservatism of the Reform Bill, the Conservatism on which Peel built up his great party.

The old Toryism of the ante-reforming days was a great tradition, but it is past and gone never to return. What are we then to say of those who, in the face of this fact, and for their own self-interest, pretend to raise up a pale and marrowless ghost of that old Toryism of Bolingbroke and his “Patriot King”—and wish to set the middle and the upper class against each other to their mutual destruction, until nothing will be left but the Crown on one side and the mob on the other. Although this object is not specifically recited in the clauses of the present Bill, yet it is one which stands within the overt aim of its author; for, as I will prove, the history of the last twenty-five years shows that an influence has all along been at work—steadily and stealthily, quietly and smoothly working up to that end; until now at last the consummation has come. A dissolution is threatened in which it is clear that the mob—the “residuum”—will be brought out, and this dissolution will, if it succeeds, for ever crush the great middle class of England, and put our country at the mercy of dreaming romancers, and democratic theorists. I am no friend to bringing up the rash utterances made in the early youth of budding politicians; it is an ungenerous system of warfare; but the Committee will own that a Member who had for several years commanded the attention of the House could no longer be termed a budding politician two years before he became the Leader of a great party and overthrew a famous Minister. The utterances of such a man, at such a period of his career, must be symptomatic of his formed opinions. Well, then, an hon. Member who, in 1846, compassed the overthrow of the most powerful statesman of this century, speaking on the condition of Ireland, upon the 16th of February, 1844, said of his own opinions “they were Tory principles, the natural principles of the democracy of England.” He went on to say that “Whig principles were the natural principles of the aristocracy of the country,” and he added, “he was content to tread in the old path, the natural way,” he repeated, of the “democracy of England;” while the hon. Member wound up with a sentence, the truth of which I will not deny, “If the Government did not lead the people, the people would drive the Government.” These were the sentiments of the then hon. Member for Shrewsbury, now the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, and Leader of this House. It is to be noted that in those days the hon. Member was a vehement freetrader, as I could show from other passages of his speeches, and that no small amount of the staple of his invective against Sir Robert Peel was founded upon that statesman's still lingering advocacy of protection; but that as soon as Peel honestly yielded to conviction, and accepted full free trade, the Member for Shrewsbury turned right round and made use of the protectionists, at whose head he then placed himself, as his instruments to overthrow Sir Robert Peel. These are the principles on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has organized the party by whose aid he has three times driven his rivals out of office; while on every one of these three occasions he has led up to—and twice consummated—a theatrical dissolution of Parliament, in each case hitherto—and I think that that analogy will still hold good—followed by a speedy and ignominious downfall. Such is the Leader of our once great party, who has now brought forward this double-faced Reform Bill—on one side fenced with those restrictions which the first breath of open air will tear down—which any parish vestry, led by any local Beales or Odger, will laugh to scorn—and on the other side bedizened by appeals to the truculent democracy of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is of old so fond, as essentially a measure of household suffrage. The £5 line is intelligible whether one likes it or not. It lays down the tangible and sensible principle that solvency is the best test of respectability, and therefore of the franchise; and that the most available criterion of the voter's solvency is to be found in the value of the house which he is able to inhabit with his landlord's approbation. On the other hand, the question of whether this value is to be calculated in rental or on rating is, after all, a mere matter of detail. Last year, in the ardour of party conflict, the democratic Leader of the Tory party, and his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, reciprocally goaded their followers into elevating up to questions of principle things which really were only matters of detail. Taking the rental or the rating as the franchise figure is merely coming, by one way or the other, to the certainty of appreciating that a man pays his way and lives in a house of tolerable comfort. This principle of solvency involved in the payment of his own way on the voter's part, and of the tolerable comfort of the house in which he lives, seems to be the best test to apply in the choice of those who are to obtain the suffrage. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer abandons that principle as illusory, and takes up that which truly is household suffrage; while, for reasons of his own, he hems it in with provisions only available for the benefit of the Tapers and Tadpoles, who, as he hopes, will pull the strings, and of the country attorneys who will, by his calculations, manage the elections. These are my reasons for supporting the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire. I know that for saying what I have done I shall subject myself to pointed gibes from one Member of this House; but I am old fashioned enough to think that pointed gibes from some quarters may be a real compliment to an honest man. I am prepared for anything which I may hear. I have, since the great Conservative break-up of 1846, been longer out of Parliament than in it; because, although I have ever been a Conservative or Tory, I never would fall down and worship the golden image set up in the deserts of Arabia. I have been a free lance long enough, not much to mind whatever may happen to me; and I can say that, sink or swim, dissolution or no dissolution, in or out of the next Parliament, I, for one, with my whole heart and conscience, will vote against the Asian mystery.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he trusted that the Committee would allow him to explain as a Radical Reformer, whose Radicalism dated back to the training of his childhood, the reasons why he should support the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone). It was true that there was much in the Bill of the Government which tended to attract, or he might say delude, Radical Reformers, because it appeared—but he thought it only appeared—to be based on the principle of household suffrage, which was dear to all Radical Reformers. He himself had always been, as he still was, in favour of this principle. He had supported it when it was far less popular than now; and if the present Bill really embodied this principle, no one would support it more cheerfully, more warmly, or more gratefully than he. But they had been particularly informed by more than one Member of the Treasury Bench that it was not a household suffrage Bill. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the India Office had declared that he would not have supported it for a moment if it had been such a Bill. He advocated household suffrage because there was no other so deep, just, and impartial, and so likely to furnish a basis for the borough franchise stable enough to secure it for the future. It gave a man a share in the Government, not on the ground that he possessed any particular property, but because he was the head of a family; household suffrage had been well called "hearthstone suffrage." There was not so much difference between a rate-paying and a household suffrage as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposed. The Bill, he verily believed, was better than the right hon. Gentleman supposed, better than the Secretary for India supposed. What was the meaning of a ratepaying franchise? A householder had to pay several bills—butter's, baker's, landlord's, and that of the parish; and to give a ratepaying franchise was to say to the householder, "If you pay the parish bill, you shall vote; if you do not, you shall not vote." He was not able to understand why the payment of this particular bill should be considered a practical test of a man's solvency more than or even equally with the payment of other bills, because the parish generally took care to be paid. Nevertheless, if the ratepaying franchise was given fairly and honestly to all the constituencies, it would come very nearly to household suffrage. But this Bill did not give it honestly and fairly to all the constituencies. If it did he should have no hesitation in supporting it, even at the cost of leaving his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, who had made sacrifices in the cause of Reform, which were well known to the people, and he would have voted with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose sacrifices in the cause of Reform were unknown. But the Bill conceded nothing of the sort. The proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a good Bill for twenty-nine boroughs, for it would give them household suffrage, and he could not see how the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India could reconcile it to his conscience to inflict household suffrage upon these boroughs. He (Mr. Forster) did not wonder at the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield supporting the Bill, for it would increase the number of his constituents  $11\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. It was eminently a Bill for Sheffield. Nay, it was a Bill framed especially for his hon. and learned Friend, who, in supporting it, was enabled to appear before his warm-hearted constituents the Radical Reformer he was in days of yore, while in this House he appeared in the character of a Conservative. If the Bill had been as good for 171 boroughs, the greater proportion of the inhabitants of which were compound-householders, as it was for the twenty-nine to which he had referred, he would have supported it. The Bill had been described in two words, in a paper which might be called the literary organ of the Government—The Standard—as "an optional household suffrage." Now, on what condition was the "option" given? It was given on condition that the proposed voter should have a vote, if he paid his rate bill in a different way from that in which he had hitherto paid it—not in the way which he and his landlord and the parish had found most convenient, but by personal payment in a special manner. He was no longer to pay it through the landlord, but by a difficult and cumbrous machinery which they were to invent. He was to pay more money, and to pay it in a more inconvenient way. Now, if you had a man fit for the franchise, why impose upon him this condition? Why insist on this optional household suffrage in 171 boroughs? Not surely because these were looked upon as worse than the twenty-nine favoured boroughs? He could not for a moment suppose that the Government thought there was any special virtue in Ashburton, Arundel, Totnes, Dartmouth, or even in Oldham and Sheffield. Then why was this "optional" suffrage insisted upon? It was said that they ought to be sure that a man paid his rates. Well, if he was a compound-householder he most certainly paid his rates through his landlord; more certainly than in any other way. If any bill was taken as a test of voting, he had no objection to the rate bill, which would bring in a large number of voters. But there was another bill, which was most surely paid, and that was the landlord's bill, and in that bill the payment of rates was included. If there was any hon. Member living in country districts who was unacquainted with the ways and doings of compound-householders, let him go amongst his (Mr. Forster's) constituents, and he would soon find that they knew right well that the rates were included in their rents. His chief reason for voting with his right

hon. Friend was that he objected to the proposed test—the proposed safeguard. If a diminution of the number of voters was wanted, let it be brought about in some other way. He did not see why, because a man was poor, he was to be treated differently from those who were richer than he was. It was not right to inflict on him a fine, not only in money, but in loss of time, in making his claim. The Secretary of the Treasury seemed to think there was no fine; but the hon. Gentleman could not have attended to the remarks of his Colleague, the Secretary for India, who spoke of the new voter as “mulcted.” Indeed, one could not but believe that this fine afforded consolation to the right hon. Gentleman because it held out the prospect of deliverance from the spectre of household suffrage. Now he (Mr. Forster) objected to the Bill strongly because it did thus fine the compound-householder. In Bradford the general average rent paid by a hardworking artizan was 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, out of which the landlord paid 6*d.* a week to the parish in the shape of rate. If the artizan were obliged to pay the rate himself, he would have to pay 8*d.* a week to the parish instead of 6*d.* Would he not regard this as a fine, and feel that he was treated worse than his richer neighbours? He objected to the Bill because it would fine the new voter, and make him pay more money than he did at present. The general average rent of artizans, including rates, was 3*s.* 6*d.* a week. Out of that sum the landlord paid about 6*d.* to the parish. If a compound-householder was called upon to pay the rate himself he would have to pay 3*s.* to the landlord, and 8*d.* to the parish. Now, could any one imagine that he would not look on the extra payment as a fine? He objected also to the new compounders being treated in a worse way than the old compounders. The hon. Member for Oldham appeared to have taken under his protection the new compounders. He was not surprised that the hon. Gentleman was doing his best to save the Bill, because for Oldham it was as good a Bill as it was for Sheffield. It would give to Oldham 10,000 voters. The population of Oldham was about 107,000—nearly the same as that of Bradford. The occupations of the people were somewhat similar, perhaps they could not imagine two boroughs more exactly alike. But whilst the Bill gave to Oldham 10,000 voters, it would give to Bradford only 3,500, about half as many as a £5 rental would give. He hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert), who had taken the new compounders under his protection, would see that they really were put on the same footing as the old compounders; and would not, when his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) proposed an Amendment for their protection, be deluded by promises now made, now disavowed, of something which the Government might or might not do after a critical division. He objected to the Bill because it would place the new compounders in a worse position than the old, and could not see any ground for a personal payment of rates. If they chose to interpret personal payment into payment by the tenant himself to the rate collector, and would not allow him to pay through his landlord, why was it that they made the person who happened to live in a house of less value than £10 a year pay more in proportion than that other compound-householder who lived in a house worth more than £10 a year? He also objected to the Bill because it treated one borough different to and worse than another. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that was a great advantage, he thought there was too much dreary monotony at present; but that was a sentimental and artistic view of the question, and would hardly find favour with the 171 boroughs which would think themselves worse treated. Whatever concession they were now making should not be made in the most capricious and fitful manner they could devise. He had compared Bradford and Oldham, and if he went on he might weary the House with comparisons; but there was the borough of Leeds, not far off from the borough of Sheffield, also in the West Riding of Yorkshire, which had a population of about 10,000 more than Sheffield; while Sheffield would have 11½ per cent of the new voters—28,000 out of 245,000 being given to it—and there would be 25,000 in Leeds who would be unable to come in. Not only was one borough left in a different position from another, but one part of a borough was left in a different position from another part. Again, he could not for a moment think that this House would consent to give up its legislative powers to a number of vestries, and oblige them to mix up with their economical arrangements, for the best mode of paying the rates, political considerations. By this Bill they would give power to the vestries and at the same time occupation to the election agents. Doubtless, among the compound-householders there would be some good men who would put themselves on the register at any cost of time, trouble, or money; but hon. Gentlemen knew what human nature was, and they must judge of those men as they would of men in their own rank of life, and they knew that a large proportion of them would not take the trouble to get themselves put on the register. But would they be let alone? Would the election agents let them alone? The election agents would not, and committees, candidates, and members would not be able to let them alone. They would have, as the hon. Member for Stoke had told them, a constant electioneering contest going on from the day this Bill became law until these restrictions were all swept away in the 171 boroughs. They would have candidates, committees, members, and agents, all declaring, "You must take care our friends are discovered, put upon the register, and kept there." He knew there were provisions in the Bill by which they thought they could prevent these rates from being paid by the candidate; but he did not believe they would prevent it. The real result, he believed, would be that an electioneering contest would be constantly going on, and that the candidates would find it a very costly one for them, and would have to spend a great deal more money in order to get into Parliament. He could not understand how the House could, with its eyes open, pass a provision which they knew would induce and tempt men to spend more money in electioneering contests, and it seemed to him that that would be giving a premium for bribery and corruption. This Bill would give great and undue power to the man of wealth, and that was one of his objections to it. He now came to his last objection to the Bill, and that was that the checks contained in it would not last. He saw the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) in his place, and he knew very well what was passing in his (Mr. Forster's) mind. He felt that as a Radical Reformer he was in a difficult position. He knew that these absurd and obnoxious restrictions could not last, and that within four or five years they would all be swept away. And why then, it might be asked, should he not, as a Radical Reformer, vote for the Bill? He, indeed, knew that these restrictions would be swept away, but how?

By constant agitation. By an agitation the more fierce and the more bitter, because, in addition to the great general question upon which it rested, it would be mixed up with local and personal squabbles which Her Majesty's Government chose to bring into the matter by mixing up political with parochial arrangements. Although, then, as a Radical Reformer, he desired to further a Radical Reform, he could not forget that he was a Member of the Legislature, and he could not help thinking that of all the Acts he had assisted in passing there was none less statesmanlike or less patriotic than that introduced at this juncture, and after all the agitation that had taken place, under the pretence of settling this question. Would the House, with its eyes open, pass a Bill which, in common with the Member for Derby, he knew, instead of staying the agitation, would only provoke it? He did not for a moment believe that the House would consent to it. He felt that he was under a grave responsibility, not only as a Member of the House, but because he had had something to do with the agitation out of doors. [Ironical cheers.] He was not ashamed of the part he had taken. He had felt it his duty to attend large meetings of his fellow-countrymen; and, thinking that they were right in what they demanded, he had felt it his duty to tell them that he agreed with them, and that he would do his best in aiding them. Yet the House must not suppose that he was not aware that he was, in his humble way, incurring grave responsibility by thus acting, and he would ask them not to impose upon him and others the duty—for they should think it a duty—of continuing this agitation until these restrictions were removed. He did not believe that the House intended to incur that responsibility, and if not, they must vote for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) in the few words which came from him that evening, with an honesty and clearness of purpose which were quite refreshing in their change from what they had hitherto heard—in those few words the noble Lord clearly gave them to understand that the question was to be decided upon its merits. He (Mr. Forster) trusted that the House would vote for it upon its merits. The merits were, whether they would insist upon the personal payment of rates in this particular manner, as the basis of the franchise. He must frankly say that he did not altogether agree with all the details of the Amendments of his right hon. Friend; but because he did not agree with them was he going to stultify himself by voting for the continuance of these restrictions; and, by voting for that which he was constantly told was the principle of the Bill, was he virtually to say that it should remain the principle of the Bill? There had been much talk about a £5 rating, but a £5 rating was not the question this evening at all. He believed the majority of the House were in favour of a £5 rating. But he thought the time had gone by when a £5 rating would be accepted as a good settlement of the question. That which would have been welcomed as a boon last year, and which would have been admitted, though reluctantly, at the beginning of this, would not be received with much favour now. Probably the right hon. Gentleman had effected that by the baits he had thrown out. But let them decide that question when they came to it. What they had to decide to-night was upon what principle they should base the franchise, to whatever limit they might choose to extend it. One word more before he sat down. There had been a threat of dissolution. He looked upon that threat with great equanimity. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a courageous man—he played the game of politics very skilfully. He was not only a skilful but a bold gamester, and a dissolution was one of his cards. It was very likely that the right hon. Gentleman would play his last card if he could before he would lose the game. But when the time came the right hon. Gentleman would have his Colleagues to consult. He would also have his leader to consult. He would have another gentleman to consult, too—one to whom he might, perhaps, look with as much deference as to either his Colleagues or his Leader—he would have Mr. Spofforth to consult. Upon Mr. Spofforth's advice would very likely depend the right hon. Gentleman's action. He did not pretend to say what might be passing in the brain of that gentleman; but he thought it very possible he might say that to go to the country upon this great question of inflicting upon the compound-householders this trouble and loss of time would not be a very successful proceeding in large boroughs, and that perhaps in some of the other boroughs where the compound-householders were not so strong the new version of Conservative policy would not be altogether popular or respected. Nevertheless, it was not because he utterly disbelieved in a dissolution that he looked upon the threat with equanimity, but it was for this reason—that, though they none of them knew whether they would return to that House or not, he knew that his principles would return. He knew that Radical Reformers did not look upon a dissolution on the question of Reform with fear. So far as Reform was concerned, there was much to be said for a dissolution; and although there were grounds upon which it might be deprecated, on account of the state of affairs abroad and financial depression at home—it certainly was not to be deprecated on account of Reform. If this Parliament did not settle the question, another Parliament would, and he could not forget, indeed, that this House was not elected to pass a Reform Bill, but rather to support Lord Palmerston in deferring Reform; and he felt no doubt that if a dissolution took place in consequence of to-night's division the answer which the country would send back would be clear and unmistakable. That answer, he was convinced, would be that, whatever the extent to which the franchise should be reduced, whatever the basis which Parliament might in its wisdom lay down, it should not be on a principle which inflicted upon the poor voter loss of money, trouble, and annoyance in proportion as he was poor, and which gave to the rich powers of corruption proportioned to the unscrupulousness with which they might employ their wealth.

MR. HUNT said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had concluded his observations by alluding to the consequences of a possible dissolution. Now, he had no desire to discuss that question in connection with Reform. They ought to argue the question of Reform by itself, and without reference to what might be the effect of their vote that night, for hon. Members were bound to do their duty irrespective of any consequences that might befall them individually or collectively. The hon. Gentleman had told them that he was sure that if a dissolution took place the result would be in favour of the principles he advocated. He wanted to know what the hon. Gentleman's principles were. He knew what the principles of the hon. Member were when he sat on that side of the House below the gangway. They were principles that were not asserted one day and repudiated the next, but were, as he had just said, those of a Radical Reformer, which he had consistently advocated in that House. He was puzzled to know what the principles of the hon. Member now were. The hon. Gentleman told them that in his earlier days, before he sat in that House, he took part in an agitation for the extension of the franchise; that he felt a responsibility for the part he took; but that he was not ashamed of the course he had pursued, as indeed he had no reason to be; but would he be able a few months or years hence to affirm, on calm reflection, that he was not ashamed of the course which he was now pursuing? The hon. Member also told them that he was a sincere supporter of household suffrage. He should have thought that a sincere supporter of household suffrage would have asked himself the question with regard to the present how he could best effect the object he had at heart. When a Bill had been introduced which would give the ratepaying and residential householders in boroughs the suffrage, an unsophisticated mind would have expected the hon. Member to further the progress of the measure and endeavour in Committee to lop off the restrictions on which the Government insists in order to make it a household suffrage Bill pure and simple. That would have been a straightforward, simple course, and the course which the hon. Gentleman himself would have followed had he occupied a distinguished seat below the gangway—for the hon. Member had made it distinguished. Last year the hon. and learned Member for Richmond had declared his opinion in favour of household suffrage; but he had not heard what course the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to take to-night with reference to the Amendment. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Member who last spoke were sincere in wishing for household suffrage, he could tell them they were taking the most direct way of rendering the accomplishment of their desire impossible if they supported the Amendment. If a majority should declare itself in favour of household suffrage then the Bill could be proceeded with, and the hon. Gentleman might endeavour to get rid of the restrictions which the Government had determined to maintain in the qualification for the borough franchise. Every one who had spoken in favour of the Amendment—save one or two on that side below the gangway—seemed puzzled as to the grounds on which they supported the Amendment. Some said that the Bill was too democratic, while others maintained that it was too exclusive. The hon. Gentleman who last spoke had set his heart on household suffrage, but he could assure him that if he supported the Amendment he would be farther from his desire than he ever was before. The hon. Gentleman confessed that he found himself in some difficulty, because the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had given notice of other Amendments, one of which, fixing the franchise at £5 in boroughs, he could not approve of. Was the hon. Gentleman so blind as not to see that the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman had one end, and that they were all parts of one scheme? The right hon. Gentleman, with the assistance of his Friends, had concocted an Instruction, which, as they knew, had been placed in the hands of the hon. and learned Member for Exeter, but which had so frightened the Liberal party that they were obliged to give it up. The mutineers in the camp of the right hon. Gentleman having objected to the Instruction—which was concocted, probably with the assistance of his friends, because they saw that its success would defeat the Bill and postpone a settlement of Reform for at least another year—the right hon. Gentleman, who was very pertinacious, and sometimes showed considerable acuteness, finding that he could not carry his Instruction as a whole, resolved to split it up into sections, and the Amendment before them was the first section. The right hon. Gentleman will get the hon. and learned Member for Richmond and the hon. Member for Bradford to vote for that section, and then he would get other hon. Members to vote for the other sections, and thus he would do in detail what he could not do in the gross. There was a well-known custom in the country, when certain characters were bent on an illegal expedition in which the carrying of a gun would excite suspicion. They took the gun to pieces, and sometimes the stock and barrel were carried by different persons. But at some agreed on place they met and put the pieces together, and thus obtained a complete weapon ready for use. That was the very cunning and adroit course taken by right hon. Gentlemen in their attack on the Government; but he doubted whether it would take in those hon. Members who had refused to accept the Instruction. He did not understand the ground upon which hon. Gentlemen were going to vote against the proposal of the Government. The hon. Gentleman had just told them that the Bill was an excellent Bill as regarded twenty-nine boroughs, because in these the Small Tenements Act was not in operation, and that household suffrage would be the result. But hon. Members opposite were not unanimous in taking that view. At a suspicious time a pamphlet was put forth, which stated what the duty of the Opposition was in regard to this Bill. The whole tenor of the pamphlet was to show that the duty of the Opposition was to oppose the Bill of the Government, to support the Instruction which was to have been moved by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter, and it pointed out, as one of the great evils of the Government Bill, the fact that it would establish in the twenty-nine boroughs referred to household suffrage. Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not seem quite agreed in their reasons for supporting the Amendment, for one hon. Gentleman declared that it was good only in part, and another alluded to the case of the boroughs in question as a reason for disapproving of the Bill. In fact, those who supported the Amendment did not seem to be at all united as to its merits and effect, and it appeared to be a crafty contrivance for uniting those who could only unite in defeating the Bill, and who could not agree among themselves as to what kind of measure ought to be carried. The hon. Gentleman then used an argument which they had heard before in the course of this debate, of the evils that would be inflicted upon the compound-householders, and talked of a fine being exacted from them. Now, whatever might be the merit of that expression of a fine, he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had the credit of it. They had heard it so often that he would like to examine it a little. The proposition of the Government was this, that any compound-householder who wished to obtain the franchise might give notice to the overseer that he wished to have his name placed on the rate book and to pay his rates, might pay the full amount of the rates of the borough, and would thus get upon the register. They were told that this was a fine. But had hon. Members opposite considered the effect of the Amendment on this subject which had been placed upon the paper by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Subsection 5 provided—

“The overseers on the receipt of the claim and on the payment of the rate, if any then due, shall make an entry in the rate book declaring the liability of the occupier to be rated and pay rates in respect of such house, and such occupier shall be liable accordingly, and the overseers shall give notice to the owner that the occupier has so claimed as aforesaid, and thenceforth the owner shall be discharged from his liability to be rated or pay any rate in respect of such house until the occupier makes default in payment of such rate, as hereinafter mentioned.”

Now, he asked any plain, practical man to say what would be the result of that arrangement. The compound-householder intimated that he wished to pay his rates, and the owner was discharged from his liability. From that moment the occupier ceased to be a compound-householder. The rent would be re-adjusted to meet the altered circumstances of the case, and as to the fine, it only existed in the imagination of the right hon. Gentleman, and those who thought him infallible in matters of rating. Practical men would tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that as soon as the occupier was rated and was liable to pay rates in respect of his house he would go to his landlord, would arrange upon new terms as to rent, and would pay a rate for the future like any other person. [A laugh.] He observed that a right hon. Gentleman from Ireland was exceedingly amused at this proposition; but he believed he was as well acquainted with the transactions between landlord and tenant in England as the right hon. Gentleman, and he must remember that this was an English Bill. When they came to the discussion of the Irish Bill no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would give them the benefit of his information. It was said that the compound-householder did not now pay the full rate. He (Mr. Hunt) thought he did—he paid it in his rent. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, he was glad that hon. Members opposite agreed with him in that respect. He believed that under the Small Tenements Act the landlord was allowed 25 per cent off the amount of the rates. But he invariably took care to charge in his rent the full amount of the rates, the deductions being allowed him partly for the expenses of the collection, and partly to meet bad debts. But the compound-householder really paid the full rate, and if he were allowed to deduct the full amount of the rate from his rent the right hon. Gentleman's fanciful supposition that there was a fine in the case could not be entertained for an instant. And if there were any inconvenience, he maintained that, after the first quarter's payment of rates, the question of reduction would wholly cease, because the old arrangement that the landlord should pay the rates would be substituted by a new one that these should be paid by the tenant. So that the question of a fine in the case was, for practical purposes, not worth considering. When hon. Members opposite complained that the Government proposal placed the compound-householder in an unfair position, they had not considered the difference between that proposal and the existing Act relating to compound-householders. That Act said that they might claim to be rated, and might vote accordingly; but there was no provision, as in Sub-section 5 of this Bill, to discharge the landlord from his liability. The hon. Gentleman had also alluded to the difference which this Bill enacted as to residence between the £10 householder and those who came in under the new franchise. It was, however, a mistake to suppose that the proposition of the Government was one of the same sort as the Act of 1832. The Act of 1832 established a rental franchise, with conditions as to the payment of rates and residence. But the new franchise given under this Bill was not a rental franchise, but a ratepaying residential household suffrage, with a longer term of residence. Was there anything unreasonable in that? It was well known that the population below £10 rental was of a more migratory character than those above. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that artisans must follow their work, and that it was oppressive to them to exact a long term of residence when the necessities of their position obliged them frequently to move. He admitted there was some force in that. But then it was always understood that a borough constituency had a character, a position, and interests of its own; and, he asked, would they allow the permanent inhabitants of a town, who were knit together by a common bond and united by traditions that had been preserved in the town from time immemorial, to be swamped or overborne by a migratory class who had been brought into the town by some accidental circumstance, and might leave it as suddenly. Notwithstanding what the hon. Gentleman had said, he was still of opinion that the provision of a two years' residence was good in itself, and highly valued by the existing borough constituencies. It was to be remembered that there was a great migration going on from town to town in consequence of strikes and other causes. Some towns had grown more rapidly in one year than they used to grow in half a century, and the old and permanent inhabitants would naturally dislike to be swamped by the new arrivals. Then it was said that the constituencies ought not to be left at the mercy of vestries. If the hon. Gentleman opposite thought there was any risk of voters being excluded by the caprice or the political feeling of vestries, it was open to him to introduce a clause that would prevent the evil, but that was no reason for his voting with the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. He was puzzled by the conduct of those who professed to be sincere Reformers and to wish to see the question settled during the existing Session—and yet who opposed the Government Bill. But he must now turn to another class of speakers, to some Gentlemen who—he could hardly say that they advocated the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, but who expressed their intention of voting for it. Their course he could easily understand. Foremost among them was his noble Friend the Member for Cranbourne. [Laughter.] The name of his noble Friend was so much more illustrious than that of his constituency, that he was often tempted to express the one when he was thinking of the other. But what was the object of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford in voting for the Amendment, as the noble Lord left the Government, of which he was so bright an ornament, because he thought their Bill too democratic? He was, however, going to vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, which took off one of the restrictions. The Amendment was to the effect that persons might have a vote, whether rated personally or not. In the view of the hon. Members on the other side of the House who had spoken on the Amendment, personal rating was a restriction upon the voter obtaining the franchise, and yet his noble Friend the Member for Stamford was going to support the Amendment for taking away the restriction; and that, too, although the Bill was too democratic for him with the restriction. They had not been told how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne was going to vote; but he ventured to predict that, clear-sighted as the right hon. Gentleman was, he would be found in the same lobby as the noble Member for Stamford. He believed that upon this point both these Gentlemen were thoroughly in accord. They had a distinct object in view, and if the Amendment were successful they would gain that object. Who, let him ask, were the most powerful assailants of the Bill of last year? After the right hon. Member for Calne it would be admitted that the noble Member for Stamford had been the most vigorous. His noble Friend was one of those who objected to all Reform. He saw in this Amendment an opportunity of defeating the Bill, and of getting rid of the question of Reform at all events for this year. He said, in effect, "We shall gain a year, and we do not know what may come next. A European war may break out, and we shall at least gain a year's reprieve from the question of Reform." That was the intention and object of the noble Lord in voting for the Amendment. His noble Friend, with all his acuteness and great power of mind, had never understood the people of this country. The notion of his noble Friend, as well as of the right hon. Member for Calne, was, that Parliament should govern for the people, and both those hon. Members objected to the doctrine that Parliament should govern by and with the people. His noble Friend's experience had not at all served to dispel this idea. He (Mr. Hunt) had often wished that his noble Friend, instead of taking refuge in the limited sphere which was so justly proud of returning him as its representative, should, if only for one election, cast himself upon some large constituency, either county or borough. He would then find that an immense number of those whom he wished to exclude from the franchise had thoughts working in their brains little dreamed of by those who in the pride of their intellect looked down upon the struggling sons of toil. He (Mr. Hunt) believed that the people of this country, as soon as they got beyond the difficult point of earning bread for themselves and their families—as soon as they began to rise to a higher position and were able to earn more than was necessary to satisfy the mere wants which we shared in common with the brute creation, their first idea was to give their children a better education than they themselves had received. Their next desire was to take part in the management of local affairs. They then rose further; and as their reading extended and means improved, the more intelligent became sincerely desirous of having a share, through representatives, in the government of the country. This was a consideration which had not yet penetrated the brain of his noble Friend; nor had the Member for Calne ever realized it. He (Mr. Hunt) believed, on the other hand, that Her Majesty's Government had realized it. The Bill was an honest attempt to give an opportunity of admitting to the franchise all those who showed by their acts and conduct that they were in the position of being independent, and who showed, moreover, that they were desirous of obtaining political power. The House was told that the Government measure was a monstrous proposal. They were told that it would be much better to have a certain limit of rental, by means of which a certain number would be admitted to the franchise, and what the hon. Member for Birmingham called the "residuum" would be kept out. The Government had, however, gone upon a better and a wiser principle. They said, "We wish to recognise the claim of many who are now excluded, and to allow them to take part in our political affairs. We do not ask what is the rent they pay for their houses. Rent varies in different places, according to the circumstances of the place. A man who lives in a £10 house in one town may be no better in point of position and intelligence, or may be no more likely to use the franchise well, than a man who lives in a £4 or £5 house in another place. In the metropolis, for instance, a £5 franchise would hardly add a man to the electoral roll. We do not therefore ask you what rent you pay; but we ask, are you willing to take upon yourself the ordinary burdens of citizenship? Are you a man to be trusted for fulfilling the obligations which you have accepted? or are you one of the thriftless class who are so uncertain and so unpunctual that you cannot be trusted, and who are obliged to fall back upon the landlord to pay your rates when they are demanded? If you give security by having resided a sufficient time in the town where you claim to be a voter; if you have an interest in that place, and are not there to-day and away to-morrow; if, in fact, you have a settled residence, then we shall give you the franchise." He thought that was a better and more popular principle to proceed upon than to fix a £5 or any other limit. The great mistake of the Reform Act of 1832 was that it drew a hard and sharp line at £10 which excluded all below it; and the right hon. Member for South Lancashire now proposed to commit a similar mistake by drawing another sharp line at £5. Would the agitation that now existed not be renewed in that case? Most undoubtedly it would; and they would not arrive at any settlement of the question. Some might say, "Very true; but we have postponed the question for at least the term of our natural lives." But were they merely to think of getting rid of the trouble and annoyance for themselves, and care nothing for posterity? No one could deny that the agitation which had taken place had been a great calamity to the country. Beneficial measures had been postponed, and friendships had been severed in consequence of that agitation. Years had been wasted in struggling about this question. He maintained, therefore, that they should make an attempt to settle it upon an enduring basis. The proposal of the Government was of such a character. It drew no hard, sharp line. It said that whatever was the amount of rent paid by a man, if he showed that he was sincerely desirous of obtaining the franchise and undertaking the duties of citizenship, he would receive a vote. That was a measure which ought to commend itself to the House and to the country; and he trusted that the Government would be supported in resisting the Amendment which, though it might catch a few votes that would not be given to the right hon. Gentleman's other Amendments, was utterly inconsistent with the whole principle of the Bill. Those who voted for the Amendment ought in consistency to have voted against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. LOCKE said, he would not plunge into the difficult question of the compound-householders, as he thought that subject had been pretty nearly exhausted. He would rather address himself to a matter which very nearly concerned himself, and it was with regard to the course he took when he attended the meeting at the house of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. The meeting was very large, and the right hon. Gentleman made a statement concerning the course he was about to pursue, and read an Instruction which he (Mr.

Locke) thought a very injudicious one. He thought those meetings ought to be private. They were held, it was supposed, to enable hon. Members by quiet discussion to arrive at some course which the party should pursue; and if they were not considered private, they must be productive of inconvenience, and it would be better to arrange matters by letter from the right hon. Gentleman who was at the head of the party. What he said on that occasion he said most conscientiously—that he believed the course suggested was not the right one, inasmuch as it would place the Liberal party in a false position. The Instruction was extremely objectionable, because it prescribed a given line which nobody could understand, but which, whatever it meant, was clearly an indication that the suffrage should not be extended so far as the Bill of the Government proposed to extend it. Now, he thought it was not good tactics for the Liberal party to declare that they could not go so far in enfranchising the people as a Conservative Government. Therefore, he objected to the Instruction. They had heard a great deal from the hon. Member for Nottingham and others about Members not following their Leaders; that was a charge which the hon. Member for Nottingham at least had no right to make. [Mr. OSBORNE: I never said a word about it.] He (Mr. Locke) knew pretty well what the hon. Member thought, and what he meant. He complained of the forty-eight Members who met in the tea-room. What right had the hon. Member for Nottingham to complain of that? They met in an open and straightforward manner. They did not do, as the hon. Gentleman had done to-night, charging hon. Gentlemen with making communications one to another which they clearly had a perfect right to do if they chose. The hon. Member for Nottingham had no business to charge those who met in the tea-room. They met openly; any one who chose might enter for the purpose of taking into consideration whether or not the Instruction which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire intended to submit to the House was a judicious one. That was the sole question which those Gentlemen met to consider, and they did consider it. There were fifty-two Members present, and he believed, with the exception of four, they all agreed that the course suggested was not a judicious one. Several Gentlemen who were present, and he among the number, were deputed to wait on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. They expressed to him their views; they said they thought it an injudicious course, and the right hon. Gentleman finally coincided in the opinion they expressed. [Mr. GLADSTONE here made some indication of dissent.] If the right hon. Gentleman did not he was clearly wrong. He was quite satisfied of this—the right hon. Gentleman could not, in moving that Instruction, have presented to the House so taking a proposition as he had done last night when limiting his proposition to what, he presumed, most Liberal Members must agree to—namely, the principle that personal payment of rates should not be compulsory, and that it should be sufficient that either the landlord or tenant should be rated. In suggesting the withdrawal of the Instruction he thought, therefore, that he had done the right hon. Gentleman a great service; and he intended to do him service still, if he were allowed. But he must say he objected very much to be taunted for the course he thought it his duty to pursue. He defied the hon. Member to say that any one had ever pursued a more straightforward course as a party man than he had. He defied any one to say that upon any question he had ever played fast and loose; and he believed the forty-eight men who acted with him were equally honest and above-board. He took great credit to himself for what he had done. The result was that this Bill had been brought into Committee; and the most dangerous course that could be taken was to have excluded the Bill from going into Committee. He recollected the course taken in 1859, when a Resolution was moved by Lord John Russell on the second reading of the Bill brought in by the Conservative Government. Although that Resolution was perfectly plain, stating that no measure of Reform could be satisfactory which did not lower the borough franchise, still, what had been the charge against the Liberal party ever since? It had been reiterated by the Conservatives over and over again that had their Bill been allowed to go into Committee they would have been prepared to make any amendments that might be required. Now, he was anxious to test them on the present occasion, and see what they would do. Like his hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, he was in favour of household suffrage pure and simple. He preferred it to a £5 rating, although he thought the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was right in his Amendment at present under discussion, and he intended to vote with him; and if this Amendment were carried, he did not see why it should not be applied to household suffrage. Why should it not be applied to the Bill of the Government as well as to the subsequent propositions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone)? The proposition with respect to personal rating had been very much misunderstood. He did not understand that it was absolutely necessary that the occupier of a house should himself pay the rate, but that he should be the person liable to pay the rate—he must be on the rate book, and liable to pay the rate. Various Acts, including the Small Tenements Act and local Acts, interfered very much with the putting of the occupier's name on the rate book. What, therefore, he would suggest to the Government was this—if the Amendment was carried they should consider it sufficient to have either the owner or tenant rated. He saw no reason why the Amendment, if carried, should be fatal to the Bill. It was perfectly immaterial whether the tenant, being a compounder, paid his rate actually in money to the overseer or through his landlord—in either case he was a substantial person. He therefore thought the right hon. Gentleman's proposal was perfectly right, and he should give it his support. At the same time, he did not bind himself to support any other Amendment of which notice had been given by the right hon. Gentleman. He did not see why the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, if carried, should be fatal to the Bill; and he earnestly called upon the right hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the Treasury Bench, if they happened to be in a minority that night, to re-consider their determination to make this question a vital one, and to recollect that there was a very strong party who sat on the Opposition side of the House who advocated household suffrage. But did hon. Gentlemen think that the mere fact of the landlord paying the rate made the occupier a less substantial person, and therefore less fitted to exercise the franchise? Turning to the question of household suffrage, he must say that the phrase sounded pleasantly to his ears, and on every possible occasion since he had sat in that House he had endeavoured, as harmoniously as he could, to instil that principle into the ears of his constituents. He had found great difficulty in doing so, and his struggles against manhood suffrage had been both continuous and severe. Not having the talent or the power possessed by the hon. Member for Birmingham of going about the country and mixing himself up with manhood suffrage, and of then, by some extraordinary process of reasoning, detaching himself from it, he had merely been able to tell his constituents in a vulgar common-place way that he preferred household suffrage to manhood suffrage. The Government had brought in a Bill for household suffrage, and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who professed to be in favour of household suffrage pure and simple, and told the House that he should vote in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, had said nothing about what course he should take with regard to the £5 rating proposition.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should vote against that proposition.

MR. LOCKE said, that under those circumstances they should find themselves in delightful company, and he could only hope that the hon. Gentleman would be no backslider. Taking into consideration the number of hon. Members, especially from the North of England, who had spent their lives in advocating household suffrage, he might say to the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench that if they would only be firm, staunch, and true to their colours, they might have household suffrage yet. The evening had been commenced in a rather unpleasant sort of way, crimination and re-crimination having been bandied about on every side; but he trusted that when the Liberal party came to do their duty at the end of the evening they would be found to be a happy and united family; but whatever might be the result of that division, he hoped that both sides of the House would keep the Bill in view, and would do their best to make it the law of the land during the present Session.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was anxious to state the reasons which would induce him to vote against the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire; and he was the more anxious to do so, because sounds and observations from his own side had reached his ears during the course of the debate which had almost convinced him that he was sitting on the Opposition side of the House. It was, no doubt, a very convenient line for the friends of the right hon. Gentleman to pursue to take these Amendments separately, but he must regard them as one. He thought that the one they had now to deal with was a very inconsistent Amendment. The beginning differed from the end, and the Amendment contained two things very widely distinct; it meant indiscriminate admission, and arbitrary tyrannical exclusion. He wanted to adopt a winnowing system, provided that the process were simple, easy, and straightforward. He did not think that it would be complimentary to say to any class, however deserving of the vote, "We will shovel you into the electoral body in a mass;" and he was taking that line as much in the interest of those excluded as those admitted. He wished to admit the working classes, and to admit them in a complimentary manner. It was not complimentary to admit them all by one door. His hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) said he wanted to make the road to the polling-booth wide and smooth. But he (Mr. Liddell) objected to the hon. Member's way of doing this. It was not complimentary and not just to say that the suffrage should be conferred whether or not any sacrifice were made to obtain it. He now came to the other part of the Amendment, that which related to tyrannical exclusion. He would be no party to excluding any man, however poor and humble, from the vote, who proved himself worthy of it, by making sacrifices to obtain it. For these reasons he should vote against the Amendment—because he thought it was inconsistent with itself, and because he thought the principles involved were highly objectionable. A great deal had been said about the inconsistency of hon. Gentlemen; but to his mind they had shown a wonderful consistency in their conduct. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had been very consistent in courting defeat upon the same point on which he had sustained it last year. The right hon. Gentleman was then defeated when he stood in a much more favourable position than he did at the present moment. The House of Commons then decided by a majority—a small majority, perhaps, but still a majority—in the fullest House that had ever been known, in favour of a rating franchise. The Government, therefore, were perfectly justified in adopting that franchise as the basis of their

Bill. They had another example of consistency in the speech of his noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne); he was consistent in his distrust of his fellow-men, and he did not confine that distrust to the lower classes; but he had manifested it towards his late, his very recent Colleagues. That was a species of consistency for which he (Mr. Liddell) had very little admiration. He heard a speech last night which well deserved the palm that should be awarded to consistency, that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). His right hon. Friend was consistent, and in the course he should pursue upon this question he should take that right hon. Gentleman as his leader. That right hon. Gentleman had said eight years ago that, if the franchise was to be altered at all, the only resting-place would be household suffrage. He had been consistent also on another point. He had always been kind and considerate in speaking of the working classes, and he had been so because he knew something about them. People who know the working classes could appreciate and trust them, and it was by distrust of the working classes that many persons had earned the title of pseudo-Reformers. He had himself never been eager to see a measure of Reform introduced; but he had always felt that when such a measure was undertaken it must be undertaken generously, and that there must be a large extension of the suffrage. He had no fear whatever of the result, provided the extension of the suffrage was given by means of a discriminatory process. In the proposition of the Government there was neither insult, nor falseness, nor humbug. It was said plainly to the working classes, "If you will undertake the duties of citizenship; if you will take pains to have a vote, you shall have it." He approved of this system in preference to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), which was more complicated and less distinct. But it was said that one injurious effect of the passing of the Bill would be that the electioneering agent would be called into play in times of excitement, and that, through his agency, a large mass of new voters would be placed on the register. He should, however, like to ask whether the registration agent was not now employed. He knew of one great Liberal agent who had been instrumental in putting on the register 17,000 voters as things at present stood; and one reason why he should vote for the Bill of the Government was because he should like to see the voter place himself on the register, instead of waiting for the interference of such a person. Besides, a little political excitement was a very good thing. The same Liberal electioneering agent had stated that one of the worst features of the present state of things was that there was so much apathy and indifference among the wealthy classes in reference to politics; but he (Mr. Liddell) thought that if the working classes were induced to claim the franchise under this Bill a little wholesome pressure would be put upon the upper classes, who would, however, he believed, find their legitimate influence in no degree diminished by this Bill. He believed that intelligence, and education, and even wealth, when properly expended, would always command respect in this country, among the working classes. He derived this confidence from living among, seeing, and knowing what the working classes were, and also knowing the progress they had made. He did not do them the injustice to suppose that they were all Radicals; and, indeed, there never was a more preposterous idea. The question, however, was frequently argued as if the working men would swamp the existing constituencies, which meant that they would override them and take a different line of action in all public questions. There were, however, a variety of views among the working class, and, he believed, that there was among them a strong Conservative feeling, and an attachment to the institutions and the Church of the country. Such, as he stated, were among others the reasons which induced him to give his hearty support to the Bill. But before he sat down he would congratulate hon. Members opposite upon the accession to their ranks from the Ministerial side of the House; though he must say that he thought that hon. Gentlemen opposite who sat below the gangway would be acute and sagacious enough to estimate at its true value the allegiance of these last new converts to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone).

MR. GILPIN said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had expressed a hope that Members at the Opposition side of the House would estimate at their true value the converts from his side of the House; and he (Mr. Gilpin) hoped that the hon. Gentleman would estimate at their true value the converts which they would themselves have among their ranks. The hon. Gentleman spoke as if he had just ascertained that the working classes had among them men of various opinions, but did the wildest Radical ever suppose that in extending the franchise all the new voters would be of their own side in politics? The hon. Member said he objected to the Amendment because it was either a plan for an indiscriminate admission to the franchise or for arbitrary exclusion; and he (Mr. Gilpin) supported the Amendment because he believed it was neither one nor the other. He wished to call attention to the fact that they were not then upon the £5 rental, nor on the question of two years' residence, but upon the question whether personal rating should be a necessity for a man having a vote. On that ground, and that ground only, the division would be taken, and in joining his friends around him in going into the lobby with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) he pledged himself to that, and to nothing more. When they talked of the working man making a sacrifice to obtain the vote, why should they ask the working man to do that which they did not do themselves? The working man was to take the trouble to put himself upon the rate book, whilst members of other classes were put upon the rate book without taking any trouble. Working men's houses were under a compound-rating, not for his own convenience, not even for the convenience of his landlord always, but for the convenience of the tax-gatherer; and why should such people not be enfranchised, when they, in fact, paid rates, but paid them through their landlords? Nothing short of such a suffrage as was proposed by the Amendment would give satisfaction to the country. The hon. Gentleman said, "We have trust in the working classes." If, in saying that, the hon. Member spoke for his party, he (Mr. Gilpin) congratulated that party on having at last confidence in the working classes. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had made that evening one of the ablest speeches he had ever heard pronounced upon this question. The Secretary for the Treasury (Mr. Hunt), in endeavouring to reply to it, said he was puzzled to know the principles of the hon. Gentleman. It appeared to him (Mr. Gilpin), that the hon. Secretary for the Treasury must have felt himself very much puzzled to understand what the principles were which translated him to the Ministerial Bench. If the principles of the hon. Gentleman in any way resembled his present description of them, they were very different from those which the hon. Gentleman held in times past. He (Mr. Gilpin) opposed this Bill because it was not one for household suffrage. It pretended to be such, but it surrounded its household suffrage with such guards and difficulties that it could not be properly considered as a household suffrage Bill. He was in favour of household suffrage, and had been so when hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches were opposed to the extension of the suffrage at all. Now, there was no man in that House he would be more disposed to follow upon general questions than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). When that right hon. Gentleman was a Member of a former Government, the question of Reform was debated, and the result of the decision of the Cabinet was that he was jerked from his position on the Treasury Bench to one of the back Benches. In supporting the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, he must express a hope that in the event of its being carried the Government would not be induced to drop the Bill. He was quite certain that the Government would find many hon. Members on his side of the House who though going into the lobby with the late Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this particular question would not be inclined to support those other Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman, which, judging from the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, were viewed by them as raising the great objection to the Amendments as a whole. If necessary he was prepared to go to the country upon the principle of personal payment of rates. He should be prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. P. Scrope) at the proper time, because it went to establish the principle that taxation and representation should be co-extensive. The Committee would recollect how emphatic the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in his replies to what had been said from the opposite side of the House. The answers of the right hon. Gentleman were almost invariably to the effect that all such questions were, properly, questions for the Committee, so that the right hon. Gentleman had led the House to believe that when the House got into Committee upon this Bill he should be prepared practically to assent to the decisions of such Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer further told them that Reform was not a question to decide the fate of the Government, or that should be taken up in reference to the distinctions of party. He (Mr. Gilpin) should be glad to believe that the right hon. Gentleman would take the division to-night, then, as the opinion of the House upon the principle of Reform, and that he would adapt the principle of his Bill to that endorsed by the opinion of the majority of that House. He (Mr. Gilpin) had taken his part in public meetings out of the House. He reckoned himself as a working man amongst working men, but he should be glad to see, for the term of his natural life, this question settled—he should wish to see it settled in the present Session; nay, more, he should wish to see it settled by the present Government. If they were sent back to their constituents without a real, practical, workable extension of the franchise, they would bring upon themselves what they should well deserve—the condemnation of their constituents and of the whole country.

MR. CORRANCE: It is with a feeling of some reluctance that I rise to address the House. I cannot but be aware of the fact that there are many whose opinions upon a subject such as this must command greater weight than my own. I shall beg to offer a few observations, within such limits as may deserve the indulgence of the House. It may be deemed by some no mean advantage that I am able to do so, free from the inconveniences which cannot fail to accompany those who have in public life, and for a longer period, followed the veering currents of Reform. I will use no reserve, but frankly avow the sentiments I have for some time past consistently held. It is as a Reformer that I speak, not of to-day alone, nor from present circumstances only, but from conviction; of what? Well, at this early date after my entrance into this House, I am not anxious to enter into questions antagonistic to the opinions which are held by Members on the opposite side; but this much I must frankly state, that I am not led to such a conclusion by my satisfaction at the policy of past years, either domestic or foreign, or my acquiescence in the doctrine of laissez faire or its results. It is my opinion that we have but little cause for satisfaction, and hence many evils which have arisen at this time—and hence discontent. It seems to me that out of this has grown this demand for Reform, and the situation which exists. In this situation I see many features of a well-known type, and some actors not unknown. It recalls to me the year 1848. During that year I was a witness to those scenes of trouble and confusion in Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, where European civilization became a laughing-stock to itself. And why do I recal these inauspicious memories of the past? It is because I believe that if we are to escape such evils here, it must be through the wisdom, the prudence, and the moderation of Parliament itself. When we entered into this question, at the commencement of this year, it was under the happiest auspices, and as men fully impressed with the gravity of their task. To a great necessity personal ambition was, for a time, to give place, and party feeling to sage counsels and disinterested advice. Opportunities occurred, mistakes were made, no doubt, but the Whig party refused to take advantage of them. The pledge was a tacit one; but let me say this—that by that great party opposite never was a pledge better kept. There were not wanting those who would have urged them on. It was not Achilles, but his myrmidons who rested in their tents. If there were murmurs, they arose on the other side: perhaps, not altogether without reason, for one after another reservations to which, rightly or wrongly, they attached much importance, were given up. In such self-sacrifice they were not wanting on their side—sacrifices made to the wills and wishes of this House, and in deference to the opinion expressed does that party deserve no consideration in this respect? What is the issue now raised to which all this must give place? Let us inquire into this. It will not fail to have struck this House that the main feature in this franchise is its entire dependence upon rates. In fact, the rate book is to be the register of the future, and its settlement becomes the principal point—into that present condition let us now inquire. Now, in almost all the arguments I have heard hitherto, it seems to be assumed that the conditions of the future are to be those which at present exist. Anomalies are pointed out, and difficulties arising from this source. But why so in this case? Why the very Instructions with which we enter Committee gives us at least the power to deal with this. What was that part of the Motion made by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter the other night, but to this very effect—that we might produce uniformity in this respect? And if we wish to proceed upon any consequential plan, is it not clearly the first task this Committee must undertake? Now, there are two ways in which we might effect this as regard the compound franchise. We might abolish composition, or equalize it throughout. To the former plan I do not assent; I do not agree in this respect with the opinion expressed last night. I think that this composition is, in many places, a great advantage to a township; and it is justly esteemed a boon to the labouring class, as giving encouragement to building houses of a certain class. We are told that formerly more were exempt, and that it prevents exemption; but the fact is that at present there is less necessity for this. It is far more important that it should encourage building better houses, and thus, by increasing the supply, to equalize and lower rents without injury or loss to landlords. Well, practically, this is well known, and the benefits esteemed at their full worth; and I do not think a more unpopular measure could be devised than to abolish the compound rate. The other alternative is to make it compulsory within Parliamentary boroughs, at a certain rate. Supposing this arrangement carried out we shall then have but two classes of voters to deal with at uniform rates—those who are compounded for, and those who are not. Now, as regards the former, let me frankly admit that I do not think that for the purpose of enfranchisement, you can demand from such a one more than the compound rate. For whose benefit is the composition made? For the landlord, and the municipality with which he treats. He undertakes to make a fixed payment at a certain rate, and this rate should cover certain losses and risks. If the percentage is too high, then the landlord benefits, of course; if set too low, he will not accept, and hence, what the right hon. Member for South Lancashire has told us concerning the rejection of the Act there are many of my opinion as to this on this side of the House, and I did hope, and still do hope, that we should have received satisfactory assurance that the Government would not consider this question of the excess of compound rate a vital point. I trust that we may do so before the end of this debate—it will relieve many of a difficulty in this case. But the right hon. Member for South Lancashire has gone beyond this. He tells us that the compound-householder, as occupier, desires no benefit, even indirect. I must join issue on this point. He says that the law of political economy justifies this view. This I cannot admit, when, by a landlord, certain immunities are enjoyed—from loss or risk—the law of competition will oblige him to let his house for less. Take certain houses subject to such risk and loss, and certain houses which are not, and the remission will tell upon the rent so also with the rate. The advantage is then indirect, and may not justify a tax, but it is real and substantial nevertheless. I press this point because when we come to the question of residence its importance will be seen. And now what is the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman in this Amendment. It is this—he disqualifies all below a certain class. Why does he do this? Is wealth the base upon which a settlement is to be obtained, or is it that we here touch the venal point? It would seem so in his opinion at least. But what a falling off is here. Does this come consistently from his lips? How reconcile it with the metaphysical politics of the past with the doctrine which embraced mankind. And now, observe this, he excludes flesh and blood, but he includes bricks and mortar of any class. All tenements above a certain value can give the franchise inhabited or not. Warehouses, and other hereditaments of that class, but the £4 man is not so good as the £5 house. The right hon. Member is also afraid of corruption. He sees the hand of the electioneering agent in this case, and in this fear the hon. Member for Bradford partakes. Is 20s. the test of purity in this case? Are hon. Members then converted to the opinion that if you seek ignorance, if you seek venality, you will find it among this class? At least let me say this, that you will find no trace of such a test in the Government Bill. It assumes no such disqualification as the unvarying characteristics of a class. If this House seeks self-purification sincerely, and in earnest, it can get it at a cheaper rate, and by means more just than by the disqualification of a class. I do not hesitate to say that, as an alternative, I should even prefer that tremendous adjuration suggested to us by an hon. and learned Member. But we are told that other hardships exist, and great fears are almost uniformly entertained of the conduct of parish officers in this case. To go to the parish overseer is a hardship of the gravest class. When I heard the description given of these functionaries upon a recent occasion, I thought so myself. Painted, I might say illuminated, by the genius of the right hon Gentleman, I was deeply impressed, and I thought of Charles Dickens, I thought of Mr. Bumble, and I recollected Oliver Twist. But this was the work of a great artist, not the simple subject, and, as its effect passed off, I could not but remember that such parish officers are not the tools of Toryism, but the intelligent, the humble administrators of recent Whig Acts. And now, finally, it is between these two measures we must choose. It does not leave me one instant in doubt, and let the House remember that upon its decision depends more than this. It is not the fate of a clause, not of a Bill, nor even of a Ministry, which is at stake. It may well be that of the nation itself. If the progress of this Bill is stopped, so is the progress of Reform. To-night we shall better judge who are the sincere Reformers and who are not. I accept this measure as a great and necessary act, without which you can have neither stability nor strength. Reverting to former times, and quoting the words of a great Englishman, I say of this system, as he said of that—

“That in such a system, and under circumstances which exist, you will have neither the security of a free Government, nor the energy of an absolute monarchy: neither that political force which is drawn from the concentrated vigour of a single and indomitable Bill; nor the tidal influence of a great and united people.”

MR. COWEN said, that if the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and those who sat beside him were to advertise themselves before the country as Reformers for sale, they might depend upon it they would realize a very low price. He had himself been a household franchise man all his life, and became a Radical Reformer nearly fifty years ago, and nothing in his experience of the movement surprised him more than to find the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) advocating household franchise, which he (Mr. Cowen) advocated before the hon. Gentleman was born. He cordially agreed with the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), which would be read with interest throughout the country. He had had considerable practical experience of questions connected with local taxation, and was especially conversant with the working of the Small Tenements Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman challenged anybody to contradict his figures, and did as much to mystify the matter as any one who had gone before him. The point they were there to decide on that occasion was that of personal rating, and the Small Tenements Act seemed to him the bugbear in the way of the settlement of that point. Under the Small Tenements Act all houses up to £6 were charged at three-fourths of the full rate; but on the landlord intimating his willingness to pay the rates, whether the houses were occupied or not, he could be rated at one-half. Suppose a rateable value of £6. The average amount of rates was 4s. in the pound. Then the rates amounted to 24s. a year; but the tenant paid rent covering the rate, and if he made himself a voter by claiming to be rated and paying the 24s. there would be a loss of 12s. a year, which was a fine on the tenant for obtaining his vote of the difference between the full and the compound rate. He had always advocated household suffrage, and he would support the Government Bill, if it would establish household suffrage; but it would not do so. The Bill was a deception, a Bill to mislead, a Bill to create mischief, and which, if passed in its present shape, would afford the best basis possible for future agitation. For these reasons he should support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, though by no means approving all the Amendments he had put upon the paper. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield asked how the Small Tenements Act could produce mischief. He was guilty of no exaggeration when he said that he had known more than one instance in which, under a system analogous to that which the present Bill proposed to render general, a single man would have had it in his power to enfranchise or to disfranchise the inhabitants of two or three parishes all at once. He had no fear of the working men; on the contrary, he hoped to see them admitted to the franchise with no grudging hand. He believed, however, that the Government Bill would disfranchise to a large extent; and that no one knew this better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord the late Secretary of State for India.

MR. DALGLISH said, he felt himself placed in rather a false position. Last week notice had been given of a certain Instruction, which was no sooner seen by Members of the House than a certain number of them assembled at what had been called the "tea-room meeting," and determined that it could not be supported. From that meeting a deputation was sent to the Leader of the Liberal party, it being considered only courtesy to inform him of the resolve of a portion of his followers. The result was that on Monday evening, at the instance of the hon. Member for Southwark, a portion of the Instruction was left out, and the House went into Committee. But on Monday evening notice was given of an Amendment which embraced all the points that had been embodied in the Instruction. A fresh difficulty then arose. A great portion of those who had attended the tea-room meeting agreed that they could not support that Amendment. It was, accordingly, withdrawn; and now a further Amendment had been submitted to them.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Amendment was not withdrawn.

MR. DALGLISH begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. Notice had certainly been given of the Amendment in his name.

MR. GLADSTONE repeated that no Amendments had been withdrawn.

MR. DALGLISH: At all events, notice had been given of the Amendment, and there was no such Amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman now. No alteration was made in the facts by this dispute about words. A third Amendment had now been submitted in the name of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was the Amendment which the Committee were now discussing. He cordially agreed with this last Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. He was an advocate for household suffrage, and should like to carry the principle as far as he possibly could. But, at the same time, he was interested in knowing whether this Amendment was brought forward to further the principle of household suffrage, or whether it was put forward for the purpose of obstructing the Bill. He had had the honour of a seat in that House for the last ten years. He was but a young Member when the Liberal party threw out the Bill of Lord Derby's Government in 1859; but since then he had often regretted that they had done so. He
